BATH.—The last concert of the season, at the Pump Rooms, came off on Saturday morning last, and was very fashionably attended. The band under the direction of Mr. Salmon, performed several overtures and pieces with great effect. The Lessees, Messrs. Green and Simms, also provided a novelty, in engaging Julian Adams, the Pianist, to perform on the new instrument (the Harmonium), whose performances were received with immense applause. This instrument, although occupying less space than a cottage piano, possesses (when the full swell is applied) a power of tone equal to a large organ, and the mellifluous softness of the flute, the silvery tone of the violoncello, and the depth and power of the double bass, are added to, and blended with the brilliant tones of the piano. The instrument has a single row of keys, to the extent of five octaves, but by a management of the stops, two additional octaves are produced. The manipulation of the keys, the working of the bellows with the pedals, and the constant use of the various stops to give effect to the music, makes the performance on this instrument a matter of no slight difficulty, and this will probably militate against its becoming as general in use as the piano, notwithstanding its being even more admirably adapted for the drawing room. Mr. Julian Adams performed several solos of his own arrangement, with orchestral accompaniments, and the Harmonium had every possible advantage in the full development of its powers, under his skilful management. Bath Herald, April 1st, 1847.

MUSIC AT COVENTRY.

(From a Correspondent.)

THE Committee of the Mechanics' Institution gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music on Monday evening in St. Mary's Hall. Our good old town was all astir at the announcement for some days previously, and much interest was taken in an entertainment which might fairly be termed a novelty here. The friends of the Institution also were anxious about the concert, and exerted themselves to the utmost. The consequence was, that every seat was occupied long before the performance commenced, and the audience appeared really bent on enjoying the entertainment about to be presented to them. Our orchestra was small but select. Among the principal performers in the band, I may mention Gill, of Leicester (first violin); Shargool (second violin), from the Birmingham Concerts; Mc Ewan, of Hinckley (tenor); Lewis, of Leamington (violoncello); H. Elliston, of Leamington (double-bass); Douglas, (flute), all good men and true. The programme was capital. Among the instrumental performances we had Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, Op. 16; Quartett, No. 5, Op. 18; of the same composer; the first movement of Haydn's No. 5 Symphony, and the overture to Oberon, all of which were played in a most creditable manner. The vocal performances were confined to two ladies from the Metropolitan Concerts, viz. Miss Lincoln and Madame G. A. Macfarren. Their singing afforded the utmost satisfaction, and fully justified the Committee in engaging them. Miss Lincoln has, I should think, a mezzo soprano voice, not remarkable for power, but under admirable management. She was encored in a German song of Kucken's, "We met by chance;" and also in a canonet, and in Macfarren's duet, "The Fairy ring." In Grisi's song from Puritani she was hardly so good, at least not so effective, but acquitted herself respectably—and that is saying not a little in so difficult a scena. Madame Macfarren, cara sposa of the celebrated composer, created a great sensation. She has a fine contralto voice, which she uses like a real artist, and shows that she has learned in the very best school. Her singing of Rossini's eternal, but never-tiring aria, "Di Tanti Paljiti," was chaste, expressive, and highly dramatic. In recitative Madame Macfarren exhibits the superiority of her teaching. In the exquisite song from Don Quixote, "Sweet were the hours of infancy," she was encored with acclamation, and repeated it with increased effect. She was also encored in a song of Sterndale Bennett's, which she sang in German words. I should have preferred hearing it in English. There is every apology for a musician of any nation to write to Italian words—the language woos the muse—but none but a German should write to German words. I should have preferred infinitely having heard Madame Macfarren sing Mr. Bennett's song with Irish words, it would have been more euphonious. The feature of the entertainment was decidedly the old English ballad of "Cruel Barbara Allen," sung by Madame Macfarren with the greatest possible taste and expression. Of this old ballad, Goldsmith says, "that the most refined music he ever heard was dissonance, compared with the effect produced upon him by a carter singing 'Barbara Allen.'" The poetry is very beautiful, and involves a story of singular pathos. To this poetry Macfarren, the composer, has written music at once simple, tender, and melodious. Indeed the ballad, as sung by Madame Macfarren, on Monday evening, presented the audience with one of the most delicious songs they ever heard. Much is due, doubtless, to the plaintive and expressive manner in which the lady rendered it, but, nevertheless, what we have stated of the music must be true. It went right home to the heart of every individual in the Hall. The ballad was rapturously encored. The concert wound up with "God save the Queen." I have rendered a faithful account of the concert which gave unqualified delight to all present, and the getting up of which reflects no small credit on the Committee of the Mechanics' Institution. Now that music has obtained a footing in our town, and has been recognised as a great source of entertainment, it is to be hoped that the projectors will not halt on the threshold, but persevere in so good and useful a cause.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR EDITOR.—For the voluntary "movement," (in the Corelli question) which your French florid correspondent has done me the honour to make, I beg very sincerely to thank him, although it must be confessed that his answer to the original question, viz., "Has Corelli in any known passage violated or departed from the laws of harmony," is not quite so satisfactory to my sceptical antagonist, as it would have been, if a single passage (bearing proof of the violated laws of harmony) in either the solos, concertos or sonatas of the erudite contrapunctist alluded to, had been pointed out. Your very agreeable "French Flowers," will very much oblige by opening a little wider in some convenient corner of the "Musical World" of next week.—I am, my dear Mr. Editor, with every apology for troubling you, yours truly, ZETA.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"The Lord is King." Anthem, for two voices and chorus, with accompaniment for organ or pianoforte, composed by JOHN LODGE ELLERTON, Esq.—C. LONSDALE.

The author exhibits much skill in composition. The voice parts are well written, and the arrangement is good. If there is little inspiration in this work, there is, nevertheless, a good deal of merit and excellent intention. The anthem is written for tenor, bass, and chorus.

"There is a tongue in every leaf," Recitative and Aria, S. M'MURDIE, Mus. Bac. Oxon.—T. BOOBY.

We can speak in terms of great eulogy of this composition. But there is an air of pretension about it we do not like, and the author does not seem to follow out his own intentions. There is apparently little difference between the aria and the recitative, and both might change place without any disadvantage. Musically speaking the song is well written, and the accompaniments are those of a scholar.

"Promenade Waltzes for the piano," RICARDO LINTER, —D'ALMAINE and MACKINLAY.

Mr. Linter is one of the popular waltz writers of the day. He has a certain amount, and a certain quality of tune in his compositions, which will always insure him success with a majority of the public. In the absence of any particular merit as a musician he may lay claims to the possession of that which will render him a favourite with a particular class. To that class we strongly recommend the above waltzes as possessing great merit of their kind. The frontispiece to these waltzes is a magnificent drawing done in gold and rich colours, and is certainly worth the whole price of the work.

"Fontainebleau Quadrilles," by RICARDO LINTER—D'ALMAINE and MACKINLAY.

Another set of Mr. Ricardo Linter's compositions, adorned with another magnificent frontispiece, if not so gorgeous, more beautiful, and in far better taste than the last. The Fontainebleau Quadrilles are light and lively, and would become popular if heard in the right place.

"The Sea Nymph's Song," written by S. F. SMITH. The music by J. BARNETT.—D'ALMAINE and MACKINLAY.

One of the most pleasing songs of the author of the Mountain Syph, we have seen for some time. The words are not very in spirit, but Mr. Barnett has created the poetry and music both together.

"Happy days gone by" Ballad, written by Miss MARIAN BROFDEN, sung by Miss CLARA NOVELLO and composed by J. CRONIN.

A neat, unpretending song, with a flow of tune not entirely free from the trite and the vulgar. Mr. Cronin steers clear of any novelty of effects in the or arrangement. The words of Miss Brofden have merit, but they are deficient in poetical skill. The feeling is very amiable.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

SINCE our pen was last employed in recording the proceedings at this establishment, Mr. Lumley, the director, has returned from his travels in search of the Swedish Nightingale. Mr. Lumley has not travelled in vain, for Jenny Lind is here. She arrived on Saturday, a few hours later than Mr. Lumley himself, and appeared that same evening in a box at the Opera, looking out for the beauties of Verdi's I Due Foscari, which was repeated on that occasion for the third time, Coletti being more effective than ever in the Doge. Jenny Lind seemed much amused with the opera, and also with Lucile Grahn in the ballet of Orithia, of which she remained to see the greatest portion. Jenny Lind was also evidently pleased with Rosati and Marie Taglioni, both of whom danced between the second and third acts of the opera. The house was very full. So great was the curiosity about the Lind, that for once that an opera-glass was directed to the stage it was thrice directed to the box in which she sat, accompanied by a cavalier and a dame. So many eloquent pens have lately attempted to describe her that it will appear presuming in us to follow their example and emulate their failure. Nevertheless, for the sake of gratifying our excellent friends in the provinces, who glean all their Opera information from our pages, we shall not quake before the task we have set ourselves—that of drawing in some half dozen lines, the picture of an artist who has caused more commotion previous to her appearance (as the angry moon breeds storms, looking so calm the while) than all the foreign luminaries put together, who, for the last half century, have lent their light to this country in the period of the harvest time.

Jenny Lind is young—of the middle height—fair-haired—blue-eyed—neither stout, nor slender, but well proportioned—neither fat nor thin, but enough of the one for comeliness, and enough of the other for romance—meek-looking when her features are at rest, full of animation and energy when they are at play—like Fate when she frowns, like Love when she smiles—in short, the very maiden of the German poet's dreams, the jungfrau of Schiller's Ideal. Jenny Lind is neither handsome nor plain, neither pretty nor ugly, but something that hovers about the abstract qualities of everything, catching a portion of them, but resembling them in nothing. Her face is like the water, ever-changing its expression according to the influence that troubles it from without; but it is fairer than the water, for the spirit that lives within is, an ineffable spirit, restless and unstable withal,—now dancing, in her eyes, like light, now playing on her lips like an unbodied joy, now lying cosily in the dimples of her cheek and chin. But what madness to attempt a description of that which is not to be described. As well might you count the sun-beams—with as much profit embrace a wave as it flows to its annihilation. Jenny Lind is what neither you nor we, Reader, can account for. The expressions of her countenance are as the fleeting shapes which the golden clouds of sunset will assume; look at them, and if you be a Turner, catch them as you look; but, if you turn aside and look again, they are gone for ever—others succeed, but not the same—they may live in the memory, but they have fled from the face of the outward world. But with all this Jenny Lind is a simple German maiden, who talks and laughs, and eats and drinks, and shakes hands with you (the sensation this gives you is rather indefinable, by the way), and does everything else but sing like all the rest of the world. How she does this will be for us to tell before many more suns and moons have risen and set, and the hours that entertained them have fled away, like the dark arrow in the noon.

Now, Reader, we have attempted to describe Jenny Lind, for your pleasure, and have failed as utterly as our amiable friend of the Observer and the rest of them—but we hold ourselves entitled to your gratitude for having made an exposition of our incompetency. We have exceeded the half-dozen lines—but the subject expanded as we went on.

On Tuesday a series of mishaps turned all the entertainments topsy-turvy. Ernani was announced, but when we arrived at the theatre a bill was placed in our hands, pleading the sudden indisposition of Madame Castellan, as an excuse for substituting two acts of I due Foscari. But here again we were to be disappointed. Madame Montenegro was indisposed, and Madame Solari was compelled to act as proxy for her in the prominent character of Lucrezia. Nevertheless, all went favourably. Madame Solari, a well-looking dame, with a pleasing voice and unassuming manner, sang and acted better than could have been anticipated under the circumstances; and Fraschini and Coletti put their shoulders to the wheel, and pushed the cart of Time on pleasantly enough. Then, entirely to restore good humour, the admirable Perrot, groaning under the weight of laurels won from the Milanese, in company with Fanny Ellsler, made his first bow this season, and was received with the enthusiasm due to the author of Emeralda, Catarina, the Pas de Quatre, the Pas des Déeses, and so many masterpieces. Perrot had composed a pas de deux for the occasion, for himself and the svelte Rosati. As a composition it was worthy the genius of the prince of ballet-masters, and its execution was worthy of the feet of Perrot and Rosati. Little Marie Taglioni then came on, unconsciously, and unconsciously danced the Posnanian, which being encored with acclamations, was unconsciously repeated by the unconsciously bewitching choreograph. How divinely this little inexplicable paradox would mime and dance the Somnambulist! We would go a mile to see her walk in her sleep—albeit, she could hardly be more evidently unconscious than in her waking. The remainder of the entertainments comprised a scene from La Favorita, in which Gardoni sang with his wonted elegance and feeling; and the picturesque ballet of Théa—Rosati and Marie Taglioni the fairest flowers in the Terpsichorean bouquet. The house was well filled, and the audience was pleased, in spite of disappointments.

Thursday was a long Thursday, but not a bit too long for Mr. Lumley's public, who are used to such feasts as would shame the banquets of Trimalchio, recorded by Petronius in his Satyricon. The first course consisted of L'Elisir d'Amore, the best of all the comic operas of Donizetti. It was thus cast:—Adina, Madame Castellan, Nemorino Signor Gardoni, Belcore Sig. F. Lablache, Dr. Dulcamara Signor Lablache. The delay which Lablache's temporary indisposition necessitated had an advantage. Out of good came evil. The Elisir was deferred, but it doubtless gained another rehearsal, and a rehearsal, under the vigilant and sensitive Balfe, is of no small value to all concerned. At all events, we never heard an opera more perfectly rendered in all its departments. It was a splendid realisation of the Opera buffa of Italy in its best days, and as the music of Donizetti is quite worthy of Cimarosa, the illusion was complete in all respects. Lablache was incomparable, Gardoni delicious, F. Lablache admirable, and Castellan all but irreproachable. A printed paper was handed to us at the beginning of the evening, requesting indulgence for the lady, on the plea of indisposition; but whatever might have been her ailment, it was very slightly observable. Gardoni was unanimously encored in "Una furtiva lagrima," which he sang with exquisite feeling. His influenza has nearly left him, and ere long he will be quite himself, and in condition to prendre sa revanche in the Puritani. At the end of the opera, Castellan, Gardoni, and Lablache were all recalled, and cheered "to the echo."

The re-appearance of Cerito was the next event of importance. This charming danseuse, the originator of the "Realism" apostrophised by the eloquent writer of the Times—or rather explained by him, for to his philosophical acumen we owe the classification of Terpsichorean achievements into schools—the originator of the "realism" of which Marie Taglioni is a fascinating disciple, made her rentré in a divertissement from the last year's ballet of Lalla Rookh, and was welcomed with acclamations in the pas de shawls. But this was only an inauguration. It was not till later in the evening, in the justly celebrated pas de quatre from the Lac des Fées (the only feature of that forgotten ballet which the edax rerum has not swallowed), that Cerito was her inimitable self—we say inimitable, for sui generis she has no competitor. In this her frolicking abandon, her airy and astonishing vaults and bounds, and her classical and exquisite poses, worthy of being immortalised by the chisel of a Baily, excited the usual admiration. St. Léon, the happy spouse of the fair danseuse, was the partner of her feats, and was received with the warmth due to his great merits, and leaped and twirled round with the elasticity of Indian rubber, and the celerity of a teetotum in full spin. The famous step à deux, in which Cerito and St. Léon traverse the stage in a succession of incredible bounds, cutting capers, as the term goes, in bottomless space, was vociferously encored, and the whole dance excited continuous plaudits. Mdles, Cassan and Honore, those admirable coryphées, were efficient supporters of the subordinate parts of the pas, and ambitiously emulated the achievements of their renowned sister of the dance. Previous to the pas de quatre we should have stated that Marie Taglioni executed her famous pas de Rosières, from Coralie, with her usual success, being loudly encored in her revolving variation, which she performs with such winning placidity and unconcern.

The last course of this lyric and choregraphic banquet consisted of the ballet of Orithia, of which we have already rendered account. Lucile Grahn danced with her accustomed fire and animation and was rewarded with the applause she never fails to elicit. A new pas de deux, composed by M. Paul Taglioni, for Rosati and Marie Taglioni, was named in the bills, but did not occur while we were present. Rosati, indeed, was absent the whole evening, which, perhaps, was a tribute paid to the rentré of the celebrated Cerito.

The house was brilliantly attended. Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite, were present, and what is quite as important, the much talked-about Jerny Lind, whose appearance is looked forward to with a frenzy of excitement.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

We have received innumerable letters, extolling our impartiality as exhibited in our notices of the two Italian Operas. We may here be permitted to express an opinion that there is nothing whatever to extol in our humble efforts to present the readers of the "Musical World" with a true history of the doings at both theatres. We are the partisans of neither, and we are in the pay of neither. Though we hold to the opinion we have all along expressed, that two large establishments for the representation of Italian music and French ballet exclusively, are more than even London can desire, and more than even London can afford to support, and that the one least ably directed must ultimately go to the wall, we are not the less zealous in our hope that both may succeed, since their success involves the well-being, and even livelihood of so many deserving persons and artists of various denominations. That this hope is unaccompanied with faith in the result, is not the fault of our scepticism, but the offspring of analogical reasoning, not to be overpowered by any argument contrathat has up to this moment been broached. But, once for all, in declaring our intention to proceed as we have begun, we lay claim to no other reward than what is naturally accorded to all faithful and unbiassed chroniclers:—that of the confidence of the public in what we find occasion to record, and reasonable deference for the opinions we are led, by circumstances as they may occur, to advance.

The performance on Saturday began with Rossini's Semiramide, given for the fourth time during the present season. Grisi both sang and acted magnificently, better than we have yet heard her, even during the present season, the absorbing circumstances of which have wound up her admirable talents to the highest pitch of exertion. We never saw her looking more beautiful, or more fully in possession of health, energy, and all those faculties that have combined to constitute her the queen of her divine art. The presence of Her Majesty and Prince Albert, who for the first time honoured the Royal Italian Opera with their presence, seemed to have put the inimitable artist on her mettle, and the bursts of approbation that continually greeted her exertions showed how entirely the audience (the most brilliant of the season) appropriated her transcendent capabilities. Alboni, whose position as a first-rate cantatrice is now placed beyond discussion, displayed all those excellencies that stand recorded in our pages. It is a very well to talk of Pisoni, but when talent reaches a certain condition of perfectness, it is not possible to go beyond it; and this we confidently state to be the case in respect of Alboni, than whom, with infinite respect for the past-worship and the "laudatores tempora acti" sneered at by Horatius Flaccus in his Ars Poetica, we do positively assert, and do faithfully believe, that a more admirable contralto, both naturally and artistically, never adorned the dramatic arena. The largo of her cavatina, exhibited with all the oily richness of voice that we have hitherto remarked—and, happily, a shade less redundancy of style, was encored, and a similar compliment was paid to the cabaletta of the duet with Grisi, in which both singers were as perfect as natural gifts and consummate art could make him. Tamburini, though still suffering from hoarseness, acted splendidly, and sang very little the worse for his indisposition. The orchestra and chorus, under Costa, were almost faultless—to say quite faultless would be to outrage truth—for it is in humanity to err sometimes, and all that skill and industry can effect is to render that erring as infrequent as practicable. The Odalisque followed, in which Fleury, as usual, danced very gracefully. But we hope to see her soon in something more attractive. To vie with Her Majesty's Theatre in the ballet department demands something more than the Royal Italian Opera would appear as yet to have dreamed of.

Tuesday night will be long remembered by those who were present at the Royal Italian Opera. The admirable Mario made his rentrée, and a new ballet of the right sort was introduced for the début of Dumilatre, a graceful and clever danseuse, already known to this country through the medium of the spirited Mr. Bunn. The opera for the occasion was La Sonnambula, the masterpiece of poor Bellini's graceful talent. Persiani was the Amina; and whether it was the presence of her redoubtable rival, Jenny Lind, about whom the whole world is in arms at present, or the influence of La Diva, Grisi, who was conspicuous in a private box, beaming with beauty and intelligence, or whether it was the stimulus of acting with the accomplished Mario—or one, or all, or none of these incentives to exertion—we know not, but certain it was, that she never, in our recollection, sang so divinely. Her execution of the "Come per me sereno," in the first scene, and the "Ah non giunge," in the last, was absolute perfection. The graces and fioriture she introduced, varying them in the encore with surpassing facility, were astonishing. Jenny Lind appeared to observe her with intense interest, and no doubt said within herself, "This is a rival not to be despised—Amina is one of my pet parts, and I must look out for my laurels." But we opine that Jenny Lind's stronghold, in this respect, will be her dramatic ability, in which particular, beyond a certain quiet grace and unaffected earnestness, Madame Persiani does not shine.

Mario, the pleasant, welcome Mario, must have a paragraph to himself. His appearance, as the Elvino of the evening, was welcomed with acclamations, loud and long continued. Three salvos of applause were not considered enough to honour him, but a fourth must perforce be added. The first few notes he uttered proclaimed the voice of the graceful tenor as full toned and grateful to the ear as ever. Throughout the evening Mario sang in his very best style, which, it is needless to say, is a style approachable by few other artists. In the finale to the second act (the opera being distributed in three acts, contrary to Bellini's intention), his passionate and truthful expression was the theme of general admiration; and in the air, "Ah perche non posso," he touched all hearts by the pathos and sensibility he infused into the andante, which, contrary to precedent, was unanimously encored—a compliment ordinarily reserved for the cabaletta, and to which Mario's beautiful singing on this occasion entitled it strongly as ever.

Tamburini quite delighted the audience by his graceful and natural acting in Count Rudolpho, to which part he gave a prominence that rarely accompanies it. His "Vi ravviso" was sung as finely as could be, and was received with loud applause. It was honourable to this great artist to have thus consented to give importance, by the prestige of his name, and the excellence of his talent, to a part of subordinate interest.

Our readers will not have forgotten Mlle. Corbari, in whose favour we waged, last year, a crusade against the critic of the Morning Chronicle, who was inveterate in his hostility. Things have now changed, and we are happy to compliment the zealous advocate of the Royal Italian Opera or the handsome manner in which he has recognized Mlle.

Corbari, in her new position, as one of the contraltos of that establishment. To do other than praise the young artist for the charming and ingenious manner in which she sang and acted the not very agreeable part of Lisa, rescuing it by her agreeable manner from much of its unpleasantness, was not possible, and the Chronicle's appreciation has our hearty concurrence. We even go so far as to quote his words:—

"Madlle. Corbari was received also with much applause. She has a beautiful voice, and has gained ground as a singer since her début last season, but she still lacks stage ease and experience."

We do not perceive the "lack" complained of. We admired the unobtrusive acting of Mlle. Corbari, no less than her fresh voice and agreeable method of using it. She has wonderfully improved in confidence, and her talent has now full play. The air of Donizetti which she introduced is sufficiently effective for the purposes of the scene, although, with the Chronicle, we are uncompromising enemies to all interpolations, omissions, abstractings, or remodifications of the original scores of no matter what composer—even Verdi. A composer, to be justly condemned or praised, must be allowed to speak for himself. If you cut him short, or cram words into his mouth that he would not, or could not himself utter, you have no right to complain that he has not spoken to the purpose. At the end of the opera, Persiani, Tamburini, and Mario reappeared before the curtain, amidst loud cheering. Corbari might decently have accompanied them, but we suppose the fair young artist was not sufficiently presuming. But why did not her more experienced comrade, Madame Persiani, bring her forward? It would have been a graceful action on her part.

We have small room left to record the entire success of the new ballet of M. Albert, which, under the title of La Reine des Fées, was entirely and deservedly successful. A sketch of the story is not possible here. Let it suffice, that it is the wedding-day of Teresa and Robert, and that festivities consequent thereon are taking place. There is a haunted house, and a terrible baron. Argant, the terrible baron, is in love (desperately) with Flora, a beautiful fairy (La Reine des Fées) whom he has "seen in flashes of lightning," as the ballet-book has it. But Ulrich, a young hunter, falls among the fairies by some accident, sees Flora in a dream, gets by some accident into the haunt of the fairies, in the tower, loves Flora, is loved by Flora, makes love to Flora, is accepted by Flora, and persuades Flora to leave fairy-life, and resigning immortality and etheriality, to become mortal and substantial in the shape of his earthly wife. The scenery and decorations of this ballet are worthy of the Royal Italian Opera, which sits on the throne of old Covent Garden, famous of yore for its scenic wonders. Grieve has outdone himself in a couple of tableaux, representing the descent of the fairies, and the home of the fairies, which are ingenious, novel, and beautiful. They were acknowledged by loud plaudits. "If," as a humorous companion remarked, "Dumilatre had not made the ballet, the ballet would have made Grieve." But Grieve did not want making; he made himself, years ago, by his ball-scene in Gustave III., at this very theatre. The dancing of Mlle. Dumilatre in Flora, the Fairy Queen, was in the highest degree, elegant and poetical. If not a rival to the more agile of the great dancers, Dumilatre yields to few of them in the grace and variety of her poses, and the floating elasticity of her movements. She was received throughout with the warmest applause; a tribute justly due to her refined and ingenious performance. Petipa, from the Académie Royale, in Paris, also appeared in the part of Ulrich. He is a good dancer, and a clever mimist, and was much applauded in a brilliant pas de deux with Dumilatre. The dances and groupings were all artistic and effective. The pas de deux of Mdle. Bertin and M. Mabile deserves a word apart, for the skill with which it was executed, and the applause with which it was greeted. The ballet was entirely successful, and Dumilatre and Petipa were forced to reappear at the fall of the curtain. The music of M. Curmi, by the way, is sufficiently showy and tuneful. M. Mellon, the conductor of the ballet, may be commended both for zeal and ability. He will soon get used to his part, which is one of no slight importance.

One line must suffice for the long Thursday. The performance included an act of Semiramide, and an act of Son-nambula. The singers were Grisi, Alboni, Tamburini, Mario, Persiani, Corbari, &c., &c. The new ballet followed with increased effect. The house was crowded. In a future number, we shall have a word to say about this fragmentary representation which hardly consorts with the spirit of the Royal Italian Opera Programme.

MADAME BISHOP IN DUBLIN.

(From our Correspondent.)

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, 11 O'CLOCK.

I have just returned from the Theatre Royal, and the post leaving to-morrow morning at 6, I have only time to say a few words, and to inform you, that Madame Bishop is once more amongst us, and that she performed Norma to-night with immense success. She was received by a very crowded house, with deafening cheers, which continued so long, that the orchestra commenced playing several times, and were obliged to give way to the hurricane. I have not time at this hour to speak critically of the performance of the prima donna, who was visited during the evening with great applause, received several encores, and was called for at the fall of the curtain with a repetition of all the previous manifestations of enthusiasm. Madame Bishop has certainly worked her way right into the hearts of the Dublin folk. She is decidedly one of the greatest favorites that has appeared in this city. I have not time to write more.

MISCELLANEOUS.

EXETER HALL.—We cannot afford our readers an account of the second performance of Elijah, which took place last night, as no tickets were sent us. This is entirely independent of our promised analytic notice of Dr. Mendelssohn's Oratorio. We may state as matter of information, that Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite, attended the performance at Exeter Hall last evening.

MR. J. COHAN.—We perceive by our advertisement sheet, that this gentleman purposes giving a recital of piano-forte music, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on which occasion, he will perform part of a piano-forte sonata of his own composition; a sonata of Beethoven for piano and violin, in conjunction with Blagrove. Miss Dolby and Miss Birch are among the vocalists engaged.

MADAME VESTRIS AND MR. CHARLES MATHEWS concluded their engagement in Dublin on Tuesday last. It proved a very unprofitable speculation for the manager.

MDLLE VERA.—The vocalist and her brother, M. Vera, the composer and accompanist, have arrived in London.

MADemoisELLE FANNY ELSSLER will make her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera on Saturday next, in a new grand ballet written expressly for her.

VIARDOT GARCIA.—The Berlin Journals are loud and incessant in their eulogiums on the merits of this artist. Her voice and execution are extraordinary, and have created a sensation almost unparalleled in the annals of the lyric stage. The enthusiasm with which she is constantly greeted seems to prove the reiterated opinion of the Prussian journalists, that the mantle of her illustrious sister Malibran, has appropriately fallen upon her. Alice, in Robert le Diable, is a task for the powers of even a first cantatrice, and for this part Madame Viardot Garcia was on a late occasion announced. Mademoiselle Tuezck, the Isabelle of the evening, was taken ill, an event which would have set the opera aside, had the principal part been in any other prima donna's hands; Madame Viardot Garcia, however, rather than allow any disappointment to the audience, actually undertook and played the two parts!—changing her costume with each change of scene, and representing in one opera, the two opposite characters of a princess and a peasant!!! The enthusiasm of the audience was at its height, and she was vociferously called for at the end of each act; when the curtain fell, the house rose en masse, and greeted her with an absolute storm of uproarious applause, richly earned, not only in the performance of so unexampled a feat, but even more in the unaffected readiness with which it was undertaken. As it is justly observed in the German papers, far from lowering her dignity by the condescension, Madame Viardot Garcia has added to it, and she will doubtless find its just appreciation in the public patronage and applause.—(From the Royal Italian Opera Programme.)

MDLLE. MOLINA DI MENDI.—This young vocalist, a cousin of the late Mad. Malibran, and of Pauline Viardot Garcia, the living, has arrived in London.

VIEUXTEMPS.—The celebrated violinist and composer, has arrived in London for the season, and will play at the next meeting of the Beethoven Quartet Society.

HERR HOELZEL.—This esteemed German basso, and agreeable vocal composer, has arrived in London for the season.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP arrived in Dublin on Saturday last. She appeared in Norma on Wednesday and not on Monday as we announced. She will shortly appear in Linda di Chamouni, in the principal character of which she created so much sensation at Rome and Naples.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Meyerbeer's grand Opera, Roberto il Diavolo, has been prepared for this Theatre, and is in active rehearsal. The cast will embrace nearly the whole strength of the Operatic Company. The principal characters, we understand, will be sustained by Mesdames Grisi and Persiani, with the Signori Mario, Salvi, Marini, and Ronconi, or Tamburini.

MRS. BUTLER, late Fanny Kemble, makes her first appearance in London for several years, on Monday evening, at the Princess's Theatre. She will perform Julia, in the Hunchback, and on Wednesday she will appear in Juliet, the part in which she won her first favors with the public.

HAYMARKET.—A new five-act comedy is in rehearsal at this theatre.

SPANISH THEATRICALS IN LONDON.—The Spanish Company who are performing with great eclat at the Opera-house in Paris, have been engaged by Mr. Bunn, and will appear in due course at Drury Lane. The Spanish Company consists of two troops, the comedians and the dancers. The choregraphic corps are spoken of in terms of great admiration, their performances being novel in the highest degree. Cachuchas, boleros, tambourine and other national dances are exhibited, and display extraordinary powers of agility in the members of the troop. It is said that the balero and cachucha will be seen for the first time in England, and that the dances under these names at present exhibited on the operatic stage and elsewhere, are no more the national dances of Spain, than the jig or waltz. We await the coming of the Spanish double company with much curiosity.

SIGNOR SPEFANOSKI.—The celebrated violoncellist has arrived in London.

GODEFROID.—This eminent harpist, whose success in Paris during the winter has been immense, will arrive in London for the season on the 25th. The harp had grown quite into discredit among the Parisian dilettanti, but Godefroid has restored it to favor, and such has been his vogue that the stiff and stately Conservatoire itself was compelled to engage him for its recent concert. His own concerts have been brilliant and crowded. The public, blasé with pianist and violinists, found something novel and exciting in the harp, as developed by the agile fingers and agreeable fancy of Godefroid.

JULIAN ADAMS.—This popular performer upon the patent harmonium and pianoforte has arrived in town for the season. Mr Adams performed upon the patent harmonium at a soirée, given expressly for him by the Earl of Mount Edgecombe, on Friday evening last, at the noble earl's residence at Bath. The patent harmonium, from its original capabilities, will doubtless prove a novel and interesting feature at the London concerts this season, more particularly at the nobility's soirées, for which it is so peculiarly adapted.

BATH HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A superb French clock, bearing a suitable inscription, has been presented by a committee of members of the above society, to Mr. Bianchi Taylor, in acknowledgment of his eminent talent, and of his great, indefatigable exertions.

M. and MAD. OURY had the honor of a private audience with his Holiness the Pope previous to their departure from Rome, where they were also elected honorary members of the "Congregazione ed Accademia di Santa Cecilia." After visiting Naples, Genoa, Florence, Bologna and Venice (where they performed at two soirées given by the Duchess of Berry, in presence of the Imperial Court), they gave their last concert on the 20th of March at the Scala in Milan, and have arrived in London.

POSES PLASTIQUES.—The Tableaux Vivans, as now exhibited, are far from being the novelty generally supposed. M. Toqueville in his history of the reign of Louis XV. relates that "the Regent invited the Duchess de Berry to his suppers, and he adds, that one evening after the wine had been freely circulated, he took a conceit to represent the Judgment of Paris; the Duchess de Berry played Venus, and two of the Regent's mistresses Minerva and Juno, appearing in the costume which the fable ascribes to them when they appeared before the son of Priam." The only difference is, that the exhibitions of the Regent were private, while those of our day are public.

30 to 50 per Cent. Money Saved by using the New Patent

UNIVERSAL GAS BURNER,

Giving the most POWERFUL and PUREST Light at the INCREDIBLE PRESSURE OF THREE-VENTHS,
Which may be tested and seen daily, from 11 till 5, at the Office of the PATENTEES AND MANUFACTURERS,
60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

The Patentees beg to call public attention to the following facts. The advantages resulting from the invention are various and striking. Independently of a saving of 30 to 50 per cent. the combustion is perfect, and the brilliancy produced superior to any light hitherto discovered. It emits neither smell nor smoke, and burns steadily for any period; and such is its purity, that it neither affects or soils the most delicate colour or the finest fabric. Objections have been made to the introduction of gas in dwelling-houses, to the expense of fittings, to its destruction of furniture, draperies, gold moulding, &c.; these are entirely obviated by the "PATENT UNIVERSAL GAS BURNER." As the cost of laying on gas is much lower than is commonly supposed, it is adapted for private dwellings, as well as for club houses, churches, hotels, manufactories, and public buildings. One of the small burners is amply sufficient to light a good sized room, at a sum immeasurably lower than spirit, oil, or candle, with the avoidance of waste or trouble.

The merits of the "Burner," its brilliancy and economy surpassing every other known light, are shown by the annexed authentic opinions:—

EXTRACT from the Proceedings of the Institution of Civil Engineers Tuesday, 26th May, 1846, Sir JOHN RENNIE, President, in the Chair.

"A gas burner of a novel and ingenious construction was exhibited. The principal novelty was the introduction of a stream of air to the centre of the flame by a hollow button in the middle of the burner. The air passing up through the hollow stem of the button, was heated, and passed out by two series of fire-holes around the periphery, and impinging with force on the flame of the gas curved it outwards in the shape of a tulip, while the oxygen of the air, mingling with the carburetted hydrogen gas, produced a very perfect combustion. The flame was quite white down the top of the burner, was very steady as was amply demonstrated by the excellent light of the Institution, where these burners have been used. In comparing the consumption of these burners with that of the concentric ring burners and trying the power of the two lights by the photometer, the new burner gave a better light, with a saving of rather more than one-third."

CERTIFICATE.

POLYTECHNIC CHEMICAL SCHOOL.—"In testing Clark, McNeill, and Co.'s Universal Gas Burner with one of the best shadowless burners, it gave a more pure and brilliant light, with a saving of 20 to 25 per cent."

GEORGE CRISP, Engineer, ROBT. LONGBOTTOM, Secretary.

CERTIFICATE.

"In a series of experiments made upon Clark, McNeill, and Co.'s Patent Universal Gas Burner, its superiority was satisfactorily established in economy and the quality of the light. Tested against argand burners, Nos. 4 (12 holes), and 6 (15 holes), it afforded a saving of at least 25 per cent., and against three fish-tail burners, No. 4, 40 per cent. The colour and brilliancy of the flame is superior to any other burner."

T. W. KEATES, Consulting Chemist, J. D. PALMER, Mechanical Inspector.

The UNIVERSAL GAS BURNER may be had and seen from 11 till 5, at the Patentees Office and Manufactory, 60, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, and the British Army and Navy.J. KOHLER'S NEW PATENT LEVER INSTRUMENTS.

J. KOHLER having brought to perfection and obtained Her Majesty's Letters Patent for the above invention, which he has applied to the C. KNOPEAN, TRUMPET, CORNETTO, TROMBONES, and FRENCH HORN, he can now with great confidence, after an experience of Five years in bringing the action to its present state of perfection, recommend them to Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and all Professors and Amateurs. The advantages that this Patent gives to these Instruments are:—

1. All the Tones and Semitones produced by the Patent Lever are quite as perfect as the Natural Notes on the Instrument.

2. The intervals on the DIATONIC and CHROMATIC Scales are perfect, the compass greater, and the most rapid and difficult passages may be performed with a precision, freedom, and fullness of tone, and comparative ease to the performer.

3. Combinations in harmony, which never before could be performed at all by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease, and Ten or Twelve Instruments on this principle can produce a more rich and sonorous effect than Twenty Four could do on the old principles. The harshness of tone in the former Brass Instruments is entirely done away with, and a set of these Instruments heard together, produces Military and harmonious effects never before heard.

These Instruments are now in use in HER MAJESTY'S PRIVATE BAND, FIRST LIFE GUARDS, ROYAL HORSE GUARDS, GRENADIER GUARDS, FUSILIER GUARDS, ROYAL ARTILLERY, 60th ROYAL RIFLES, &c.

Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE;

the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABBRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

FELIX GODEFROID.

We have much pleasure in translating for our readers an article on the above excellent artist from the Feuilleton of the Constitutionnel of April the 15th. The comments of the writer, P. A. Fiorentino, are accurate, as far as regards M. Godefroid, but his ideas become hyperbolised and vague when he attempts to reason on matters musical. Our readers will perceive this before they reach the end of the article.

"I have now to speak of Felix Godefroid, one of those rare artists who recompense us for the misery to which we are condemned by being forced to hear concert after concert for three months every year. Godefroid is on the harp what Paganini was on the violin, Thalberg on the piano, and Servais on the double-bass. I have heard him frequently, during his stay at Paris, and at each performance he revealed to me some wonder of the harp, which I had not perceived before. Like all superior artists, Godefroid, commenced by rendering his instrument perfect. He enlarged the strings, and by this simple means quadrupled the sonority of the harp. Instead of dividing between the two hands, passages of arpeggio, as his predecessors were invariably wont to do, as they used also frequently in passages embracing the common scale, he confines these entirely to the right-hand, and his left remains entirely at his disposal to complete the harmony, and to increase, or diminish the power of tone, and to add, at his will, morceaux commenced and continued alternately by the two hands at once. M. Godefroid has discovered new effects, enharmonic combinations of extraordinary richness and power by various managements of the pedals, of which King David himself had not the knowledge. Add to these, novelties of mechanism, a limpidity, an amplitude, an equality of sound most admirable; add rapidity, neatness, vigour of execution in passages ascending and descending in place of slurring them over without force or accuracy; add above all the inspiration, the verve, the genius which shape and fashion all great artists, and you will still have but a feeble notion of the talent of Felix Godefroid. His studies are charming. If Godefroid were not a virtuoso rare as intelligent, he would shine in the first rank among composers. There is nothing more serial, or more vaporous than his Danse des Sylphes; nothing more touching, or more sweet than his Melancholie, and his Rêve. There is in this last morceau a song sustained by the right hand, with harmonics in imitation of the violin, surrounded with a quantity of the most delicate and light broderies, which have a ravishing effect. His fantasies upon Robert le Diable, and the Freyshutz are models of arrangement, skill, and taste. His Carnaval de Venise—for since the time of Paganini all artists of the first rank have their carnaval—commences with a motive after the Italian manner, and finishes with such a profusion of ornaments, showers of pearly notes, so exquisitely treated, that you might say with good reason, that before Godefroid's time, one could not tell why arch-angels and seraphs preferred the harp to all other instruments. The life of Godefroid has been more replete with adventure than a romance of Dumas, or a drama of Soulié. His father, an honest merchant of Namurs, having in his commercial transactions lost everything, except his honour, turned for consolation to music. A musician in instinct and feeling, without having learned anything, he sang, composed, and played on every instrument. In a few years he redeemed his fortune: but the money he had gained by the flute was soon lost in traffic, and Dieudonné Godefroid, having no heritage to bequeath to his children, made artists of them. Jules, the first-born, whose death has been a cause of so much regret in the musical world, acquired on the harp a prodigious talent, and obtained a distinguished name among composers. Another son became a tenor singer. Mademoiselle Godefroid, at an early age was engaged as prima donna at Douay. As for the little Felix, he followed the same career as his sister at the age of seven, and made his débüt, with eclat, in the characters of Leontine Fay. He gained a real triumph in the Fée Carabosse. But though his career was brilliant, it could not long enchain his adventurous spirit, and in a few months he learned to play in a superior manner on the piano, the violin, the harp, and, I believe, even the bassoon. In everything he undertook the young Godefroid displayed so fervent a will, and so remarkable an aptitude, that his father decided on sending him to Paris. Admitted without difficulty into the Conservatoire, he profited by the instruction of Naderman, the illustrious master of Labarre, and Bocha the greatest harpist of the day. At the age of fifteen having nothing more to learn, the little Godefroid found himself suddenly thrown on his own resources in the streets of Paris, possessing marvellous talent, but dying of hunger, like many other victims of a government that would fain pretend to patronize art. His family, overwhelmed in difficulties, could not assist him. He fell into the most frightful distresses, like Chatterton, Gilbert, and many poets and musicians, who were too proud to beg, or to stoop to artifice and entreaty to procure them a livelihood. He composed romances which no one would purchase; he offered to copy music, to sing in churches, to play at public balls: he could gain no employment. He spoke to the porter of the house in which he had his miserable apartment to procure him pupils for the piano, at such a trifle, per lesson, as would be ridiculous to mention. The porter, a good man in the main, had a daughter who took lessons on the piano, but she had no master, and, moreover, the talents of Godefroid inspired neither father nor daughter with any great confidence. They refused the proffered services of their young lodger, but to soften their refusal, they admitted him to their intimacy and their table. These kind folk lived somewhat at their ease and practised hospitality after the ancient manner. The porter occupied his leisure moments in working at the business of a locksmith. The daughter displayed some ability on the piano and guitar. Godefroid not being able to render himself useful as a musician, wished, at least, to make himself useful to his host in his trade. So it was—the hand that drew sounds from the harp which since so often delighted and astonished the public, had recourse to beating iron on an anvil and blowing the bellows. The bells of the Hôtel de l'Univers were partly fashioned by Felix Godefroid. In the mean time his brother Jules died, and the regret he heard pronounced on every side for the death of the celebrated artist, added poignancy to his grief. "I too," said he to himself, weeping, "would become celebrated, if they would but hear me." By some fatality of circumstance no one would hear him. Erard, the providence of artists, gave way to the vulgar prejudices, which would not admit that in the same family there could exist two young artists of such rare endowments. He consented at length to hear the young Godefroid. But, obstacles of another nature retarded their interview—obstacles which never fail to compromise the advancement of the artist. Godefroid had not clothes, sufficiently decent, in which he could with propriety appear at the house of his protector. At last, by the assistance of his kind landlord he was fitted with a dress, and forthwith repaired to the Rue de maille. He was received in that mansion of universal hospitality with affectionate cordiality. As usual a large auditory was assembled. The domestic brought a harp and the young artist was requested to try the instrument. What passed that moment in the heart of poor Godefroid those only can understand who have set their whole life on the cast of a die. He preluded with sufficient courage, but his hands began to tremble; the tears gushed from his eyes, and he no longer knew what he was doing. The company at first listened to him with some interest; to interest succeeded indifference; to indifference distraction; then followed conversation in an under tone, and the poor executant was no further minded. At this moment Franz Liszt entered. He saluted Madame Erard, shook hands with the master of the house, and spoke of the weather and other interesting topics, as though Godefroid and his harp had never existed. The poor harpist continued his performance, not daring to exhibit his annoyance at the interruption, nor to cease playing his sonata. On a sudden Liszt stooped short in the midst of a sentence, listened for an instant, and springing up, cried aloud, "This is an admirable artist;" then, approaching Godefroid with that burlesque familiarity, which is one of the principal traits of his character, "My friend," said he, "what are you doing at Paris? What are your occupations?" "I work with a smith and make bells," answered Godefroid with simplicity. The spectators regarded each other in astonishment, believing the young man had lost his reason. Liszt alone understood him. "Will you come to London with me?" he asked. Godefroid did not know how to reply. He turned his troubled looks from Liszt to the harp, and from the harp back again to Liszt. "Accept," said Erard to him, "this instrument which has proved to you so dear a friend;" and, at the same time, he slipped into his hand a bank bill for a thousand francs. The next day Liszt and Godefroid departed for London. When Liszt's first concert was announced, the name of Godefroid figured on the bills in as gigantic letters as that of the beneficiaire, whether from chance, or a generous feeling of the pianist, we cannot say. The English who measure the talent of an artist by the size of the letters of his name, ran in crowds. This was for the young harpist a grand ordeal and a grand triumph. The talent of Godefroid no longer stood indebted to large letters for a proof or attestation. On his return to Paris the artist had only to be heard to take his position at once in the first rank of living artists. The poor and modest young man who was compelled to drudge as an assistant to a smith, is, at this moment, one of the most prized, most fetéd, and most gâtés of all the artists in Paris. Everywhere he plays, his success is enthusiastic, and the English millionaires who swooned away at his last concert, will purchase at their weight in gold the bells of the Hotel de l'Univers."

The above biography of Felix Godefroid is exceedingly interesting, for which reason we have given it insertion. The article of the Feuillitoniste would be entitled to a space in our journal for another reason also; viz., to exhibit a fair specimen of that inflated and plethoric style of writing, which too often is found occupying the columns devoted to criticism on music in the French papers. We, by no means, include in this censure the writings in the Parisian journals whose pages are exclusively devoted to the art. We have softened down the article as well as we could, nevertheless, enough remains to show the hyperbolical style of the author.

The notice of M. Florentino exhibits as profound an ignorance on matters musical, as on matters Anglican. We forgive the sapient critic his witless remarks on English millionaires, gigantic capitals, and the purchase of bells at their weight in gold; but we would pray him, when he next indites the biography or sketch, of a musician, that he would confine himself to the statistics with which he may be furnished, and not involve himself in the mysteries of an art, concerning which he displays as little knowledge in the explication, as a school boy in the fourth form might be supposed to do of the dialectics of Aristotle.

MEDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.

In St. Paul Mendelssohn achieved the greatest work of its class since the Mount of Olives. In Elijah he has accomplished the greatest work since St. Paul. It is something for a composer to have produced the two finest masterpieces of his time; and this Mendelssohn has done in the two oratorios here mentioned. The St. Paul was first performed at the great triennial Rhenish Festival, held at Dusseldorf, in 1836. The Elijah was first made known to the world at the Birmingham Festival, in August, 1846. Thus ten years elapsed between the appearance of these two chef d'œuvres, which period the composer employed in the production of a vast number of works, in almost every style, not one, the smallest of which, has escaped celebrity.

A long analysis of Elijah appeared in the Musical World, at the epoch of the Birmingham Festival. In resuming the subject now, we are, consequently, spared a quantity of technical detail, which, those who require it, will find in one of our September numbers of last year. We shall at present merely endeavour to give some notion of the general design of the oratorio, and the poetical spirit in which the subject has been treated by the composer.

The original version of Elijah is in German. We owe the English translation to the able and experienced pen of Mr. W. Bartholomew, a gentleman well known to the literary and musical world.

The oratorio begins with that part of the history of Elijah, the prophet, in which he prophecies the drought, as a sign of God's anger and vexation at the idolatry and multifold transgressions of his chosen people. Mendelssohn has happily introduced the prophecy, in a recitative, "As God, the Lord of Israel liveth," for Elijah, whose music is written for a bass voice, which is in consonance with the gravity and solemnity of the prophet's character. The opening recitative in Handel's Israel, where the Israelites complain of the cruelty of the Egyptian task-masters, will be recalled here. But Mendelssohn has refined and developed this idea by the solemn character of his instrumental accompaniments. The recitative leads to a long and elaborate instrumental movement, in which is depicted, with powerful truth, the train of thought which might be supposed to arise in the bosoms of the erring nation, under the influence of so awful a denunciation. This movement is in the fugued style—a grave subject, in the minor key, led off by the basses-piano, and worked throughout by a kind of gradual crescendo, until it arrives at a fortissimo of the whole orchestra, when a sublime passage of simple harmony leads to a pedal, in which the violins rush with impetuosity into the subject of a chorus of the people, "Help Lord, wilt thou quite destroy us?" This is a gloomy and magnificent composition. It is in two parts, the second subject being set to these words, "The harvest now is over." The expression of the whole is that of extreme despair. It is in the same key as the overture—D minor. A recitative chorus, "The deeps afford no water," a very effective employment of choral means, leads to a duet and chorus, "Lord bow down thine ear to our prayer," in A minor, the characteristic of which is the continual appearance of a melancholy phrase of supplication on those words, which the chorus sings as a kind of refrain-accompaniment to the melody of the duet, delivered by the two principal voice parts on the words, "Zion spreadeth her hands for aid." The art of the composer is here shown in the disposition of the refrain, which appears in almost every part of the bar, and generally unanticipated. The effect is delicious, and the whole is rendered still more lovely by the peculiar quaintness of the orchestration, which is in excellent keeping with the tender melancholy of the tune. The contrast of this duet, half sorrow, half prayer, with the terrible despair evidenced in the overture and opening chorus is very fine. But still more grateful and refreshing is the tenor recitative of Obadiah, "Ye people rend your hearts," which conducts to the heavenly air, "If with all your hearts." The key of E flat, in which this is written, produces an exquisite contrast to the heavy gloom of the minor modes that have hitherto prevailed, and the devotional and unadorned style of the air itself, with its soft and reposeful accompaniment, fills the mind with hope and faith in the mercy and goodness of the Almighty. Nothing can surpass, in poetical beauty, the effect of the first few notes of the recitative, to which the tenor quality of voice administers a sort of comfortable effect—let the term pass—of which we cannot find words to convey a notion to those who have not heard it. But the eloquence of Obadiah is transitory. The people are still afraid, they are conscious of having greatly erred, and are fearful of the consequences. This is splendidly developed in the first part of a chorus in two divisions. The opening, in C minor, is angry, petulant—nay, almost scornful. The people cry, "Yet doth the Lord see it not; he mocketh at us." The second division of this chorus, however, depicts a better feeling. It is a kind of chorale, in C major, "For He, the Lord our God, is a jealous God"—and embodies the justice and mercy of the Almighty; how he will punish the evil doer, and reward those who keep his commandments. The music is sublime—the whole orchestra streams forth in a glory of magnificence, and the tones of the organ peal out in solemn grandeur.

An angel then tells Elijah, in a recitative for a contralto voice ("Elijah, get thee hence"), to go to the brook of Cherith—a well-known passage in scripture. A double-quartet, for two choirs, of four female and four male voices, "For he shall give his angels charge," then develops the intention of the Lord to uphold and protect Elijah. It is written in the key of G major. The melody is exquisitely pure, and the part-writing masterly and flowing. We may refer to the first entrance of the tenor voice, the reprise of the first motive, and the coda, as exquisite points of art, worth all consideration.

The brook of Cherith being dried up, an angel tells the prophet, in another contralto recitative, to depart, and go to Zarephath. En passant we may remark, that all the recitatives with which the oratorio is interspersed, are very melodious and beautifully constructed: moreover, their expression of the words is sometimes wonderful. We would cite the phrase which, in low impressive terms, accompanies the words, "And the barrel of meal shall not waste, &c." in the recitative just mentioned, as one instance from a hundred of their poetic beauty. The scene between Elijah and the widow is one of the most masterly passages in the oratorio. The supplications of the widow for the salvation of her son—the appeals of the prophet to heaven—the ultimate recovery of the sufferer, and the overflowing gratitude and veneration of the mother, are all expressed with fervour and vivid truth, in a kind of fragmentary duet, consisting of an air, several accompanied recitatives, and a short codetta, in the form of a duettino. The air in which the widow pours out her anguish, in E minor, is absolutely heart-rending. The high soprano tones of the voices, the shrill piercing notes of the oboe, which has a prominent place in the orchestra, the forzandos of the tenors and violoncellos on single notes, which seem like sudden darts and throbs of pain, all combine to make a wonderfully graphic picture of anguish and despair. The solemn strains that accompany the prophet's words contrast most beautifully with the murmurs of distressed humanity. The widow's sudden hope and joy at the indications of her son's revival, the increased majesty and grandeur of the prophet's words, accompanied by the sonorous voices of the trombones and horns, and the united exultation of the two, at the end, when the son's life is ensured, are all depicted with graphic power. The whole is climaxed by a chorus in G major, "Blessed are the men who fear Him," apostrophizing the glorious attributes of God, his goodness, wisdom, power, and mercy. If ever faith was robed in splendour, it is in this truly exquisite outpouring of melody and harmony. Nothing can be more devotional and tender—nothing fuller of hope and more soothing. The manner of the instrumentation strengthens the peculiar character and loveliness of the melody, which ever flows on and on, like faith that endures and dies not. The restless movement of the violoncellos gives the notion of a hope newly born, that stirs the mind to fresh exertion, and invigorates the frame with health and strength. It is truly a divine hymn, and worthy of being addressed to heaven.

MENDELSSOHN AND THE PHILHARMONIC.

THE visits of Mendelssohn to this country are festivals to the musical community. England has reason to be proud that it was she who first accorded to the genius of this extraordinary man the full amount of recognition that was its due. The fact cannot be overlooked that Germany, the land of his birth, was slow to perceive, and slower to applaud that talent which, now that it has attained its full maturity, ranks among the greatest phenomena of the age. Some writers will have it that England is quicker to comprehend than to create. The reproach that we are a commercial country, and not an Art-country, is a standing subject with our neighbours. The English, say they, have no time to produce, and so, to cut the matter short, they purchase. It is a stale retort that our poets are the greatest poets, but it is a hard one to get over, nevertheless. In poetry, at least, we have no care to purchase—not even on the labour-exchange system of Robert Owen. True we have our periodical dearths, like the rest of the world, and we apprehend that the present moment is one of them. One small farmer, Alfred Tennyson, possesses the only stock of any value, and deals out morsels here and there to some poor labourers that still continue to dig in the soil of poesy. But it is not a time of dearth for our painters—at least for our landscape-painters, about whom the Germans and French may rail, if it so please them; for railing is one thing, and proving a fact is another. However, in music, we will give up the question for the present. Our time of plenty has not yet arrived—so there is time enough to wait for the dearth. Meanwhile let us go on purchasing. It will not be denied that we have been in the habit of purchasing the best materials; and out of these—selected, as they are, from all parts—we may one day make a stuff of our own, which, combining their most striking qualities, shall present a whole surpassing any of them.

But whatever may be said of England, it cannot be urged that her musicians do not appreciate Mendelssohn. The boasted Conservatoire of Paris is now only beginning to find that he is the greatest composer of his age—a fact that has been known to England for ten years and more. When, fifteen years ago, young Mendelssohn (that sounds more musical than “young Verdi”) came to England, with some MS. compositions, he immediately obtained a hearing from the Philharmonic Society, which has never been known to pass over the claims of the great foreign musicians when they have deigned to pay us a visit. His first symphony, in C minor, was played; his first pianoforte concerto was played, himself at the piano; his overture to “A Midsummer Night's Dream” was played—besides other works from his pen. Since then few opportunities have been neglected by the Philharmonic to make his works known, as soon as published, to the subscribers. On this point we can afford almost unqualified praise to the Society. We say almost, with a recollection of that disgraceful occurrence, some three summers past, when Mendelssohn, engaged to direct the last six concerts of the season, was insulted, on some miserable pretext, by certain members of the orchestra. It is not easy to forget such a stain upon our honour as a musical nation, and we must confess that it was with as much surprise as pleasure that we saw Mendelssohn's name announced in the advertisements of the concert we are about to review. Her Majesty and Prince Albert attended the concert, and it is to the taste of the latter illustrious personage, we understand, that we are indebted for the following magnificent programme:—

It is not to be wondered at that the room was crowded, and that the anti-chamber off the right wing, so convenient, at times, to the directors, should have been open to the public, and crowded, too. To have rendered this programme unassailable, the duet from the Stabat Mater should have been omitted; it was unworthy enrolment in such a catalogue of chef d'œuvres.

The symphony of Beethoven was admirably played, on the whole. The rallentando of the second subject in the Allegro was well managed by Signor Costa. The intermezzo in B flat was played with great delicacy, and just at the proper speed. It was encored, but not repeated, the presence of Majesty involving a certain etiquette, more to be admired for its loyal intention than for its musical feeling. The Minuet and Finale went excellently. This symphony was considered by Beethoven as one of his best, and we entirely sympathise with his preference. It is a song from beginning to end. The best part of Rossini's duet was the cadence of the Misses Williams.

It will be recollected by the readers of the Musical World, that Mendelssohn played the G concerto of Beethoven, three years ago, at the Philharmonic. For our opinion of the work, and of the player quoad his interpretation of it, we refer those who care about it, to our review on that occasion. Here we have only space to say that all we felt then, we felt doubly on Monday night, and in recording the fact, we would fain double our expressions of enthusiasm, but that language fails us. In a word, it was the most transcendent performance we ever listened to; in a word, the concerto is the loveliest of Beethoven's concertos; in a word, Mendelssohn is the greatest pianist in the world.

Miss M. Williams was very effective in the clever and expressive song of the old maestro, Rossi, scored for the orchestra with great ability by Signor Costa, and the overture to Euryanthe went like a whirlwind; but not like a musical performance. The Times found many parts of it “inarticulate,” and many parts of it “a scramble.” We must confess that though, like Jezabels courtiers in Elijah, “we heard it with our ears,” we could not distinguish, except in the slow rhapsody con sordini, the coupe of a single passage for the stringed instruments. This is called energy by some critics. We cannot find a word that suits it so entirely as the Fudge of Goldsmith's Birchall, in the Vicar of Wakefield.

All that was in the second part of the Concert has been criticised by us over and over again. To add a word to the masterly analysis of the A minor symphony, from the pen of Mr. Macfarren, which our readers will remember in the series of papers published under the head of The Estimator, would be an act of presumption, of which we should be sorry to be guilty. All that can be said of that brilliant and magnificent work—the orchestral triumph of Mendelssohn—is there set forth with a power of reasoning and a felicity of diction beyond our ability to emulate. It is enough to say, that this and the selections from the gorgeous and picturesque music of “A Midsummer's Night Dream” were performed to admiration; the occasional mistakes, and the prevalent want of finish in some of the principal wind-instruments, forming the sole drawbacks to the general excellence. But we are in too good humour with the general performance to stop to specify this in detail. A word or two in conclusion, however, would not be out of place, here, in respect to our notion of the difference between the mode of conducting adopted by Signor Costa and Dr. Mendelssohn, but that “comparisons are odorous.”

THE AFFINITIES.

PART II.—CHAPTER XI.

The narrator made a pause, or rather had already finished, when he could not help remarking that Charlotte was in the highest degree moved. She even rose, and with a silent apology, left the room, for the story was familiar to her. The event had actually occurred to the captain and a female neighbour,—not exactly as the Englishman had told it, but it had not been altered in the principal features, only having been finished, and embellished in the details, as generally happens with stories of the kind, when they pass first through the mouth of the multitude, and afterwards through the fancy of an ingenious and tasteful master. At last nearly all and nothing remain as they were.

Otilia followed Charlotte, as the two friends themselves desired, and the lord, now in his turn, remarked that perhaps a fault had been again committed, and that something known to the family, or connected with it, had been narrated. "We must take care," he said, "to do no more mischief. In return for the good and pleasant things we enjoy here, we seem to bring the lady-residents little happiness. We will endeavour to take leave in a becoming manner."

"I must own," said his companion, "that I am rivetted here by another circumstance, without the explanation and closer knowledge of which, I should be unwilling to leave the house. Yesterday, my lord, when we went through the park with the portable camera obscura, you were too much occupied in selecting a truly picturesque point of view to remark anything else which was taking place. You turned out of the high road, to arrive at a rarely penetrated spot by the lake, which presented you a charming vis-à-vis. Otilia, who accompanied us, did not wish to follow, but asked to go to the place in a boat. I seated myself in the boat with her, and took delight in the skill of the fair navigator. I assured her, that since I had left Switzerland, where the most charming girls convey us on the water, I had not been so agreeably rocked in the waves. At the same time, I could not forbear asking her, why in fact, she had refused to take that side-path; for certainly, in shunning it, she had shown a sort of painful embarrassment. "If you will not laugh me out of countenance," she answered kindly, "I can give you some information on the subject, although even with respect to myself, some mystery prevails. I have never entered that by-way, without a peculiar shudder, which I never feel elsewhere, and which I cannot explain to myself. I therefore rather avoid exposing myself to such a sensation, especially as it is immediately followed by a head-ache on the left side, from which I repeatedly suffer." We landed, Otilia conversed with you, and I, in the meanwhile, looked out for the spot, which she had plainly pointed out to me from a distance. But how great was my surprise, when I discovered a very evident trace of coal, which convinces me, that with some digging, a fertile stratum might perhaps be found, at a certain depth.

"Pardon me, my lord; I see you smile, and know very well, that as a wise man and a friend, you merely regard with forbearance, my passionate interest for these matters, in which you have no faith; but it is impossible for me to depart hence without making the lovely girl try the vibrations of the pendulum."

When once this matter came under discussion, the lord was sure to repeat his opposing reasons, which the companion heard with modesty and patience, but still, in the end, adhered to his own opinion and wishes. He also repeatedly declared, that the matter was not to be given up, because such experiments did not succeed with anybody, but should on that very account, be considered more seriously and profoundly, for then certainly would be revealed many relations and affinities of inorganic beings among each other, and of organic beings with respect to them, and also among each other, which are now concealed from us."

He had already spread out his apparatus of gold rings, marcasites, and other metallic substances, which he always carried with him in a handsome box, and let down for experiment, pieces of metal, which vibrated upon threads, over other metals, which were laid beneath. "I concede to you, my lord," he said, "the wicked pleasure, which I read in your face, because with me, and for me, nothing will stir. My operation is, however, only a pretext. When the ladies return, they will be anxious to know what strange things we are about."

The ladies returned. Charlotte understood at once what was going on. "I have heard much of such things," she said, "but have never seen an operation. Since you have got all so neatly laid out, let me try whether it will not succeed with me."

She took the thread in her hand, and since she was in earnest, held it steadily, and without any mental emotion, but not the slightest vibration was to be observed. Then Otilia was invited. She held the pendulum still more calmly, dispassionately, and unconsciously, over the metals beneath. But at the instant, the suspended body was carried on in a decided whirl, and, accordingly as the pieces below were moved, turned now to one side, now to another, now in circles, now in ellipses, or took its swing in a straight line, so as to equal, nay surpass all the expectations of the companion.

The lord himself was somewhat struck, but with the other, there was no end of desire and curiosity, and he kept demanding a repetition and multiplication of the experiments. Otilia was obliging enough to consent to his wishes, until she at last, kindly besought him to release her, as she was again attacked by the head-ache. He amazed, nay transported, assured her with enthusiasm, that he would perfectly cure her of this malady, if she would trust his method. For a moment, they were in a state of uncertainty, but Charlotte, who quickly understood of what they were talking, refused the well-meant offer, because she was not disposed to suffer, in her society, that for which she had always felt a strong apprehension.

The strangers had departed, and although they had produced emotions of a singular kind, they left the wish behind them, that they would be found somewhere again. Charlotte now employed the fine days to return visits in the neighbourhood, which she could scarcely bring to a conclusion, since the whole country round, some from true sympathy, some from mere custom, had hitherto concerned themselves about her. At home she was enlivened by the sight of the child, which was certainly worthy of every love and every care. It was looked upon as a wondrous, nay, miraculous child, extremely charming to the eyes, from its size, symmetry, strength, and health, and what created still more surprise, was that double resemblance, which developed itself more and more. In features, and in the whole form, the child became more and more like the captain, while the eyes differed less and less from the eyes of Otilia.

Led on by this strange affinity, and perhaps, still more by the fine feeling of women, who with tender affection, embrace the child of a beloved man, even if another has borne it, Otilia was as much as a mother to the growing creature, or rather another kind of mother. If Charlotte retired, Otilia remained alone with the child and the nurse. Nanny, jealous of the boy, on whom alone her mistress seemed to bestow her affections, had left her for some time, in a refractory mode, and had returned to her parents. Otilia continued to carry the child into the open air, and accustomed herself to walk to a greater and greater distance. She had with her the milk bottle, to give the child its aliment when required. She seldom failed to take a book with her at the same time, and thus reading and wandering with the child on her arm, she made a very graceful Penserosa.

PART II.—CHAPTER XII.

THE chief object of the campaign had been attained, and Edward, crowned with marks of honour, left the service with glory. He at once betook himself to the little estate, where he heard accurate intelligence of his family, whom without their observing or knowing it, he had caused to be closely watched. His quiet abode appeared to him most charming, for during his absence, much had been arranged, improved, and advanced according to his orders, so that the laying out, and the environs, made up by that which was internal, and might be immediately enjoyed, for what was wanting in length and breadth.

Edward, accustomed by a more hurried course of life, to more decisive steps, now proposed to carry out the plan, which he had had sufficient time to consider. First of all he called the major.* The joy at the meeting was great. Youthful friendships, like family ties, have the important advantage that errors and misunderstandings, of whatever kind they may be, never inflict a fatal injury upon them, and that the old relation is always restored after a time.

In his joyous greetings, Edward asked after his friend's circumstances, and learned how perfectly fortune had favoured him according to his wishes. In a half-jesting confidential tone, Edward then asked, whether a good alliance was not in a state of progress? His friend answered in the negative, with significant seriousness.

"I cannot, and may not keep back anything," continued Edward, but must communicate to you my feelings and plans. You know my passion for Otilia, and have long understood that it was she who plunged me into this campaign. I do not deny that I wished to get rid of a life, which without her, was no longer useful to me, but I must, at the same time confess, that I could not make up my mind utterly to despair. Happiness with her, was so beautiful, so desirable, that it was impossible for me to renounce it entirely. So many consolatory forebodings, so many cheering signs, had confirmed me in the belief—in the fancy, that Ottilia could be mine. A glass, marked with our initials, and thrown into the air, when the stone was laid, was not broken to pieces; it was picked up, and is again in my hands. ‘Thus of myself,’—I cried, when I had passed so many delightful hours in this solitary spot,—‘of myself will I make an omen, in the place of this glass, to try whether an union is possible or not. I will go and seek death, not as a madman, but as one who hopes to live. Ottilia shall be the prize for which I fight; she, it shall be, whom behind every hostile array, within my trench, within every besieged fortress, I hope to conquer. I will do wonders with the desire of being spared,—with the view of gaining Ottilia, not of losing her.’ These feelings have guided me, have assisted me through all dangers, and now I feel myself as one who has reached his goal, who has surmounted all obstacles, and in whose way nothing more is standing. Ottilia is mine, and whatever lies between this thought and the execution of it, I cannot look upon as of any importance.”

“With a few strokes,” replied the major, “you cancel all that could and should be advanced against you, and yet it must be repeated. I leave it to yourself to call back your relation to your wife, with all its force, but you owe it to her and to yourself, not to mystify yourself on this point. How can I think that a son is given you, without declaring, at the same time, that you are born for each other, that for the sake of this being, you are bound to live together, that united, you may provide for his education and future welfare.”

“It is a presumption on the part of parents,” answered Edward, “when they fancy that their existence is so necessary for their children. Every living thing finds nourishment and assistance, and if the son, after the early death of the father, has not so easy, so commodious a period of youth, he gains perhaps, on this very account, a more rapid training for the world, by a timely conviction that he must accommodate himself to others—a lesson which indeed, sooner or later, we all must learn. Besides, there is no question of this sort. We are rich enough to provide for several children, and it is by no means duty or kindness to heap so many benefits upon one head.”

When the major thought, with a few traces, to recall Charlotte’s value, and Edward’s long attachment to her, Edward hastily interrupted him: “We have committed a folly, which I but too plainly see. He, who at a certain age, wishes to realize the earlier wishes and hopes of youth, always deceives himself; for every period of ten years in a man’s life, has its own happiness, its own hopes and views. Woe to him, who is tempted by circumstances or by fancy, to grasp either backwards or forwards. We have committed a folly; shall it then be for a whole life? Shall we, from any kind of scruple, deny ourselves that, which the social usages* of the time do not refuse us. In how many things does a man retract his intentions or his acts, and is that not to take place just in this instance, when the question is about the whole, and not about a matter of detail—not about this or that condition of life, but about the whole structure of life.”

The major did not fail to represent to Edward, in a manner as skillful as it was impressive, his different relations to his wife, to the families, to the world, to his property, but he did not succeed in exciting any sympathy.

“All this, my friend,” replied Edward, “has passed before my mind in the midst of the tumult of battle, when the earth was trembling with the continuous thunder, when the balls whizzed by, when my comrades fell down right and left, when my horse was shot and my hat pierced,—it has passed before me by the silent watch fire, beneath the starry vault of heaven. Then did all my ties pass before my mind. I have thoroughly thought them over—felt them. I have weighed my whole position, have repeatedly, and now for ever, come to terms with myself.

“In such moments, how can I conceal it; you also were present—you also belonged to my circle; indeed, have we not for a long time belonged to each other? If I have owed you anything, I have now come to the position of paying it with interest; if you have ever owed me anything, you are now in a condition to make it good. I know that you love Charlotte, and she merits it. I know that you are not indifferent to her, and why should she not recognize your worth? Receive her from my hand—conduct me to Ottilia, and we are the happiest persons on earth.”

Just because you would bribe me with such precious gifts,” replied the Major, “I must be the more circumspect and rigid. This proposal, which I silently respect, instead of making the matter more easy, rather renders it more difficult. The question now concerns me as well as yourself, concerns both the destiny, and the good name and honour of two men, who, hitherto without reproach, run the risk, by this strange act—not to call it otherwise—of appearing to the world in a very singular light.”

“The very fact that we are without reproach,” returned Edward, “gives us a right to allow ourselves to be reproached for once. He, who during his whole life, has shown himself a man to be relied on, also inspires confidence with respect to an act, which in others would appear equivocal. As for what concerns me, I feel by the last trials which I have imposed upon myself, and by the arduous, perilous deeds I have done for others, justified in doing something for myself also. As for what concerns you and Charlotte, let us leave it to the future, but as for me, neither you, nor any one else, will restrain me from my project. If a hand is offered me, I am ready to do anything, but if I am left to myself, or opposed, an extremity must arise, come what will.”

The Major deemed it his duty to resist Edward’s plan as long as possible, and he now employed a dexterous turn against his friend, by seeming to comply, and only discussing the form and business routine, by which this separation and these unions were to be effected. So much that was unpleasant, troublesome, unseemly then presented itself, that Edward felt himself put into the worst humour.

“I see,” he at last exclaimed, “that what one desires must be taken by storm, not only from enemies, but also from friends. That which I wish, which is indispensable to me, I keep firmly in sight. I will seize it, and assuredly soon and readily. Relations of the sort, I well know, are not destroyed and formed without the fall of much that already stands, without the yielding of much that would keep firm. Such a matter is not brought to an end by consideration; to the understanding, all rights are alike, and an equipoise can always be placed in the rising scale. Resolve therefore, my friend, to act for me, for yourself—for yourself, for me, to disentangle, solve, and unite anew our positions. Do not let yourself be restrained by any considerations; we have already made the world talk about us; it will talk about us once more, and then, like every thing else which ceases to be new, forget us, and let us do as we can, without giving itself any further concern about us.”

The Major had no other expedient, and was at last forced to allow Edward to treat the affair, once for all, as something admitted and pre-supposed, while he discussed in detail, how all was to be arranged, and dilated upon the future in the cheerfullest mood, even in jest.

Then again becoming serious and thoughtful, he continued thus:—“If we resigned ourselves to the hope, the expectation that all would come right again of its own accord, that chance would favor and conduct us; it would be culpable self-delusion. In this way, it would be impossible to save ourselves, and restore peace on all sides, and how could I console myself, when I, though innocently, am guilty of all? By my own urgency, I prevailed on Charlotte to take you into the house, and Ottilia only came among us in consequence of this alteration. We are no longer masters over that which has resulted, but we are masters so far, as we can render it harmless, and make the relations conduce to our own happiness. If you turn away your eyes from the beautiful and kindly prospects which I open; if you impose upon yourself, and upon us all, a sad self-denial, as far as you think it possible, as far as it may be possible; even then, if we purpose to return to our old condition, must we not transfer with us, much that is unseemly, inconvenient, and annoying, without anything good or cheering resulting from it? Would the prosperous condition, in which you find yourself, afford you any joy, if you were hindered from visiting me,—from living with me? And after what has passed, it would be more and more painful. Charlotte and I, with all our property, would only find ourselves in a melancholy situation. And if, with other men of the world, you believe that years, that absence, will blunt such feelings, will efface marks so deeply engraven, the question is about those very years, which we wish to pass, not in pain and self-denial, but in joy and comfort. And at last, to speak out what is most important, even if we, from our own external and internal condition, should be able to expect this, what would become of Ottilia, who would be forced to quit our house, to do without our care in society, and painfully to make her way through the cold, accursed world? Depict to me, a situation, in which Ottilia, without me, without us, could be happy, and then you will have uttered an argument, stronger than any other, and which even if I do not grant it, and cannot conform with it, I will readily think over, and consider anew."

This problem was not so easy to solve, at least no sufficient answer occurred to the Major, who could only repeatedly inculcate his opinion, how important, how critical, and in many senses, how hazardous the whole project was, and that at least, the most serious deliberation was required, as to how it should be commenced. Edward submitted, but only on the condition, that his friend would not leave until they had come to a perfect agreement as to the affair, and the first steps had been taken.

SONNET.

No. XXXII.

Surely the whole of life is dull and drear,
Except the moments love has call'd his own,
Making them by a glitt'ring halo known,
So that they ever shine to mem'ry dear.
These moments are small isles of radiance clear,
Scantily o'er the broad dark ocean strown;
On them the heart, by raging billows thrown,
May rest awhile, and gain new strength to bear.
The moment, when thou said'st that thou wert mine,
The moment, when thy smile most softly beam'd,
The moment, when our lips most fondly met,
The moment, when thou took'st my hand in thine,
The moment, when those eyes most brightly gleam'd—
Let me remember these,—all else forget.—N. D.

LETTERS UPON MUSICAL ART.

No. I.

Music, as an art, having now taken a high, and I doubt not, permanent position amongst us, a few reflections upon its purposes as an element of civilisation, in order that the true mission of the artist be understood and his calling respected, may not be out of place. Firstly, it is necessary to regard the art of music, not as a gratification of mere sensual feeling, but a thing of higher and holier influence, emanating from and addressing itself to the heart. Music of the highest order is the very soul of poetry. "Geist fordr'ich vom Dichter aber die Seele spricht nur Polyhymnia aus." The voice of genius in every art is still the voice of truth, and all truth can emanate but from one source, the soul; and the work, if true, is as imperishable as the soul itself. It is necessary to say thus much, because there are many short-sighted and prejudiced people in this country, who still persist in asserting that the fine arts are not only useless, but that their influence is even demoralising. To those persons I reply, that anything which refines and ennobles the mind must improve it, and anything which improves the mind must be useful. Everything which gives evidence of mind, as opposed to mere materialism, which reveals the combinations of ideal beauty which live only in the soul, and proves the existence of that divine faculty which we call inspiration, must be of a spiritual and even religious nature. That music is merely suggestive I do not attempt to dispute; on the contrary, I claim for it no higher privilege. But of what is it suggestive? Of ideas. But of what kind of ideas? They will depend upon the nature of the music itself. If the composer was inspired with elevated thoughts when composing, the same thoughts will inevitably be conveyed to the mind of the auditor. All works of art may be judged by the emotions and ideas they excite in the cultivated mind. In the first place, they must be true—that is, they must be the offspring of natural feeling. The artist must feel deeply before he can hope to strike the electric chain which connects the souls and sympathies of all mankind. Admitting, then, music, as an art, to be a powerful element of civilisation, does not its cultivation among us become a matter of public importance? Admitting that, in music, as in every other art, low class works tend to vitiate the public taste, and excite in the mind a low train of ideas, is it not of paramount importance that a high taste should be cultivated? People complain of the bad taste of the public! But what forms the public taste? In a country where music had never been heard, the people would not have a bad taste, but no taste at all. The bad taste of the public has been formed by the bad works of composers wanting in genius or conscience, and fostered by the musical ignorance and cupidity of theatrical managers and music publishers. "You must write for the million," say the "friends of art." Most true; but who are the writers for the million? Those small ephemera who are called into existence by a momentary ray of sunshine, soon to be withdrawn, or those whose works go down to the remotest posterity, and are the delight of all ages? Which of these are the writers for the million? Whose works gratify and instruct the greatest number? The true writers for the million are Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., and the writers for the few are so-called popular men of the day. But, "we must have tune," say the "friends of art." Most true; but let not the necessity of writing popular tunes be offered as an excuse for the display of artistic ignorance and vulgarity of mind. What tunes are more popular than those of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Rossini, Auber? But in these writers we have tune united to profound knowledge and elegance of expression. The progress which music has made of late in this country must be highly gratifying to every true lover of art. The progress it has made, in spite of the ignorance and ballad-mongering prejudices of publishers and theatrical managers—in spite of the exclusiveness of certain societies supposed to be national—in spite, "though last not least," of the absurd criticisms of certain newspapers—the art has kept the even tenour of its way, and is still progressing. A grand school of art is forming, in the only way in which it ever could or ever has been formed, by the study of the works of the great masters, and an investigation of the principles upon which they were written. The result of such an investigation is the knowledge of who the great men really are, and why they are great. In other words, what fine music really is, and in what it consists. If we pronounce a thing to be good, we must have some reason for doing so, and things must always be good for the same reason. If a symphony of Beethoven is said to be good, because it possesses all the finest qualities of music, any other work possessing the same amount of fine qualities must be equally, or, if it possess a portion only, relatively good. It is not mere contrapuntal skill, the melodic faculty, form, design, or any one quality that can make a composer truly great, but an assemblage of all, such as we find in the works of Handel, Haydn, &c. Much has been said about a "national school," and some of our young composers have been reproached by certain "eminent critics" with anti-national tendencies for endeavouring to emulate Mozart and Beethoven; these gentlemen, with much less wisdom than Solomon, are consequently much more difficult to satisfy; they must have something totally new, something in itself excellent, yet totally different to everything else that is excellent. Our composers are expected to produce fine works, but are still to be totally unlike Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., who are great, not because they were called Handel or Haydn, but because they have discovered the universal and immutable principles of the sublime and beautiful, and the secret of applying those principles to their art. But to those deluded beings who are suffering under this morbid veneration for the great masters, and are vapouring away their existence in endeavouring to emulate them, the advice of our "eminent art critics" is not wanting. One proposes that instead of emulating Mozart and Beethoven our composers should arrange their own national tunes after a new fashion, and that, says he triumphantly, would be English music, and lead to the formation of an English school! Another suggests writing in the manner of—that is, imitating—Shield, Arne, Calcott, &c., and that, also, would be original English music! It thus appears that when English writers imitate each other, imitation is not imitation; but if they imitate great foreign writers, imitation is imitation. The logic of this is curious. After all, what is meant by "nationality," "difference of schools," "English music," "French music," and "originality?" These fine deceptive words and imaginary distinctions can be of no use to the true progress of art, but rather tend to retard it. The aim of an artist must be to be great, and not national. Nationality in art means absolutely nothing. A work, to be great, must speak in the voice of universal and immutable truth to the higher soul-qualities and sympathies of mankind, which are the same everywhere. It cannot be circumscribed or bounded in its movements, it acorns the fetters of space or time. The only national feeling recognised in matters of art is that evinced by a people who support a native artist when he has produced a fine work, of which they feel proud, and which adds to the glory of their country. The "difference of schools" consists in nothing but the relative amount of fine qualities possessed by different writers; one is conspicuous for one fine quality, one for another, while the greatest works, possessing all the fine qualities are universal—of all schools and of no school. Originality or individuality of style in a work of art springs, not from studiously avoiding the works of other writers, as some have asserted, but from having studied them all deeply. Originality is nothing but the faculty of combining and throwing into new forms the materials with which the head is stored, and the images and impressions which the mind has received from the study of great works. Individuality of style should be termed universality, since it is nothing but the faculty of combining the most striking points of every work we may have studied, and throwing them into new forms. Without all this it would be possible to produce something "very original," but certainly not a work of art, as all experience demonstrates. I have said there is a right feeling amongst our young composers, which must inevitably lead to great results; but I am afraid there is a very bad one amongst those persons whose duty it is to foster and encourage their genius. Let me not be supposed to join in the "native talent" cry, which I consider very ridiculous, and calculated to do more harm than good. An artist is not to be upheld merely because he is English, but because he is eminent in his art; if he cannot stand his ground against foreign writers, then let the foreign writers have the preference. I ask for justice, and not favour; it cannot be urged that there is any want of encouragement on the part of the public, for whenever any work by an English writer is brought before them, they receive it generally better than it deserves. No; the true enemies to the progress of music in England are chicanery, ballad-mongering, and conventionalism, of which more anon.

HOWARD GLOVER.

JENNY LIND AND MR. BUNN.

THE following letter appeared in the Times of Thursday. As any thing respecting the "Swedish Nightingale" seems at this moment to be engrossing the sympathies of the entire musical world, the letter will doubtless be acceptable to the great majority of our readers.

"Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, April 19:

"Mademoiselle, — Up to the present moment of your arrival in England, the losses occasioned me by your violation of the contract you entered into with me are unrepaired, and the misrepresentations under which I have suffered, remain unrefuted; the result of my long and expensive journey to Berlin to effect the engagement you there signed, ending thus far in your being the gainer of a princely income from another theatre, and I the complete victim.

"Without any motive but the proper vindication of my rights, without doing any injury, or committing any offence to others, I have been mercilessly assailed week after week, by the adherents of that theatre, and the common privilege of self-defence altogether denied me.

"It is true that towards the reparation of these losses you have offered me 2000*l.*, and that as respects the pecuniary question between us, I have accepted that offer; but as it was, and is, of moment to me that the cause of your repudiation of your engagement with me should no longer be misrepresented, I required you, in my letter of the 16th of last month, to sing three times at this theatre. You have not answered this letter, and I beg, therefore, to say that, in order to prove to you this proposal was not a merely interested one, I will be satisfied, instead of those three representations, with your written assurance that you were not deterred from appearing on the Drury-lane stage by any other motive than the one assigned in your letter of October 17, 1845, wherein, on asking me to cancel our agreement, you offered me ample indemnification should you ever appear at Her Majesty's Theatre.

"I make this final proposal to restore our former good understanding, to avoid further litigation, and to dispense with any further public discussion—of course without prejudice.

"I have the honour to be, Mademoiselle,

"Your obedient humble servant,

"Mademoiselle Jenny Lind.

"A BUNN."

We sincerely hope that Mr. Bunn may receive the £2000 he has condescended to accept; that Jenny Lind may shake hands with the Manager of Drury Lane, after complying with the requests contained in the above epistle, and that the long disagreement may end happily and satisfactorily to all parties.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, and Prince Albert Edward, attended a morning performance at this theatre on Thursday. The Royal children manifested great delight at the sight of the elephants, camels, and splendid troop of cavalry used in the procession.

PRINCESS'S.—A full, but by no means a crowded auditory, assembled at this house on Monday evening to witness the return of Mrs. Butler (Fanny Kemble) to the stage, after a retirement of fourteen, or sixteen years. The play of The Hunchback was announced, Mrs. Butler taking her original part, Julia. Mr. Creswick, from the Theatre Royal, Dublin, and late of the Sadler's Wells, was specially engaged for the part of Master Walter, and Mr. J. Webster, also from the Sadler's Wells, was engaged for the part of Sir Thomas Clifford. The cast of characters was somewhat strong. Besides Mrs. Butler, and the two gentlemen just named, in the three leading personages of the drama, we had Mrs. Stirling in Helen, Compton in Modus, J. Vining in Lord Tinsel, Ryder in Heartwell, C. Fisher in young Lord Rochdale, and Cowell in Fathom. As the stage is now furnished, this was really a capital cast of parts, and we have seldom seen The Hunchback better performed as a whole. The entrance of Mrs. Butler was the signal for a tremendous burst of applause, which lasted for upwards of two minutes. The lady seemed completely overcome, and could hardly proceed with the first words she had to address to Helen. Mrs. Butler's first scene impressed neither ourselves, nor, apparently, the audience, with the most favourable sentiments towards the actress. Mrs. Butler's appearance is not improved since last we beheld her on the boards of Covent Garden theatre in the zenith of her youth and her fame. Time and the canker, care, have been busy with her, and their traces are but too apparent in a small theatre like the Princess's. She is evidently not so much at her ease as she used to be, and her attitudes, which were never graceful, are now rigid, enforced, and angular. In her playful scenes with Helen, Mrs. Butler exhibited too much artifice, and produced but a feeble impression on the audience. Throughout the two first acts, and a portion of the third, the fair artist did not display any proof of those extraordinary talents which would warrant her in demanding one hundred pounds a night for a performance; and the majority of the spectators, who came to behold something very wonderful, were manifestly disappointed. Not that during this time Mrs. Butler did not occasionally show her great capabilities, and exhibit the energy and feeling, added to the nice and delicate discrimination in embodying the various emotions of the poor bewildered Julia, for which formerly she obtained so much renown, and which placed her above all other actresses of the day; but there was so much want of ease, grace, and nature in the level passages, so much affectation of attitude, and so much effort in the bye play, that the public would have lost all interest in the performance, were it not that they were upheld by the prestige of a great name, and were urged to further attention by those occasional glimpses of power that broke through the surrounding darkness like flashes of lightning. In the fourth act the audience were literally taken by surprise. Here the tragic actress found herself in her true region of passion, and felt herself inspired, as though she were a Pythoness standing on her tripod. From the moment she enters, exclaiming, "What's to be done?" to her interview with Master Walter, when he leads her out half fainting in his arms, the acting of Mrs. Butler was worthy of a great artist. Here all affectation was thrown aside: no effort was made to look particularly graceful, or particularly attractive in glance or attitude; but nature stood paramount, and tore all conventionalities away, giving place to feeling the most impulsive, and passion the most real. We have never witnessed on the stage anything more life-like, more fearfully earnest, and more powerful than Julia's warning to Master Walter against plunging her into a marriage with Lord Rochdale, as given by Mrs. Butler on Monday evening. It was worthy the best acting of Mrs. Siddons, in her best days. Through the whole of this scene the actress was superlatively great, and the applause she wrung from the spectators was as enthusiastic as any of the kind we have heard at this theatre, or indeed elsewhere. She was equally fine in the last act, leaving nothing to the critic to award but praise and admiration. Mr. Creswick, who made his first appearance here, played Master Walter excellently, exhibiting sound judgment, and a nice appreciation of the various phases of the character he personified. An occasional tendency to rant, in passages that required no violent display whatsoever, was the only charge we can lay to his performance. Mrs. Stirling was very happy in Helen, playing the part with infinite naïveté and spirit, and looking both natural and winning in the extreme. The scene with Modus, in the last act, where she entices him to a declaration of love, was, mayhap, a little too forward for the maiden, who, however wild, is still gentle at heart, and who is merely induced to turn wooer from the sheer simplicity of her lover. Compton, though dressed somewhat extravagantly, was admirable as Modus, and played the part as the author himself would have loved to witness. The character, nevertheless, is sufficiently preposterous, and exhibits in Mr. Sheridan Knowles that idiosyncrasy of portraiture in which he delights to indulge when he draws gentle maidens as wooing and winning the merest simpletons. It is no complement to the fair sex to make them fall in love with fools, but when to the falling in love there is added an exhibition of importunate courtship on their part, our feelings are forcibly constrained from all sympathy with them, however vividly and dramatically their characters may be delineated. It is poor excuse for an author that it is nature who errs. Woman, in the higher walks of comedy, should be represented as she ought to be, not as she is, or else the moral is pointless. Nothing could be better than Mr. Vining's Lord Tinsel. In all the extravagance of the part, he never once overstept the bounds of decorum. Of Mr. J. Webster's Sir Thomas Clifford, as we cannot offer one word in praise, we shall say nothing. The part is difficult, and demands from the actor requisites bodily and mental, to which Mr. J. Webster can lay no claim. The small part of Fathom was very well played by Mr. Cowell. Mrs. Butler was called for at the end, and was received with the most vociferous cheers; and subsequently Mr. Creswick and Mr. Compton were summoned, both of whom gained hearty applause. The scenery and dresses were excellent. Taking it altogether, The Hunchback was as well performed as any piece that has been produced at the Princess's.

Mrs. Butler made her second appearance in Romeo and Juliet on Wednesday. The character of Juliet requires still greater variety of qualification in the actress than that of the heroine in The Hunchback. It further demands more intensity of passion, and a loftier poetical conception. In the passion and the conception Mrs. Butler rose with her author, but she failed to vivify those delicate and almost evanescent traits which distinguish Juliet from all other dramatic heroines. In the earlier scenes of the play, the actress did not fulfil our highest expectations. She was too formal and studied in her playful scenes, and the same faults of attitudinizing we have noticed in her Julia, were still more observable in Juliet. Mrs. Butler can by no means assume the girl with ease and grace, and her looks and bearing no longer possess that juvenility which threw such a halo round her performance when she first appeared on the stage. Redundancy of action another fault in the actress which we did not remark on Monday night. This was noticeable in the balcony scene, where every metaphor and simile was illustrated by some motion of the hand, or some conventional posture, which reminded us of our own declamatory flourishes in our school-boy performances. Was the heaven mentioned—Mrs. Butler pointed significantly upwards: was her love alluded to—a deep pressure on the heart conveyed the sentiment: was fear or doubt hinted at—a deliberate shake of the head elucidated the feeling. All told too plainly that the actress imbibed no sympathy from the scene, and thought more of exhibiting her art, than of following the dictates of nature. We have summed up all the faults of Mrs. Butler's Juliet, we shall now notice its excellencies, which were indeed of the highest order. From the moment when Juliet hears of Tybalt's death to the closing scene of the tragedy, Mrs. Butler was grand and impressive. The speech to the Friar, "Oh, bid me leap, rather than marry Paris," was given with fine judgment and energy; and the scene where she takes the potion was wrought with a power and reality scarcely surpassed in our memory. Still finer was her scene—a previous one—with the Nurse, when the latter recommends her to marry Paris, now that Romeo was banished for ever from Verona. It was exquisitely beautiful and truthful in the extreme. Mrs. Butler's look of mingled horror at the request, and despair at being deserted by her last mainstay in her earthly affliction, was depicted with a fearful reality, to which no words can do adequate justice. Here the great artist stood pre-eminent, and asserted her supremacy in the grander walks of tragedy. The death scene formed a splendid climax to the performance. Our impression, upon witnessing Mrs. Butler in the two characters in which she has now appeared, is, that the actress has decidedly mistaken her forte, and that her true power lies in the sterner and loftier ranges of the tragic drama, and not in the softer and more juvenile. She has yet to be seen in parts which will bring out her genius in its real force. In Lady Macbeth, Constance, Queen Katherine, and characters of that kind, Mrs. Butler, we have little doubt, would, from sympathy and physical capability, create an immense sensation in the dramatic world. The fair actress, should she read our humble, but honest criticism, may not receive our notice in a complimentary light, but we are assured we speak the wholesome truth; and we feel confident, if Mrs. Butler would follow our suggestion, she would have to thank us, lowly be it spoken, for our candour and our judgment. The other characters in the play were indifferently supported. Shakspeare seemed a little above the power of the company. Mr. Creswick, who made a favourable impression in the earlier scenes of Romeo, by exhibiting taste and judgment, nullified the feeling entirely by his injudicious ranting in the more passionate parts of the character. His death was a complete burlesque. Mr. J. Vining, as Mercutio, was light and buoyant enough, but failed to delineate the petulance and fire appertaining to the part. Of the remainder of the characters, nothing occurs to us to speak. Mrs. Butler received repeated bursts of applause during the performance, and, as a matter of course, was called for at the end, amid great acclamations. The house was full and fashionably attended. A more elegant or discriminating audience we have seldom observed at any theatre. The play of Romeo and Juliet was listened to throughout in breathless attention. The last scene, thanks to the good example set forth by Miss Cushman at the Haymarket, and the applause that ensued thereupon, was restored in all its purity and simplicity from the text of Shakspeare.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Of all the pieces in the repertoire of Mademoiselle Rose Chéri, none has pleased us so much as La Belle et La Bête. A piece that hangs with her cannot be a good piece, with the proviso, of course, that the part be adapted to her powers; but it does not at all follow, because she is successful and enthusiastically applauded, that the piece is good. In the present case, the authors, Messrs. Bayard and Varner, our French friends, invariably hunt in couples, have admirably understood the forte of Mademoiselle Rose Chéri, which lies more in the gentle, unpretending, placid display of those softer emotions of the soul, which charm and sooth the heart, whilst they elevate the mind and impart to it a feeling of kind and genial benevolence, than in violent action or forced and exaggerated sentiments. They have been more fortunate than M. Scribe in this respect, especially in his Irène; or, Le Magnétisme, having sought for no complicated situation, no clap-trap, or quackery, but have applied themselves to one of those ordinary, every-day occurrences, which bring forth, in broad relief, the purest and most sacred feelings of our nature. Fraternal love, the sacrifice of a sister, who, to save her brother from dishonour, consents to live under the roof of a violent and surly misanthropist, and by her gentleness and modesty so works upon his rude and rugged temper as entirely to change his nature, and metamorphose the bear into a being assimilated to herself. Such is the theme chosen by the authors, worked out into a neat and clever two act comedy-vaudeville, and illustrated by Mademoiselle Rose Chéri and Monsieur Langeval, and, we may add, powerfully assisted in the details by Mdles. Duverger and Leyder, and Messrs. Duméry and Rhozevil. Mademoiselle Rose Chéri was listened to with breathless attention. From the moment she appeared to beg for her brother's pardon, she gained the same favour with the audience as with Vaucheron, the bête, when he begins to distinguish the exquisitely sweet tones of her voice and the beseeching language of her eyes, rudely ordering her sisters to stand aside, and commanding her to continue to speak. Even at this early stage her influence insensibly envelopes him, he is charmed by the witchery of her language and the transformation commences. Here he stipulates that she shall remain with him for one month, and when to save her brother she falls on her knees before him, and utters the words, "Je reste," the house fully appreciated the pathos and heroic resignation which she conveyed in these few words, and the curtain fell on the first act amidst a thunder of applause—to rise again, after a few seconds, for her to receive the congratulations and cheers of a delighted and grateful public. The second act presents Vaucheron as an altered man. By degrees she has induced him to confer benefits where he had intended to use violence and contumely, persuading him so gently and so artlessly, that the form is merely changed, although the intentions are the same, that we now feel assured she will be quite successful. His name formerly hated is now blessed, but the month has expired and she is about to leave him; but, on finding that her former lover had evinced suspicions of her conduct, she throws him off as unworthy of her and gives her hand and heart to the misanthropist. This scene was exceedingly well played by M. Langeval all through; his mute sorrow at the prospect of the solitude which awaited him, his passionate declaration of love and silent anguish at her refusal, and his speechless joy and gratitude when she alters her mind, were faithfully rendered. Decidedly, we have not seen this gentleman in any piece in which we like him so well. M. Duméry was very good as an oily-tongued flatterer, and M. Rhozevil, as the lover, was efficient and did his part with good taste. Mdle. Duverger deserves a word of praise to herself, she is decidedly pretty and piquante, and earned applause in the small part entrusted to her. La Mère de Famille, although not possessing the attractions of the piece we have just mentioned, is written in a kindly spirit, and met with well deserved success. In this play Mademoiselle Rose Chéri plays the part of an elder sister, to whom her mother on her death-bed has entrusted the care of her brothers and sisters. This she does most efficaciously, immolating her own affections to unite her sister to the man beloved by herself, and rescuing her brother from bad company, and elevating him to her own level. The solicitude of the sister, thus invested with maternal duties, was admirably portrayed by this great actress. Every sentiment, every word of advice or reproof, of praise or condemnation, all came from the heart, and struck a corresponding chord in the bosoms of all who listened to her. Mademoiselle Vallée played the part of Thérèse in her own graceful and unassuming style, and pleased us much, especially in the scene where she relates her love to her sister. M. Duméry was capital as the wild, rollicking, Parisian workman; his collection of songs, if not correct, was at any rate fluently rattled off; and his idea of going to Algiers and catching Abdel Kader, with a new triumphant march, in the style of Spontini, made the house ring with laughter. On Wednesday Mademoiselle Rose Chéri took her benefit, which we have no doubt fully answered her expectations, the house being crowded in every part. The only distinguishing feature was the part of Jeanneton, in the piece of Jeanne et Jeanneton, which, like everything she does, was perfection. M. Cartigny also created a favourable impression in a part hitherto filled by M. Lafont. He did not at all suffer by the comparison; this is saying a great deal. His Galuchet was a rich piece of comic acting. On Friday Mademoiselle Rose Chéri made her last courtesy for this season. Alas! that such a favourite should ever leave us.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday the performances commenced with Rossini's Italiana in Algeri, an opera, seldom performed than its merits (weighed in comparison with more popular and oftener heard works) demand. The Italiana is one of Rossini's earliest works. In style it closely resembles the operas of Cimarosa and the writers of his day, but it has not the continuous inspiration which characterizes the best productions of the composer of Il Matrimonio. The chief interest of the opera was centered in the fact of its introducing a third section of the Royal Italian Opera company—viz., the pure buffo. The debutantes were Signor Marini, a basso profundo, and Signor Rovere, a baritone of a peculiar kind. We are necessitated to be brief on this occasion, but we promise our readers a detailed account of L'Italiana on its next performance. Marini has a voice of exquisite quality and is a manly straight-forward actor; but he laboured under such evident indisposition that it would not be fair to pronounce an opinion of his merits until we have heard him a second time. Rovere is undoubtedly a man of talent, and sings more like a musician than any buffo of his class that we have heard. But his humour is, as yet, unintelligible to the English auditory, who are not sufficiently up to its peculiarities to appreciate it. But those capable of judging and there were many in the theatre, declare that he is one of the greatest artists of his class—and we are bound to believe them. We shall, nevertheless, take another occasion to pronounce a more decided opinion. Alboni, who sang the music originally executed in this country by Pisaroni, was perfection in all she had to do; and Salvi, in the tenor part, was not a whit less commendable. A Mdle. Angelini made a slight sensation in one of the subordinate parts—but of her also anon. The orchestra and choral were irreproachable. Alboni, Salvi, Rovere, and Marini, all re-appeared at the fall of the curtain. The Queen and Prince Albert were present, and the house was crowded in every part.

On Tuesday night the Lucia was repeated, the chief feature of the performance being Ronconi's Enrico, the artist who had entirely recovered from his indisposition, producing an impression upon his hearers altogether unexpected. Signor Ronconi, now that we may fairly proffer our opinions of him, is a very superior artist, both in a dramatic and vocal point of view. His voice is not remarkable for sweetness of tone, or roundness, but it has great power and compass, unusually great for a barytone, and in the mezza voce it is managed with exquisite taste. The reputation of Ronconi as a declamatory singer has long stood preeminent on the continent, and from this decision or judgment we see no reason to dissent, his singing on Tuesday evening fully entitling him to the place of honour awarded to him. He introduced the scena with Edgardo in the last act, in which the effective dramatic duet for tenor and bass takes place. This scena has been usually omitted. On this occasion both Salvi and Ronconi were recalled after the duet. The singing on both sides was very fine. Signor Ronconi was received throughout the performance with great applause, and had to answer to several recalls. He realized a veritable triumph. Madame Persiani appeared labouring under a slight cold, yet sung with her usual grace and finish, eliciting frequent bursts of applause. Signor Salvi was in fine voice, and rather increased our favourable impression on his first appearance. His death scena was beautifully given, his singing and acting both exhibiting the most superior taste and judgment. The house was crammed to excess.

On Thursday the Puritani was produced for the first time this season with a cast of characters not altogether consonant to the intention of the management. First of all it was announced with Grisi, Mario, Ronconi, and Tamburini for the principals. Then Ronconi gave way to Marini in Georgio; then the latter was taken ill, and at the last day, Tamburini undertook to play Georgio at a moment's notice, and Tagliafico, who had played Sir Richard in Paris, assumed Tamburini's part. And thus the Puritani was brought out on Thursday. Certainly the chief labor and responsibility of the evening rested on Tamburini's shoulders, who at a short notice volunteered to perform a character out of his line, and which he had never played before. But it would appear from the performance of Thursday night, that no part could come amiss to the great artist, or that no restriction of time could thwart his efforts, for his assumption of Georgio in the Puritani was as excellent as that of any part in which he had hitherto appeared. The manner in which he made up for the old man was admirable. Indeed so well was he disguised, or fashioned into the new character, that many did not recognise him for some time. His singing throughout the opera was very fine, and obtained for him on several occasions applause and bravos. Signor Tagliafico played Ricardo with taste and judgment. His appearance is much in his favor, and he treads the boards with perfect ease. His voice is a high barytone without much power, but not deficient in expression. Grisi was heartily welcomed when she appeared. Her Elvira, if not one of her grandest, is certainly one of her most beautiful performances. On Thursday night she sang and acted inimitably. The polacca was given with all exquisite grace and finish of old, and the "Qui la voce, was warbled and thrilled as divinely as ever. In the mac scene she appeared greater than we remember to have seen her. In this scene Grisi's acting and singing is far beyond anything we have seen on the modern stage. Mario was in fine voice, and appeared to great advantage as the elegant Cavalier: His Arturo is certainly the best since Rubini has retired. He was encored in "A te o cara," which he sung most beautifully, and also in the great scena in the last act, which he gave in such a manner as to rouse to enthusiasm the somewhat frigid audience of the Royal Italian Opera. More splendid and exquisitely finished singing we have seldom heard. The four artists were recalled at the end, and received with immense applause. The beautiful ballet, La Reine des Fees, still continues to be a great source of attraction. The graceful Dumilatre yet reigns the queen of the fairies, and surprises and delights the spectators with her ethereal movements, and her poses. The last pas of this delightful danseuse is one of those rare terpsichorean feats which excites by its novelty as well as its beauty. The manner in which Dumilatre bounds over the heads of her sister fairies is astonishing for its elegance, lightness, rapidity, and accuracy. To night a new change comes o'er the spirit of the Ballet at the Royal Italian Opera. Fanny Elssler is to make her first appearance in a new divertissement. To the great Fauny we shall devote an entire column or two next week.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE approaching debut of Mdle Jenny Lind, who has been announced for Tuesday evening next, makes all other doings at the Theatre for the present a matter of secondary interest. Our remarks this week, will therefore be sufficiently brief. We are, moreover, justified in this by the fact that there has been little or no novelty since our last. On Saturday the performances included L'Elisir d'Amore, a Divertissement for all the principal dancers, and the first tableau from Lalla Rookh. On Tuesday I due Foscari, a Divertissement, a selection from La Favorita, with Orithia. On Thursday, I Puritani, a Divertissement, a tableau from Lalla Rookh, and Coralia. In Puritani, Gardoni having recovered from his indisposition, sang with all his power and sweetness, and added to his already brilliant reputation. In the ballet department, a pas from the forgotten ballet of Rosida, for Cerito, St. Leon, &c.—a dance, called La Manola, for Cerito, and a new pas de deux for Rosati and Marie Taglioni, were the novelties and the attractions. We shall speak of these matters more at length in our next.

We omitted to mention that the quality of Balfe's band was tried one evening last week, by a performance of the overture to Der Freischutz. This was at Balfe's instigation, and the result was honourable, both to himself and his orchestra. It was a very fine performance, and the spirited and intelligent manner in which Balfe directed it, proved how thoroughly he was acquainted with the score, and how deeply he felt its beauties.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER, APRIL 28.

As the season in London advances, and musical celebrities are being weekly announced as having arrived from the Continent (until London is so full as it surely never was before of musical talent), we in the provinces are gradually closing our season. Even those quiet reunions, the Glee Clubs and the Madrigal Society, are having their final meetings and ladies' nights. The concluding concert for the season of the latter society was duly recorded in last week's Musical World. On Thursday the 22nd, the Gentlemen's Glee Club, had its dress concert, with which the season terminates. That of the Chorion-on-Medlock club takes ace this evening. The Hargreaves Society have one more concert to come off in May, a miscellaneous one; and then until September there is a barren interregnum, as to music meetings, unless it be that Jullien should appear like a meteor to dazzle us with some of his matchless solo players. The scheme of the Gentlemen's Glee Club being worthy of recording is here subjoined:—

FIRST PART.—Chorus, "Now to the forest," Str H. Bishop. Canon, "Within this panting breast," Beethoven. Glee, "Hohenlinden," T. Cook. Trio "Night's lingering shades are wasting," Dr. Spohr. Madrigal, "Now is the month of Maying," T. Morley, 1595. Quartet, "Oh! hills, oh! vales," Mendelssohn. Solo and Chorus, "My task is ended," Balfe.

PART SECOND.—Chorus, "From yonder dark forest what horseman advances?" Weber. Glee, "In this fair vale," Wm. Horsley, M. B. Glee, "Haste, my boy, the goblet bring," Dr. Smith, of Dublin. Solo and Chorus, "Methinks I hear," Dr. Croft. Trio, "Oh, listen! 'tis the nightingale," Str H. R. Bishop. Glee, "Cold is Cadwallor's tongue," Horsley. Chorus and Sextet, "Hail, happy day!" Beethoven.

There was a good attendance of ladies and gentlemen, but the club room was not so crowded as we have seen it on some former occasions. Mrs. Sunderland, who was to have appeared, but was in Scotland, we were told, so her place was supplied by Miss Kenneth, the other singers being the usual vocalists at the monthly meetings of the club. Beethoven's canon requires nice singing, and is very seldom heard to advantage out of its place in the opera. The same may be said of the closing piece, the glorious finale to Fidelio, which, in a Glee Club concert, loses so much in not having the splendid orchestral accompaniments. The glees selected were admirable specimens of their various schools, and were well sung. Still the concert went off heavily, with two exceptions—Morley's ever popular Madrigal, and Balfe's scena and chorus from the Enchantress, both of which were encored. There is a dress concert announced for Friday next, at the Concert Hall, when some of the recent German importations will be heard here for the first time; viz.—vocalists, Madame Jenny Lutzer, Madame and Herr Knispel, and Herr Holzel; solo violinists, Herr Hellmesberger, Herr G. Hellmesberger. Who they are, or what their fame or talent, we know not. Query—Are we to have a series of Jenny's, now that Jenny Lind has come at last to this country? as when Madame Anna Thillon made such a noise in the world, it afterwards brought us a Madame Anna Bishop. By the way, we should much like to see and hear the last named lady on the boards of our Theatre Royal. The production of operas last summer was not very successful—Acts and Galatea, which was splendidly got up, and fairly cast with Laffer as Polypheme, and Miss Isaacs as Acts, being a dead failure. The proprietors did better afterwards with Miss Rainforth, Allen, and Stretton, in Maritana; and with Thillon—the much and justly-praised Thillon, in the Crown Diamonds: but whether he will venture upon operas again remains to be seen; else, as we said before, we should like to see the Maid of Artois got up and Madame Bishop in it, in order that the sceptics in Manchester might have an opportunity of judging of her talents both vocal and instrumental. However, le bon temps viendra. Meantime the managers are reaping a rich harvest this week with Macready—crowded houses every night.

MR. BUNN AND DRURY-LANE.

THE following letter appeared yesterday in the Morning Chronicle. We have given it insertion in our leading columns, as we cannot separate matters operatic and musical from the management of Drury-lane, under Mr. Bunn:—

"SIR,—The committee of the Theatre Royal Drury-Lane had done me the honour of accepting me as their tenant on a renewed lease; but having been subsequently apprized that I stood in the way of overtures from others differing from me in their views of management, I have solicited them to open their property to competition, assuring them of my readiness to renew our negotiations when the course of such a step shall be known. "I have the honour to be your very faithful servant,
"London, April 27, 1847." "A. BUNN."

We are naturally anxious that the present management should continue to rule over Drury-Lane, as our national opera is mainly dependent thereon. Mr. Bunn is not the first lessee of the theatre who has been treated by the committee most scurvily.

GLASGOW MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

On Wednesday evening last the Musical Association, under distinguished patronage, gave their fourth grand annual concert in the City Hall; and whether as respects the pieces that were selected for the occasion, or the effective way in which these were interpreted by the Association themselves, or by the distinguished vocalists from a distance, who were engaged to appear, we have no hesitation in saying, the performance was, upon the whole, the best they have yet given.

The programme comprised Handel's oratorio of "Judas Maccabæus," and selections from the "Messiah;" from the Dettingen Te Deum, and the "Creation." The chorus was very effective. The fugues were all taken up with distinctness and precision; and in the tutti passages, which were given with remarkable spirit and firmness, the effect was overpoweringly grand. Of the solos it would be difficult to particularise any of them as having been better rendered than the rest. Mrs. Sunderland (soprano) gave most effectively the air, "O Liberty! thou choicest treasure," from the Judas Maccabæus, and the air from Haydn's Creation, "With verdure clad." The sweetness and rich mellowness of her voice were brought out in the air, "From mighty Kings." Miss Whittall, of Liverpool (contralto), gave, to great advantage, the air, "Father of Heaven;" and in the duet, "Oh! lovely Peace," with Mrs. Sunderland, both voices blended most charmingly, and produced a decided impression upon the audience. Mr. Peasall, of the Ancient Concerts and Lichfield Cathedral, who has a beautiful tenor voice of great compass, made his first appearance in this city, and made a very favourable impression: he gave Haydn's air, "In native worth," exquisitely. His "Sound no alarm," from the Judas Maccabæus, was excellent. We hope to have him here again. Signor Serra (basso), and Mr. Reeves (tenor) also executed creditably the pieces which were entrusted to them. Herr Dreschler, second violincellist, and chamber musician to his Highness the Duke of Anhalt-Deßau, gave a solo on the violoncello—he displayed great command of the instrument, but lacks the tone of Lindley.

We were glad to see the hall so well filled in every part, and hope that after paying the expenses, there will be a large surplus left for the public charities.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

JULLIEN AT DUBLIN.

To the Editor of "The Musical World."

SIR,—It appears to be the practice of some of the public journals, to take every opportunity of attacking M. Jullien, and by erroneous and exaggerated statements, endeavour to destroy the popularity he has so successfully acquired. For instance, what could be more unjust than the paragraph, which appeared in the Dublin papers, relative to the disturbance that took place in the Music Hall, on the second night of M. Jullien's Concerts? No doubt can exist as to the intention of the writer! What could it be but to traduce M. Jullien in the estimation of the public? fortunately his character is too well established to be undermined by such weak and futile attempts. From the liberal patronage the public have at all times bestowed on the enterprises of M. Jullien, clearly proves he must be a great and deserved favourite, and his character, so well known for honour and integrity, has gained him the respect and esteem of all those artistes, who have been connected with him during his professional career. The article, before referred to in the Dublin paper, is an excellent specimen of absurdity and incongruity, and might, from these causes, have passed harmlessly, while confined to its own limits: but, as several respectable journals have inserted in their columns, (no doubt with a belief in its authenticity), it is now high time the public should be no longer misled, but made acquainted with the true statement. As the old adage goes, "a story never loses by telling." This paragraph has received copious additions and embellishments which, if not contradicted, would tend greatly to injure M. Jullien; and, by doing so, must seriously affect a large portion of the musical profession, who are engaged by him for his concerts in town and country, as M. Jullien, from a consciousness of his own integrity, has obstinately refused (though urged by his friends), to vindicate himself against these untruths. The gentlemen of the orchestra, on that occasion, feel it incumbent on them, as a duty they owe M. Jullien, to come forward and exonerate him, by contradicting the statements of these would-be critics, who shield themselves behind their own privileges. The authenticity of the following statement is vouched by the undersigned gentlemen.—The concerts were held in the Music Hall, and to judge from the numbers there assembled, M. Jullien had not decreased in public favour. All appeared on the tip-toe of expectation for the appearance of the Lion of the evening, Herr Pischek, whose performance elicited the most rapturous applause. On the second night's performance, after his singing two more songs than he was advertised for, another encore ("The Standard Bearer,") was most vociferously demanded. On his leaving the orchestra, after singing the above song, M. Jullien hastened to inform him, of the wish expressed by the public for a repetition, and urged him, if not too much fatigued, to comply with their request. "Herr Pischek assured him of his utter inability to sing again, as he had exerted himself very much and had been suffering all the evening from severe indisposition," (the effects of the voyage) and said, "He felt most anxious to return to his hotel, requiring rest to recruit himself for the next day, when he had to sing at two concerts, a morning and an evening one."

After this explanation, M. Jullien returned to the audience to solicit their kind indulgence, but was unable to obtain a hearing. He then appealed to them by dumb show, to express Herr Pischek was ill and required rest; but, all of no avail, they were inexorable. M. Jullien then continued the concert trusting the audience would be pacified. The Olga valse was played without a note of the music being heard—it was a trial—Discord versus Harmony, in which the former succeeded, though trumpets and drums were played, fortissimo, they were unable to be heard through the din of discord, yells, and noises. In such a state of things it was impossible the concert could proceed, so M. Jullien, wisely, desisted; this appears to have been the signal for a preconceived attack from several persons, who had been noticed during the evening, expressing (without cause) symptoms of disapprobation. Numbers now rushed on the scaffold and in the scuffle music-stands were broken, a mirror shared the same fate, all was confusion; in fine, "a scene of disgraceful tumult." The gentlemen of the orchestra were obliged to make a hasty retreat to save themselves and their instruments from the missiles thrown from several parts of the house. The respectable portion of the audience were fast quitting the Hall, evidently alarmed and disgusted with the few disreputable persons who were the originators of this scene of outrage; with the assistance of the police the building was cleared and thus ended this eventful day. On the following morning, the paragraph complained of appeared, giving a most exaggerated and untrue account; amongst other things, stating: M. Jullien had said, that the disturbance of the previous evening was caused by the sixpenny mob, and that Herr Pischek would have sung again, but was prevented by M. Jullien. This M. Jullien denies; stating, it was very improbable he should speak in terms of disrespect of that large portion of the public, to whom he was indebted for his prosperity and success. At the evening concert the belligerents mustered, evidently coming prepared to attack, as an egg was thrown into the orchestra, which narrowly escaped befouling Herr Koenig. On M. Jullien appearing, he was assailed with vehement hisses; many who had been neutral on the former evening, now joined in the melee, evidently influenced by the erroneous statements circulated. M. Jullien came forward amidst cries of "No, no!" "Hear him," &c. He endeavoured to speak, but was interrupted by "Give us a song, Jullien!" from one, "How about the French soup!" from another. At last these facetious gentlemen fairly exhausted themselves, and M. Jullien, who had all this time stood with the patience of a martyr, smiling good-humouredly at their pleasant sallies, was enabled to give an explanation. After this, quiet was restored, and the concert proceeded, though a few persons endeavoured to irritate the audience by occasional hissing and noises. After Mr. Richardson's solo, a GENTLEMAN in the promenade, ("not one of the sixpenny mob!") threw an egg at M. Jullien, which struck him on the head; cries of "Shame, shame!" and "Turn him out!" was vociferated from all parts of the house, he was immediately seized, by some gentlemen in the promenade, who would, had it not been for the police, have severely chastised him on the spot; he was taken to the Station House, where he remained in durance vile, until Monday morning. Several gentlemen now surrounded M. Jullien, assuring him he need not fear, and expressing their strong disapprobation at such a disgraceful course of proceeding: they advised him, for the safety of the ladies present, to bring the concert to a termination. The cry, then was for Mackintosh (the renter of the hall), who responded to their call, and after their confusing him with a multitude of questions, they appeared to be satisfied with his explanation, for gradually the numbers decreased and this commotion terminated, fortunately, without an accident. As the cause of the disturbances appears to have originated, in the erroneous impression of M. Jullien using the expression sixpenny mob, and refusing to allow Herr Pischek to sing again, we trust that we have clearly proved how guiltless M. Jullien was of these accusations, and that we have removed any impression detrimental to him. From a knowledge, sir, that your valuable columns are always open to render justice to the accused, we, the undersigned, humbly trust, that the explanation we have endeavoured to give, will receive your kind indulgence, and the favour of insertion in your most excellent paper.—We remain, sir, your obedient servants.

MR. EDITOR,—Allow me to correct a mistake of your intelligent and very flattering correspondent from Coventry; who, in speaking of the beautiful old English ballad of "Barbara Allen," which Madame Macfarren sang at the concert in that town on the 19th, states: that "to this poetry Macfarren, the composer, has written music, at once, simple tender, and melodious." Now, sir, I perfectly agree with your correspondent in the opinion he expresses of this beautiful national melody; but, as I do not wish to have past generations rise up in judgment against me, I feel in duty bound, to disclaim the great merit of having written it, and to assure your correspondent, that it is a traditional tune and the same of which Goldsmith writes when he tells how his "dairymaid sang him into tears with 'Johnny Armstrong's last good night,' or the 'Cruelty of Barbara Allen.'"—I am, the Editor's ever obediently, 53, York Terrace, Regent's Park, April 26, 1847. G. A. MACFARREN.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—(The want of space precluded the insertion of the following last week).—The one hundred and ninth anniversary dinner of this Society took place on the 19th ult., Lord Saltoun in the chair. About 170 gentlemen dined in the Freemason's Hall, and there were upwards of a hundred elegantly dressed ladies present. In the course of the evening, Miss M. Williams sang Knight's "Soldier's Daughter," and Miss Rainforth was loudly eulogized in a Welsh ballad, "In a secret fertile valley," accompanied by W. L. Phillips. Mr. Braham gave "The death of Nelson," amidst the cheers of the Company. Horsley's glee, "Come, gentle Zephyr," and Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May," were well sung. Apologies were made for Miss Hawes and Signor F. Lablache, both suffering from hoarseness. Signor Emiliani gave a brilliant solo on the violin, accompanied by Sterndale Bennett; and W. H. Holmes played Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" with variations, excellently. Mr. Horsley, in proposing the noble chairman's health, paid him many high compliments. A list of donations and subscriptions was read, including £30 from the King of Hanover; £25 from Prince Albert; £10 from the director of the Musical Union; 10 guineas from Mr. Walker; 10 guineas each from Mad. Grisi and Sig. Mario; 5 guineas from Sig. F. Lablache; and the like sum from Sir A. Barnard; W. Curling, Esq.; R. Palmer, Esq.; W. Horne, Esq.; and Messrs. Addison and Hodson: 10 guineas each from Mr. Ollive, Miss Penn, and Mr. Withall; and one hundred pounds from the liberal house of Broadwood, being the 10th donation. There are claimants on the funds of the Society at present, 9 members, 33 widows, and 13 children; and the sum of £2291 odd was appropriated during last year, to the purpose for which the constitution was founded in 1738, namely, the support of aged and infirm members, their widows and orphans.

MENDELSSOHN will perform an extemporaneous fantasia on the organ, and a concerto by Bach, on the pianoforte, at the concert of Ancient Music, on Wednesday, which will be under the direction of Prince Albert, who has engaged Mesdames Castellani, Alboni, S. Novello, M. Williams; Signori Mario, Gardoni, Tamburini, Lablache; Messrs. Lockey, Machin, and Staudigl.

THE CONCERT OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF DUBLIN, announced to take place on Monday evening next, the 3rd of May, has been postponed, in consequence of the severe indisposition of His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, President of the Society.

MRS. GEORGINA F. PLUMMER has lately been singing with success at various concerts. We have no doubt of her soon being a useful acquisition to our concert-rooms. She has a rich voice, agreeable manners, a good method, and an evident ambition to progress.

MR. C. MUHLENFELDT, the able pianist and composer, has announced his annual soirée musicale for Wednesday week.

JENNY LIND AT DRURY-LANE (From Punch).—Mr. Bunn has certainly kept faith with the public, by presenting the long-promised JENNY LIND on this stage, though in the shape of an elephant. She is undoubtedly the greatest creature that ever trod the dramatic boards, and stands higher than any other member of the profession. Her compass is extraordinary, for she can reach to the middle of A flat without any difficulty, and in a slow movement her aplomb is truly wonderful. We do not think she excels in rapid passages, but her run, if she were to give full vent to it, would, no doubt, make a powerful impression on her audience.

AN ENGLISH VERSION of Linda di Chamouni, translated expressly for Madame Bishop, will be produced this evening, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. The manager has gone to great expense to produce the opera in a style of splendour and completeness.

MELODISTS.—There was a very brilliant meeting of the Melodists Club, on Tuesday; the Duke of Cambridge in the chair, supported by the Duke of Beaufort, Lord Saltoun, Sir A. Barnard, &c., &c. The latter having offered a prize of ten guineas for a Druidical Ode, three candidates sent in compositions, which were excellently sung by Mr. Machin, accompanied by Sir H. Bishop. The prize was awarded to Mr. Blewett; and premiums of five guineas each, the gift of Messrs. White and Hopkinson, were presented to Mr. J. L. Hatton, and Mr. C. Horn, for the second and third odes. The brothers Hellmesberger played a concertante violin duett, accompanied by Mr. Benedict, capitally, and were loudly applauded. Herr Holzel sung a German song, also a portion of Scheller's song of the "Bell," accompanied by the adelphi Hellmesberger, which had a most excellent effect. Several songs and glees were sung in the course of the evening, and the royal president announced, that he would give a prize of ten guineas next season, for a cheerful glee, the candidates to be confined to the musical members of the club, who devote their time and talent to its service.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISS L. B.—(Reading).—We are sorry to be at variance with our fair correspondent. Our notions of the work she condemns are precisely the contrary to those she expresses. We think it one of the master pieces of one of the most illustrious poets and philosophers that the world ever produced.

M. A. P.—(Gloucester).—We do not recollect to have received our correspondent's first letter. Of the published duets by Macfarren, we recommend the symphony in C sharp minor, and the overture to Don Quixote, as the most efficacious and the finest music. The overture to Don Carlos is not published yet. Mendelssohn was eighteen when he wrote the overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." We do not know the precise date, nor the year of the composer's birth. The number of the Musical World shall be looked out and forwarded.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant: To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FARRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.

AFTER this vigorous and lovely chorus the scene changes to the court of Ahab. Elijah reproaches Ahab with his idolatrous iniquities. The three years of drought expired, according to the prophecy, the man of God declares his intention to solicit the Almighty's mercy, for rain, to moisten the parched earth and refresh the thirsty people. Ahab reproaches the prophet, as "He that troubleth Israel." Elijah retorts the charge upon Ahab, whose sins have brought the drought as a sign of God's anger. He challenges Ahab to test the power of Baal, by a sacrifice, summoning the prophets of the false idol, and those "of the groves," to assist. It is agreed that each party shall supplicate his god to send fire to consume the sacrifice, "and the god who by fire shall answer, let him be God."

The priests of Baal first call upon their idol. Their repeated solicitations, accompanied by the ironical encouragement of Elijah, to "call Him louder," and to make use of their ordinary idolatrous ceremonies, are all in vain—no god answers, no fire descends, the sacrifice remains unconsumed. Elijah then invokes all the people to come near to him, and prays the "Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to manifest his power. Angels, looking on from above, encourage him and strengthen his supplication by their entreaties. The true God answers—the fire descends and consumes the sacrifice. Elijah orders all the prophets of Baal to be taken and slain—the people obey him, and not one is left alive. Elijah then preaches the glory of God, and apostrophises the awfulness of his anger. An angel echoes his words, but in a meeker and more compassionate tone.

Mendelssohn has made one masterly tableau of the whole of this. The conversation between Elijah and Ahab is illustrated in accompanied recitatives, intermingled with choral responses of the people. The dramatic intensity with which all this is imbued is singularly appropriate and happy. Ahab's entrance is prefaced by a striking crescendo passage for the orchestra, which is the indication of a marked change in the character of the music, from holy quiet to pagan recklessness. The accompaniments give a character to the whole which is highly exciting. The low tones of the oboe have a wild and unearthly character. This new treatment of the oboe, for which composers generally write high in the scale, was first suggested by Mendelssohn in the introductory andante to his symphony in A minor, and by its frequent employment becomes a marked feature in the instrumentation of Elijah. The choruses of the Baalite priests are picturesque and magnificent. They are full of variety, while the absence of all feeling of religious tranquillity in their development is finely in character. The first, "Baal we cry to thee," in F major, is in two parts,—the theme, a voluptuous melody, set forth with the accompaniment of wind instruments only. It is a double chorus and the quick responses of the opposite choirs produce a splendid effect. There is a feeling of undisturbed confidence in this part of the chorus, that plainly declared the faith which the Baalite priests entertain in the divine power of their idol. But the second part is more restless and energetic. The idolaters find that their appeal is not answered so promptly as they had anticipated; the increased emotion, and the evidences of coming disappointment, are strikingly exemplified in the use of the relative minor key, and the disturbed nature of the orchestral accompaniments. The violins and tenors have a rapid moving passage, in full harmony, which is developed with masterly power, while the organ helps out the voices, as they sing in unison. The other instruments are well employed in heightening the colouring, and the whole dies away, at last, in the original major key—suggesting the notion that the Baalite priests are out of breath with their exertions, and are inclined to give up the point in despair. But the mocking encouragement of Elijah leads them to renewed exertions, forcibly expressed in the recitative—and another chorus, "Hear our cry, O Baal," follows. The character of this is savage and ferocious. The voices sing in full harmony, while the principal instruments of the orchestra perform a strange passage in unison, which is carried on to the end. This chorus is in the key of C sharp minor, and is introduced, by a fine change of harmony, after the recitative of Elijah. The continued scorn and pretended encouragement of the prophet, following the sudden arrest of this chorus, is answered by a third and last appeal of the Baalites, developed in another chorus of wonderful character. The unusual key of F sharp minor heightens the depth of despair which this chorus pretends to convey. The voices sing a wild melody, with reckless abandon—typifying the hopelessness and shame of the idolaters. The violins are employed in passages of fearful rapidity, and the general character of the orchestration presents a fine musical picture of the rage and anguish of the priests, who are supposed to make use of all the ceremonies they are accustomed to employ when they desire to avert the anger of Baal. The transition to D major, on the words "Hear and answer," and the cadence in which this phrase is echoed and re-echoed by the opposing choirs, are magnificent points. The long pauses, where the Baalites are supposed to wait anxiously the answer of their god, and the sudden breaking off of the sopranos and tenors, on the interval of the fifth, have also an extraordinary effect. Elijah's recitative, "Draw near, ye people," immediately following this chorus, is among the most beautiful points in the oratorio. The sudden change from the hopelessness of idolatry to the comfortableness of the true faith, could not be more completely expressed than by the few notes with which it opens. But the thing that follows, "Lord God of Abraham," is less to our liking. It is calm and undisturbed, but the melody is not clearly designed, while the instrumentation, though elaborate, is without a clear purpose. In fact, there is an approach to dullness in it, that we cannot elsewhere find in the whole work. However, "Dormitit Homerus" sometimes—and why not Mendelssohn?

The quartet of angels that follows, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," in C major, is written in the form of a chorale. It is exceedingly lovely, and the combination of the organ and violin, in the accompaniment, is equally beautiful and new; the high notes of the violins, sustained through the concluding harmony of one phrase and the harmony with which the next phrase commences, have a streaming silvery effect that is positively enchanting. Elijah's recitative, "Oh, thou, who makest thine angels spirits," is in a tone of earnest supplication suited to the exigency of the prophet's appeal for a demonstration of divine power. The chorus of the people, which answers this, "The fire descends from Heaven, the flames consume his offering," is finely descriptive of the surprise and exultation of the people at the celestial manifestation; the full power of the orchestra is employed with good effect; and the second part, to the words, "Before Him upon your faces full," is in the highest degree solemn and magnificent. Then comes the recitative of Elijah, responded to by the people in a short unison chorus, commanding the slaughter of the priests of Baal—"Take all the prophets of Baal," &c. The style of these short fragments is quite characteristic of the situation. Elijah's bass air, "Is not His word like a fire," is, perhaps, the grandest and best developed song in the whole oratorio. The melody is angry and impetuous—the movement quick and agitated; the continuous tremolando of the violins, with the fierce and restless motion of the basses, with which the voice frequently travels in unison, and the distribution of the other instruments in the orchestra, help to depict more vividly the zealous rage of the prophet at the indignities which have been offered to the Almighty, by the apostles of filth and Paganism. This superb song will slightly remind the hearer of "Why do the nations," in the Messiah, and "Consume them," in St. Paul—but the resemblance is only in feeling, while in elaboration and construction it is perhaps superior to either of those noble efforts of genius. The key of this song is A minor, and the passages require more flexibility than belongs to the majority of bass voices. A lovely contrast is produced by the quiet desponding character of the contralto air which succeeds, "Woe unto them that forsake him." This plaintive and heart-touching melody is in the key of E minor, and expresses the words with exquisite felicity. The instrumentation is judiciously sparing, and as a point of consummate art, united to the most natural simplicity, we would cite the reprise of the subject, which surprises the ear by its novelty, while it satisfies the mind by its beauty.

The remainder of the first part of Elijah is combined in a scene of the highest musical and dramatic interest. The prophet Obadiah, and the people, implore Elijah's intercession in their behalf. Elijah appeals to the Lord, to open the heavens and send rain. The people echo his prayer. Elijah then sends a child to the sea shore, and tells him to look if there be any sign that the Lord has listened to his prayer. The youth returns and says "There is nothing—the heavens are as brass above me"—Elijah renews his prayer, with increased fervor, the people joining him, and again sends forth the youth, who again returns with an unfavourable answer, "There is nothing—the earth is as iron under me." A third time Elijah prays, and with intense earnestness and a fulness of faith that never leaves him. The youth once more sets forth, and returns with better news,—“Behold a little cloud ariseth now from the waters; it is like a man's hand! The heavens are black with clouds and with wind; the storm rusheth louder and louder!” Elijah and the people offer thanks to God, the storm bursts forth, and the thirsty land is flooded and refreshed.

Mendelssohn has treated this scene in a spirit of transcendent poetry that is inferior to nothing in the whole range of art. The prayer of Elijah, in A flat, is full of devotion, and the burden on the words, "Open the heavens and send us relief," echoed in chorus by the people, involves one of the most soothing and enchanting phrases of melody that ever was listened to. A great charm is produced by the change of harmony in the choral response. The recitatives for Elijah and the youth are indescribably beautiful. The contrast between the earnest belief of the prophet and the ingenuous unconsciousness of the boy is finely conveyed in the instrumental accompaniments. While Elijah speaks there is a motion in the orchestra that strikingly suggests the inward feeling in the holy man's mind that rain is at hand, and that God is preparing to listen to his prayer. This increases at each resumption of his supplication, and at length becomes so perturbed, that the poetical idea of waters, striving to burst from their hold, is strongly conveyed. To Elijah, full of faith, the rain comes when the prayer is uttered—his soul drinks of the streams ere his body is aware of their presence. In the youth quite the contrary. Total ignorance and total absence of belief, is indicated by the bare and solitary accompaniment of the oboe, which plays a single note, high in the scale, in combination with the soprano tones of the youth. The effect is new and picturesque, but no words can give a notion of it to those who have not been lucky enough to hear it. The youth's description of the appearance of the little cloud, and the gradual indications of the approaching storm, is conveyed with masterly art. The tremolando of the violins, on high notes, and the gradual crescendo, in which the tenors, violoncellos, and wind instruments, come, one after the other, to increase the body of sound, until a change of harmony employs the whole power of the orchestra on the words, "Thanks be to God for all his mercies," uttered exultingly by the people, involve something beyond mere art. Nothing but inspiration from above could have suggested these—the recitative of Elijah in praise of God, which, for a while, stops the current of the multitude's enthusiasm—and finally, the overpowering and magnificent chorus in E flat, "Thanks be to God," in which the full flow of violent delight and heart-felt gratitude is displayed, with a might that defies contemplation, and sets criticism at defiance. The subject of this chorus, overflowing with rapturous exultation; the entrance of the second theme on the words, "The stormy billows are high," with the heaving of the basses in passages of rolling impetuosity; the awful and tremendous modulations in A flat, thence to D, and thence back to E flat, the original key, on the words, "But the Lord is above them and Almighty;" the sudden pause of the whole mass of voices and instruments, with the exception of the violins, which descend in a scale passage fmo. with a novelty of effect that has no precedent; and the crash upon the dominant harmony of the relative minor of the key, with which the subject is resumed and climaxed; all these are evidences of power, that, had Mendelssohn produced nothing else, would have given him an indisputable right to a place by the side of the greatest composers the world has produced, who, in their moments of highest aspiration, never aspired more loftily, or achieved more wonders than are presented in this superb chorus—a worthy climax to the first part of Elijah.

[Our notices of the four performances at Exeter Hall, and the two at Manchester and Birmingham, at all of which we were present, will be comprised in the body of the general remarks with which we intend to conclude this notice.]

THE BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.

THE fourth meeting was very fully attended. The attractions were strengthened by the co-operation of the justly celebrated Vieuxtemps, one of the greatest living masters of the violin, both as a player and as a composer. The programme consisted of two of the earlier quartets—No. 2, in G. major, and No. 6, in B flat major, from op. 13, both composed in 1792, and both dedicated to the Prince Lichnowsky; of No. 11, in F minor, op. 95, composed in 1815-16, and dedicated to Zmeskall von Domanovetz; and finally, of No. 17, in F major, op. 135, composed between the years 1823 and 1826 (the precise date not ascertainable), and dedicated to Herr Johann Wolfmeyer. The first and third were led by Sainton, the second and fourth by Vieuxtemps. The tenor and violoncello were, as usual, in the hands of Hill and Rousselot. The performance was worthy of the Beethoven Quartet Society. The two first quartets are known to all amateurs, and need no panegyric, their freshness, natural beauty, and masterly ingenuity having long ago placed them among the classics of art. The F minor, which Mendelssohn has pronounced to be the most thoroughly Beethovenish of the seventeen quartets left us by the master, is one of the most elaborate, fantastic, and difficult to understand. But its deep meaning and recondite beauties grow upon you with every hearing. It was very finely interpreted by Sainton and his coadjutors, and delighted all the amateurs present. The F major (No. 17) is not so captivating a composition by any means. It has some great points, especially in the allegretto, and the lento cantante in D flat; but its general character is of such a capricious nature as to set musical rules and musical taste at defiance. We are convinced that had Beethoven lived, he would not have consented to its publication. It bears strong evidence of having been the freak of one of those wayward moods to which the irritable and passionate temper of the composer frequently subjected him, and was never intended by him as a work of art to be dedicated, like the greater number of his compositions, to immortality. But, like other fragments which the composer would have disdained, it was sold by his greedy relatives to the music-publishers, who, after the great man's death, hungrily snatched at every scrap of manuscript that was to be found scattered about his room, or carefully laid aside in his portfolio, for rejection or reconsideration. The innumerable violations of all harmonic proprieties which this quartet presents could not possibly have been sanctioned by so profound and correct a musician as Beethoven, and nothing can dissuade us from the belief that the majority of them are the offsprings of the engraver's carelessness—as in the instance of the grand fugue in B flat, which formed the finale to his last quartet, and was afterwards replaced by one of the loveliest inspirations of his inexhaustible fancy. All that good playing could effect was effected in the interpretation of this quartet, by Vieuxtemps and his fellows; but no playing in the world can make it musically acceptable.

On Tuesday afternoon the Beethoven Quartet Society paid an appropriate compliment to the celebrated composer, Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy, by inviting him to hear a performance of some of his own works. The Beethoven Rooms were crowded with the friends and patrons of the Society, anxious to obtain a last look at the illustrious musician, who was to leave England immediately for Frankfort. The performances were altogether of the most interesting and exciting nature. They commenced with the quartet in D major, one of the set of three recently composed by Mendelssohn. This ingenious and beautiful work was exquisitely performed by Joseph Joachim, Sainton, Hill, and Rousselot; the first three movements especially, which went to perfection. The finale was somewhat unsteady. The romanza in B minor, one of the most delicate and lovely emanations from the genius of the composer, was executed with a nicety of detail, and a purity of expression, that went to the hearts of all present. Mendelssohn was then invited to take his place at the piano, and performed, d l'improviste, the charming melody in A flat, from the fourth book of his Lieder ohne Worte, and Beethoven's 33 variations, on an original theme, in C minor. The first was a refined specimen of poetical expression, the last a masterly display of vigorous and faultless execution. The audience rose en masse, and cheered the great musician. The next piece was Mendelssohn's second trio in C minor, interpreted by the composer at the piano, with Sainton and Rousselot at the violin and violoncello. This trio promises to become as popular among musicians as the first in D minor, which is on the desk of every pianist of any pretensions to taste. The allegro is energetic and splendid; the entrance of the second theme fortissimo, on the harmony of the 6-4-2, has a new and surprising effect, and the working of the two themes throughout is powerful and striking. The slow movement is a pretty romanza in E flat, 6-8 time, in which the violin and violoncello are constantly singing in concert the most ravishing strains of melody, accompanied by the piano which occasionally takes the theme, for variety, in arpeggio, or otherwise. The schizzo is in the Midsummer Night's Dream school; a rapid and ever-restless movement, in moto continuo, exciting and interesting to the highest degree. The entrance of the trio in the major is astonishingly fine, and the whole construction of the movement is in the composer's most Mendelssohnian, and consequently, happiest manner. The difficulties of this movement, owing to the extreme rapidity of utterance, are prodigious, the qualities of each of the three performers being taxed in an equal proportion. It was splendidly executed. The pianoforte playing of Mendelssohn was beyond all praise. The velocity, force, and sureness of his fingering—the impetuosity with which he delivered the passages of energy—the refined and passionate sentiment he infused into the cantabiles—the extraordinary precision and certainty of his octave-playing, with both hands—in short, the surpassing excellence of the whole performance was nothing short of inspiration. Sainton and Rousselot followed each movement of the composer's ever-changing expression with the ease and quickness of the most practised master. It is impossible to describe in words the enthusiasm engendered by this wonderful performance. Greatest of all pianists, as Mendelssohn undoubtedly is, we question if ever his supremacy was so triumphantly established. The last item of this most interesting programme was the famous Otello in E flat, for stringed instruments, which, albeit it was produced at the early age of fifteen, ranks high among Mendelssohn's achievements, and among the noblest monuments of musical genius that the whole range of art can furnish. This astonishing work was performed—we need not say how superbly, when we record the names of its executants—Vieuxtemps and Sainton, first violins; Joachim and Steveniers, second violins; Hill and W. Thomas, tenors; Piatti and Rousselot, violoncellos. Those accomplished artists proved themselves worthy their renown by their interpretation of this glorious work, in presence of the gifted composer. Mendelssohn, who had never heard Vieuxtemps before, expressed his satisfaction in unmeasured terms. Never was the grand style and masterly execution of that consummate violinist displayed to greater advantage. In the large expression of the allegro, the romantic dejection of the andante, the effervescent sparkle of the intermezzo, and the sweeping majesty of the finale, Vieuxtemps was equally at home, equally the great master which the world has long declared him. The other players were scarcely less admirable. Hill's tenor came out in various passages with magical effect, and the violoncellos of Piatti and Rousselot gave double force to the energetic points of the fugue. With this almost faultless performance the meeting terminated, and those who assisted may congratulate themselves on having heard the Ottetto of Mendelssohn performed, for the first time in this country, with the accuracy and spirit necessary to the full expression of its manifold beauties.

PART II.—CHAPTER XIII.

Persons who are perfectly strange and indifferent towards each other, when they live for a time together, mutually reveal their inmost feelings, and a certain confidence must arise. So much the more may it be expected, that with our two friends, while they lived together, and were daily and hourly in each other's society, nothing remained hidden on either side. They recalled the memory of former times, and the Major did not conceal the fact, that when Edward had returned from his travels,* Charlotte had destined Ottilia for him, meaning, in the course of time, to give him the beautiful girl for a wife. Edward, transported even to embarrassment at this discovery, spoke without reserve of the mutual inclination of Charlotte and the Major, which, because it happened to be pleasant and favourable to him, he painted in lively colours.

The Major could not quite deny nor quite confess; but Edward became only the more fixed and determined. He looked upon every thing, not as possible, but as having already taken place. It was only necessary that all parties should consent to what they wished; a separation was certainly to be effected; a speedy union was to follow; and Edward wished then to travel with Ottilia.

Of all things which the imagination paints as pleasant, perhaps nothing is more charming than when lovers, or a young married couple, hope to enjoy their new fresh connection in a new fresh world, and to prove and confirm a durable bond by so many changing situations. In the meanwhile, the Major and Charlotte were to have unlimited authority, so as to manage all that belonged to possessions, property, and desirable worldly arrangements, and conduct it according to equity and fairness, that all parties might be satisfied. But the point on which Edward most of all relied, and from which he seemed to promise himself the greatest advantage, was this—that as the child was to remain with its mother, the Major could educate it according to his views, and develop its faculties. It was not in vain that the name of Otto, which was common to both the friends, had been given him at his baptism.

* This project, which Charlotte entertained of marrying Ottilia to Edward, before she thought of marrying him herself, is mentioned in the first part.—Translator.

The whole plan was so complete, as far as Edward was concerned, that he did not like to wait a day in approaching its execution. On their way to the estate, they came to a little town, where Edward possessed a house, in which he wished to stop, and await the return of the Major. However he could not prevail on himself to alight there at once, and accompanied his friend through the place. They were both on horseback, and being occupied in important conversation, rode further on together.

All at once they discerned in the distance the new house on the heights, the red tiles of which they saw glittering for the first time. An irresistible desire seizes Edward; he wishes to have all settled this evening. He will remain concealed in a neighbouring village; the Major is to represent the affair urgently to Charlotte; take her prudence by surprise; and, by the unexpected proposal, compel her to make a free revelation of her feelings. For Edward, who had transferred his wishes to her, only thought that he was meeting her own decided wishes, and hoped for a speedy consent from her, because he himself could have no other will.

Joyously he saw the happy result before his eyes, and that this might be speedily communicated to him, while he was watching, cannon were to be fired, and, if it were night, rockets were to ascend.

The Major rode to the castle; he did not find Charlotte, but learned that for the present she resided in the new building, and that now she was paying a visit in the neighbourhood, from which, probably, she would not soon return in the course of the day. He went back to the inn, where he had put up his horse.

Edward, in the meanwhile, impelled by unconquerable impatience, glided out of his retreat by solitary paths, known only to hunters and fishers, to his park, and found himself towards evening in the vicinity of the lake, the surface of which he now saw, for the first time, in its perfection and purity.

This afternoon, Ottilia had taken a walk along the lake. She carried the child, and, according to custom, read as she went. Thus she reached the oaks at the place of crossing. The boy had fallen asleep; she sat down, laid him by her, and continued to read. The book was one of those which are attractive to a tender heart, and do not allow the reader to leave off. She forgot time and hour, and did not think that by land it was a long way back to the new building, but sat absorbed in her book—in herself so lovely to behold, that the trees and shrubs around her should have been animated, and endowed with eyes, for the purpose of admiring her, and taking delight in her. And a reddish streak of light from the sinking sun just fell behind her, and illumined her cheek and shoulder.

Edward, who had hitherto succeeded in pressing forward so far unobserved, finding his park empty, and the spot lonely, ventured further and further. At last he broke through the bushes by the oaks—he saw Ottilia—she saw him—he flew to her, and was at her feet. After a long, mute pause, during which both endeavoured to collect themselves, he explained, in a few words, why and how he had come. He had, he said, sent the Major to Charlotte, and their common fate was, perhaps, decided at this moment. He had never doubted of her love, and certainly she had never doubted of his. He begged for her consent; she hesitated: he implored her; he wished to avail himself of his old privileges, and clasp her in his arms—she pointed to the child.

Edward saw it, and was astounded. "Great God!" he cried, "if I had cause to doubt my wife and my friend, this form would bear fearful witness against them. Is not this the image of the Major? Such a likeness I never saw."

"Nay," said Ottilia, "all the world says it is like me." "Is it possible?" said Edward; and at that moment the child opened its eyes—two great, black, penetrating eyes, deep and kindly. The child already looked on the world with so much intelligence, it seemed to know the pair who stood before it. Edward cast himself down by the child, and knelt a second time before Ottilia. "It is thyself!" he cried; "these are thine eyes. But, O, let me only look into thine own. Let me cast a veil over that evil hour which gave existence to this being. Shall I scare thy pure soul with the unhappy thought, that human beings can press each other to the heart, while mentally estranged, and thus profane a legal tie by ardent wishes. Or, rather, since we have gone so far—since my connection with Charlotte must be dissolved—since thou wilt be mine—why should I not say it? Why should I not speak out the hard word? This child is the fruit of a double adultery! It separates me from my wife, and my wife from me, even as it should have united us. Let it then bear witness against me; let these fine eyes tell them that I belonged to thee, while in the arms of another. May'st thou feel, Otilia, truly feel, that I can atone for that fault—that crime, in thine arms alone!"

"Hark!" he cried, as he sprang up, and thought he heard a shot as the signal which the Major was to give. It was a hunter, who had fired among the neighbouring mountains. Nothing further ensued; Edward was impatient.

It was not till now, that Otilia saw that the sun had sunk behind the mountains. "Retire, Edward," cried Otilia. The sun still glimmered, for the last time, from the windows of the upper edifice. "Retire, Edward," cried Otilia. "So long have we practised self-denial—so long have we endured. Reflect, what we both owe to Charlotte. She must decide our fate; let us not anticipate her. I am thine, if she permits it; if not, I must renounce thee. Since thou thinkest the decision so close at hand, let us wait. Go back into the village; there the Major expects thee. How much may happen which requires an explanation! Is it probable that the rude report of a cannon could announce to you the success of his negotiations? Perhaps he is looking for thee at this moment. He has not found Charlotte, I know, but he may have gone to meet her, as it was known where she was. How many cases are possible! Leave me. She must be coming now. She waits for me and the child up yonder."

Otilia spoke in haste. She summoned together all possible contingencies. She was happy in Edward's presence, and felt that she must now remove him. "I beseech, I entreat thee, my beloved," she cried, "return and wait for the Major."—"I obey thy commands," cried Edward, while he looked upon her, for the first time, with passion, and then folded her closely in his arms. She clasped him in her's, and in the tenderest manner pressed him to her bosom. Hope soared over their heads, like a star, which falls from heaven. They fancied, they believed, that they belonged to each other; for the first time, they exchanged free, decided kisses, and then forcibly and painfully parted.

The sun had set; twilight had already begun; and there were damp exhalations about the lake. Otilia was moved and perplexed; she looked over towards the house on the mountain, and fancied that she saw Charlotte's white dress on the balcony. The circuitous route by the lake was long, and she knew how impatiently Charlotte was expecting the child. She sees the plane-trees opposite; only a piece of water separates her from the path, which at once leads to the building. The danger of venturing upon the water with the child vanishes in the emergency. She hastens to the boat, she does not feel that her heart is beating, that her feet are tottering, that her senses threaten to leave her.

She jumps into the boat, seizes the oar, and pushes off. She is obliged to employ force; she repeats the push; the boat totters, and moves some distance into the water. With the child in her left arm, with the book in her left hand, with the oar in her right, she also totters and falls in the boat. The oar slips from her hand on one side, and while she tries to support herself, the child and book drop one after another into the water. She snatches at the child's dress, but her inconvenient position prevents her from raising herself. The right hand, which is free, is not sufficient to twine itself round—to lift itself. At last, she succeeds—she draws the child from the water; but its eyes are closed—it has ceased to breathe.

At the moment all her presence of mind returned, but so much the greater was her pain. The boat is impelled almost into the middle of the lake; the oar floats afar off; she sees no one on the bank; and, indeed, what would it have availed her, if she had seen any one! Severed from every thing, she floats upon the faithless and inaccessible element.

She seeks aid in herself. She had so often heard of the restoration of the drowned. She had even witnessed it on the evening of her birth-day. She undresses the child, and dries it with her muslin dress. She tears open her bosom, and, for the first time, exposes it to the open air; for the first time she presses to her naked breast a living thing—which, alas! is not living. The cold limbs of the unfortunate creature chill her bosom to the inmost heart. Infinite tears flow from her eyes, and communicate to the surface of the stiffened form an appearance of life and warmth. She does not remit her exertions; she envelops it in her shawl, and by rubbing, pressing, breathing, kisses and tears, she thinks she can supply the place of those remedies which are denied her in this lonely position.

But all in vain! Without motion, the child lies in her arms; without motion, the boat stands upon the surface: but, even here, her beautiful soul does not leave her helpless. She turns her thoughts above. Kneeling, she sinks down in the boat, and, with both arms, raises the stiffened child over her innocent heart, which resembles marble in whiteness, and, alas! in coldness also. With tearful eyes she looks upwards, and calls for aid from that place where a tender heart hopes to find the greatest fulness, if it is wanting everywhere else.

She also turns herself, not in vain, to the stars, which already begin to shine forth one by one. A soft wind arises, and impels the boat towards the plane-trees.

SONNET.

No. XXXIII.

My better angel, always hover near me,
And with the tender glances of thine eyes,
Scatter the gloomy thoughts which in me rise;
With the soft lustre of thy countenance cheer me.
Oh, have they told thee thou shouldst never hear me,—
That in my words some deadly poison lies,
Which carries mischief wheresoe'er it flies?—
They know me not, who say that thou shouldst fear me.
To me thou seem'st some spirit from above,
Looking serenely upon passions wild,
Though thy dear heart with love is flowing o'er.
Thou shunn'st all earthiness, but shunn'st not love;
Checking each outbreak with a look so mild,
That while I hope the less, I love the more.—N. D.

MADAME BISHOP IN DUBLIN.

THE production of Linda di Chamouni on Tuesday evening, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, has, it would appear, from the notices of all the journals, created a powerful sensation. We shall extract an article from the Pilot, which, however warmly it speaks, is certainly frigid, compared to the comments of many of its cotemporaries on Madame Bishop's acting and singing. The journal alluded to speaks as follows:—

"Since La Sonnambula was translated and produced on the English stage, we do not recollect any foreign opera which pleased so much, or deserved better, and received more enthusiastic success, than Linda di Chamouni, performed last night (for the first time) for the benefit of that accomplished artiste, Madame Anna Bishop. The interest and simplicity of the story (which is of a domestic nature), the beauties of the music, one of Donizetti's best, and, above all, the exquisitely touching manner in which the gifted beneficiaire represented the innocent and loving Maid of Chamouni, could not fail to delight the crowded audience, whose applause throughout was almost incessant. We admired much the good taste and modesty of Madame Bishop, in bringing forward with her, when she was unanimously called for after the opera, all the principal vocalists who supported her, and the public rewarded the successful troupe with the loudest acclamation. Pressure of matter prevents us giving, as we should wish, full details of the plot of the opera (which is taken, we believe, from the admired French comedy, La Grace de Dieu), and noticing the many morceaux, which struck us as being eminently dramatic and beautiful; but we cannot omit to speak of a most effective religious chorus opening the first act—the light and pretty song of Madame Bishop which follows (and which was vociferously encored)—an exquisite duet between Linda and Carlo (T. Bishop), containing a simple and bewitching melody, which is often repeated through the opera; and the rondo finale (also encored) in which Anna Bishop performed some feats of vocalization quite stupendous. Our decided opinion is, that Anna Bishop, in the part of Linda, is equal to any artiste we have ever seen, in point of acting or singing; and last night she proved herself to be an O'Neil and a Malibran. Her mad scene was admirable; and her forlorn aspect in the third act, when she returns to Chamouni destitute and insane, was true to life. The two Corris, Mr. T. Bishop, the Misses De La Vega, &c., acquitted themselves well in their respective arduous roles, although a few more rehearsals for them would not have been amiss. The choruses and orchestra, under the able direction of the talented leader, Levey, went off admirably. To-morrow evening Madame A. Bishop has consented to repeat the Linda for that night only."

We should be much pleased at having an opportunity of hearing Madame Bishop in an opera so well befitted, in every respect, to her genius and capabilities. By all accounts, Linda is by far the greatest part in which Madame Bishop has yet appeared. The opera, we understand, has been admirably adapted to the English stage. Linda di Chamouni, in point of music and dramatic effect, is one of Donizetti's happiest and best constructed works. It was done, for the first time in an English form, on Tuesday evening, at the Dublin Theatre. No doubt we shall have an early letter from our kind Correspondent in Dublin, R. C. explaining the performance at greater length.

CONCERTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The second concert took place on Saturday, at the Hanover Square Rooms. We can do little more than cite the programme of the performance, which certainly did not bear out the notions we have a right to entertain of what such a public exhibition of academic progress should be. There was not one composition by a pupil, and the whole selection, as will be seen by the following, was a series of fragments.

PART I.—Selection from the opera of "EURYANTHE."—Introductory chorus,—"All hail the morn." Waltz, Romance.—"Near thy Bay, when day is closing." Mr. HERBERT. Song.—"Morn is now breaking," Miss COLE. Duet.—"Joy, Joy, he still is mine," Miss HOLROYD and Mr. WETHERBEE. Song.—"Home of my Childhood dear," Mr. GARDNER. Finale to First Act. "Quartet."—Miss RANSFORD, Miss SALMON, Mr. GARDNER, and Mr. WETHERBEE, with CHORUS.—Weber. Song.—"O too lovely," Miss SALMON. (Arioso) Dr. ARNE. "Adagio and First movement from Concerto in D," Violoncello, Mr. HORATIO CHIPP, Romberg. Aria.—"Elena O tu mi chiami," Miss D'ERNEST, (La Donna del Lago) Rossini. "Andante and Rondo in B. minor," Pianoforte, Miss D. WATKINS, Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Overture.—"Egmont," Beethoven. Duo.—"Io vi perdona, O stella." Miss HOLROYD and Miss E. HOLROYD. (Zadig ed Astarte) Vaccai. Concerto.—"B. minor, First movement," Pianoforte, Miss M. E. SMITH, (King's Scholar). Hummel. Duo.—"Pray leave us but a moment," Miss D'ERNEST and Miss RANSFORD, (Jessonda). Spohr. Madrigal.—"Lady, your eye my love enforced," Weekes. Aria.—"Di placet," Miss SOLOMON, (La Gassa Ladra). Rossini. "Introduction to Guglielmo Tell."—The principal parts by Miss SOLOMON, Miss RANSFORD, Mr. HERBERT, Mr. WETHERBEE, and Mr. WEEKES. Rossini. Harp.—Mr. THOMAS.

Among the vocal performances we noticed the singing of Miss Ransford, in the quartet from the Euryanthe finale, which was neat, spirited, and in good taste. The encore of this movement was mainly indebted to the exertions of this very improving vocalist. Miss Cole also earned distinction by her interpretation of the song, "Morn is breaking." This young lady's voice is good, and experience, under proper tuition, may do much for her. There was nothing else to specialize in this department, but the fact that Mr. Wetherbee, one of the best voices and one of the most promising singers in the institution, had no solo to show what progress he has made. This was not fair to so good a pupil. The violoncello playing of Mr. Chipp demands a word of strong eulogy. His tone is good, his execution neat, and his style unaffected and agreeable. Misses D. Watkins, and M. E. Smith, the two lady pianists, exhibit promise—but the latter scarcely enough for a King's Scholar. The band played the overture to Egmont very well, but the chorus was not quite what it should have been in the introduction to Euryanthe. This was not a concert to advance the interests of the institution nor to give the pupils a proper reverence for the classical forms of the art. There is nothing more pernicious than this habit of giving fragments of works. Much better would it be to treat the patrons of this institution with the efforts of one or two really efficient pupils, than to the crude attempts of many, which can do no good to the students themselves and little credit to the institution. Where is all the talent for composition that was wont to signalize the Academy so honourably? Is it all fled? It would really appear so by the obstinate persistence in presenting concert after concert, with scarcely one note from the pen of a student.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—Mr. Ella, the Director, has now begun to set to work in right earnest. His third "seance" was more interesting than either of its predecessors. The programme was in itself, good; and combined an agreeable novelty in the department of the executive, in the shape of two young German violinists of considerable repute—the brothers Joseph and George Helmesberger. The selection was as follows:—

"Quartet in G, No. 78," Haydn. "Andantino and Rondo," (two violins). Spohr. "Quartet in F, No. 1," Beethoven.

Haydn's Quartet, one of his best, was performed by the elder Helmesberger (Joseph), Deloffre, Hill, and Hausmann. We have seldom heard one of the works of the patriarch of the quartet more effectively played. The finale, in G minor, an ingenious and masterly movement, was rendered with great accuracy and the nicest perception of expression. M. Deloffre was a capital violino secundo. The quality of the elder Helmesberger's playing was at once declared to be of the right sort, combining classical feeling and excellent mechanism. The Andantino and Rondo of Spohr, from his Second Concertante, Op. 88, was well adapted to test the skill of the young Helmesbergers, and to manifest the perfection of their ensemble. It was a masterly performance on both hands. Lindsay Sloper's pianoforte accompaniment was perfection. Nevertheless, we cannot accept the excuse, proffered by Mr. Ella, for only giving a fragment of this work. If it were too much fatigue for the elder Helmesberger to lead the two quartets, why could not one have sufficed? so as to have rendered Spohr the justice of performing his concertante entire. There is no possible excuse in concerts of such pretensions as those which Mr. Ella offers to his patrons, for presenting any composition, by a great master, in fragments. The Rasoumofsky was capitally played, and showed Herr Joseph Helmesberger to be a thorough proficient in the highest branch of quartet-playing—equally a master of difficulties and of style. The tenor and violoncello playing of Hill and Hausmann was admirable. On the whole, the impression produced by the Helmesbergers was quite up to the mark of their Viennese reputation. Their style is more remarkable for its charm than its vigour, for its finish than for its passion. Jules de Glimes christened them "les femmes de Joachim"—and, perhaps, a happier definition than that applied by the spiritual Belgian musician could hardly have been applied. We shall have further occasion, shortly, no doubt, to criticise the talents of the Helmesbergers—meanwhile we proffer our obligation to Mr. Ella for having accorded us the opportunity of hearing them. Willis's large room—a sorry medium for sound, by the way—was filled with fashionable on the occasion, and, among the dilettanti present, was, H. R. H. the Duke of Cambridge. The seance took place on Tuesday the 27th ultimo. Vieuxtemps will play at the fourth and Joseph Joachim at the fifth meeting.

MESSES. GOLLMICK AND CHARLES OBERTHUR'S CONCERT.—This came off, in the Hanover Square Rooms, on Friday evening, the 30th instant. The concert-givers are Germans—Herr Gollmick a pianist, and Herr Oberthurs a harpist. They have both considerable pretensions. Herr Gollmick exhibited his powers in a fantasia by Thalberg, and in the same composer's Norma duet, for two pianos, with a Mlle. Le Coq. He has also much facility as a violinist, which he proved by taking the violin part in Hummel's Quintet, with Madlle. Le Coq at the piano, Herr Rückner at the tenor, Herr Hausmann at the violoncello, and Mr. G. Flower at the contra-basso, altogether an excellent performance. Herr Oberthurs executed two of the clever harp-fantasias of Parish Alvars very neatly and effectively. Some vocal compositions of merit by both the concert-givers were also introduced in the programme. Those by Herr Oberthurs were from a MS. opera, called Love's Counterplot, and exhibit no small share of musical knowledge and feeling. The other instrumental features were a violoncello solo, admirably played by Herr Hausmann, and a clarinet solo by Herr Schott, of the Queen's band, an artist who ought to be heard much oftener. He has a fine tone, facile execution, and musician-like style, all of which qualities he exhibited very effectively in a solo by Bärmann. The vocalists were, Miss Eliza Nelson, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, Mr. F. Kingsbury, Miss Sabilla Novello, Miss M. O'Connor, Herr Krauz, Mr. A. Novello, Madame Santa Croce, and Signor Alessandro Galli. Miss Eliza Nelson is a promising young artist and won an encore, which she well merited, in a pretty cavatina, by her father, Mr. S. Nelson, the well-known composer, called, "Oh come to my fairy home."

The vocal selection was good and varied enough, but one half too long. The conductors, according to the programme, were M. Benedict and M. Jules de Glimes, but our excellent and witty friend, Jules, did not make his appearance.

Mr. F. KINGSBURY gave a concert at the Manor House Assembly Rooms, Hackney. Mr. Kingsbury was assisted by the Misses Williams and several other popular vocalists, including John Parry. The instrumentalists were Mr. F. Kingsbury, Pianoforte; Mr. C. A. Patey, violin; Mr. W. L. Phillips, violoncello; altogether the concert gave general satisfaction, and no doubt Mr. Kingsbury will find it advantageous to give another concert in the same locale.

CHORAL HARMONISTS.—The last meeting of the season took place on Monday evening and was very fully attended. Want of space prevents us giving an analytical notice of the performance which consisted of Beethoven's Mass in C, tolerably well performed; a very dull madrigal of Bennet's "Come, Shepherds," 1599; Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz;" Hummel's well known graduale "Quod quod in Orbe," and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," concluding with "God save the Queen." The principal vocalists were Miss Lockety, Miss Cubitt, Mr. Lockety and Mr. Machin.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—This theatre closed on Monday night for the season 1846-7. In reviewing the operations of the past campaign, we find that the management has been more enterprising than for many years previously. The first speculation was the engagement of Madame Bishop, who, by being native born, and by being a great artist in every sense of the word, had a double claim on the English public. Madame Bishop's success was, undoubtedly great; but, we hardly believe that Mr. Bunn displayed his usual forethought and acumen in the performances he selected for the artiste. Madame Bishop's voice is a pure soprano, yet the first opera selected for her appearance was one which was written for a contralto. The Maid of Artois was not suited to exhibit Madame Bishop in her most captivating colours, Mr. Lavenue's opera, Loretta, produced for the first time, was not altogether of a character to befit the brilliant style of the fair cantatrice, who was wont to revel in the dazzling floriture of the Italian school. This opera was not written for the singer. Madame Bishop, however, created an immense impression, and proved herself the great artist, both in her style and method. With this opera ended Madame Bishop's performances, and the London public had absolutely no opportunity of witnessing the vocalist in those characters in which she won her continental fame. Had La Sonnambula, Linda di Chamouni, L'Elisir D'Amore, or Mercandante's Leonora, been produced for Madame Bishop at Drury Lane, we have little doubt that the singer would have won ten-fold the favour she did, great as it was, from her audiences; and that the manager would have boasted of a more pregnant treasury than he did at the last moment. Loretta performed some thirty nights, or thereabouts, was necessarily withdrawn with Madame Bishop's secession from the theatre. Balfe's new opera, The Bondman, next had a successful run of nearly fifty nights, and added a fresh laurel to the composer's coronal. It had a triumphant career, and was pronounced, by the best judges, Balfe's chef d'œuvre. Subsequently, treading close on the kibes of The Bondman, came Wallace's Matilda of Hungary, and elevated the name of the composer of Maritana still higher in public estimation. Thus we had three new, original, and native operas, produced at Drury Lane, within the space of four months. Can anything more eulogistic be spoken of the manager? Are not British musicians under deep obligations to Mr. Bunn? To be sure those whose operas have not been produced may have cause to grumble, and may deprecate the want of taste and judgment that led to others being preferred to themselves; but, from such objurcation no manager ever was free; and, notwithstanding, these outcries and fancied grievances, we repeat, Mr. Bunn is deserving of thanks from our native composers. But, as no operas can be greatly successful without singers of pre-eminent talents, so the success of The Bondman, and of Matilda, at Drury Lane, did not fulfil the highest expectation. The first grand requisite for an operatic performance is the vocalist: the next is the music. If there be no superlative artist who can enchain the public by his, or her singing, the composer, had he written a Don Giovanni, or a Guillaume Tell, must rest satisfied with a moderate success. Such a state of things is to be deplored: it is, however, but too true. Mr. Bunn, finding the resources of his operatic establishment by no means as attractive as he could desire, had recourse to a very questionable mode of soliciting the favour of the public. Nevertheless, in engaging the Monster Menagerie for his theatre, the manager was instigated by necessity, not by choice; and they, who abuse him most, for his desecration of Drury Lane, would, undoubtedly, have been driven to the same course of management if the theatre had been submitted to their direction under like circumstances. The entertainments, on Monday evening, were given for the benefit of Mr. Harley. The opera of Guy Mannering was revived, Mr. Harley playing the Dominie with "prodigious" effect, and the veteran Braham once again undertook his old part of Tom Tug in The Waterman. It did our hearts good to witness the uproarious reception Mr. Harley received. It demonstrated to the fullest extent the high favouritism in which he stands with the public both as manager and actor. Mr. Harley's Dominie Sampson is a delicious morceau of mingled comic and pathetic acting. He was greatly applauded throughout the performance. At the end of the piece—we cannot designate Guy Mannering an opera—Mr. Bunn came forward, amid the most tremendous hurricane of applause, and delivered the following address:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen—At the end of a long and eventful season, I appear before you in my wonted position, to give you some slight account of my stewardship. I say a 'long' season, because a period of about 170 nights is entitled to that appellation; and when I look back on its events, my wonder is that it ever reached 70, to say nothing of the 100 [laughter]. The distress which has swept over the country, the unprecedented fluctuation of weather, the incessant sickness arising therefrom (which at one time led to our closing for an entire week), and, in addition to other causes, especially that of another Italian Opera, the want of co-operation on the part of some, who, dependent altogether on public pleasure, do all they can to deprive the public of enjoying any, are matters detrimental to the interests of a theatre, and positive impediments to its progress [cries of 'hear, hear']. It may be expected that I should say something respecting a popular artiste recently arrived in this country. I have been lustily abused for endeavouring to make that lady fulfil her contract, and having failed in such endeavour, I can only say that were she singing here, and drawing the money she will elsewhere, our season would terminate with great profit [cheering]. So much for the past. As respects the future, permit me to assure you that the perfect good understanding which has so long existed, still exists with the committee of this theatre and myself—a body of gentlemen actuated at all times by the utmost liberality and best feeling [much applause]. They renewed my lease of their theatre, and when I asked them to cancel the renewal, to enable those (who continue to excite the doubtful question of the legitimate drama) to compete for its possession, their assent to my request was conveyed with an expression of great regret. If the theatre, from such competition, should pass into other hands, I shall meet you elsewhere; if not, I shall once more meet you on this scene, where I have had so often to acknowledge those favours which I shall never cease to remember with the deepest gratitude."

The entertainments concluded with Mr. Hughes's Mammoth Establishments in the new grand spectacle, and then old Drury closed its lids for another session.

HAYMARKET.—The performances of this favourite little theatre have offered us nothing of late in the shape of a new production. The much-talked of five act comedy is in rehearsal, and will be brought out with the whole strength of the company. It is, we read, from the pen of Lady Dufferin, or, as we hear, from that of Lady Dacre. Now, whether our reading, or our hearing, stand as in truer stead, remains to be discovered. There is one thing we can safely pledge our veracity to, which is, that the new comedy is, undoubtedly, written by a title, but whether the title be Lady Dacre, or Dufferin, we cannot aver. Perhaps, after all, it may not be of such vital consequence to inquire as yet. Mrs. Nisbett plays four times a week and continues to draw immensely. She has appeared in nothing new since our last report. The New Planet is still culminating on the Haymarket meridian, and is not likely soon to hasten to its declination.

PRINCESS'S.—Mrs. Butler has appeared in Mrs. Beverley, in the Gamester, a play with which we have so little sympathy, that we would fain dispense with all notice whatsoever of the performance, did not justice urge us to speak in high terms of praise of Mrs. Butler's acting. The piece, though devoid of a glimpse of power or poetry, has scenes in which the energy and feeling of the actor is taxed to the uttermost. In these scenes of passion Mrs. Butler displayed her tragic capabilities in an unmistakable manner, and drew down reiterated acclamations. As we have already said, it is in depicting the conflicting and stormy emotion of the mind, that the artist is happiest and most at home, and having so many opportunities in this drama of horrors, yclept, The Gamester, she did not fail to produce an immense impression on the audience in the character of Mrs. Beverley. The next play in which Mrs. Butler is to appear, is, we understand, Sheridan Knowles's Wife, a tale of Mantua.

FRENCH PLAYS.—“Sans Nom,” was given on Monday last. It is an extravagant charge, intended to ridicule the pomposity and absurd sentimentality of our modern novelists. The vague, the incompris, the sympathetic and disgustingly horrible are impersonated by turns and held up to sarcasm. The idea is a good one, and was well carried out. M. Dumery as Félix Bonhomme was admirably moyen-âge, as the French Romantics and young Englishers style themselves, and made the house roar with laughter at his eccentricities and the awkward predicaments into which his abhorrence of his family cognomen, and his attempts to escape therefrom, precipitate him. We have also to record the début of Mdlle. Denain and of Monsieur Regnier. We of course give precedence to the lady; she is pretty, has a fine figure, a clear and melodious voice, perfectly distinct pronunciation at all times, a great desideratum in any country, but particularly so in England, where the French language is universally but most imperfectly cultivated. Mademoiselle Denain dresses uncommonly well, and her deportment is a model of elegance and ease; she is not what we should call a great actress, but she makes up for any lack of power by the care she takes even in the most minute details, both of voice and gesture. In genteel comedy, she will be found an acquisition, and her modest and lady-like manners cannot fail to make her a universal favourite. Monsieur Regnier has a great reputation and deserves it; his acting is easy, dignified and natural, he speaks his part as written, without attempting to add any buffoonery of his own, and is consequently always effective; nothing is overdone or strained with him, no ranting or tearing a passion to tatters. The play chosen for the début of Mdlle. Denain and M. Regnier was Alexandre Dumas's comedy in five acts entitled Les Demoiselles de St. Cyr, curtailed by the bye into four. Alas! these are sad times, gradually everything changes around us, poets and authors share the common lot, and, if we go on improving at the present rate, we shall soon have nothing left to improve upon. Epic poetry we have given up long ago; there is but one mortal who dares to write dramatic lyrics, and he is ridiculed for his pains; the light of other days is indeed faded, as this identical person insinuates in one of his melancholy moments, when indulging in melancholy forebodings on the future, and regret for the past. Tragedy is extinct except amongst Les ailes de Pigeon of the French Academy, young gentlemen of eighteen, fresh from Oxford, and a few well meaning enthusiasts who stick up for the legitimate at any price: but it will not do, they find no one to re-echo the cry; even comedy is going to the dogs at a rail-road pace; people vote five acts of any thing a bore, a nuisance; or if they permit the infliction, it is only on condition, that each separate act shall be a farce of itself, and totally independent of the others. No one will deny that Alexandre Dumas is a racy writer; we never yet found the man that had not something to say against him in some shape or other, but at the same time all read him and feel interested and amused; yet, he too has shared the common lot and has been cut down to four acts. Les Demoiselles de St. Cyr was carefully got up as regards the decorations, and well cast; the piece is too well known to need any explanation; the two pensionnaires were charmingly played by Mesdemoiselles Denain and Duverger. M. Regnier was richly humorous in the part Hercule du Couloy; the situations are well arranged, and the actors made the best of them. Nothing could be better than the scene in which the two gentlemen endeavour to discover to which of the ladies the Duke d'Anjou is attached. Le Mariage Forcé, or rather a few scenes of it were played in order to exhibit the volubility of a learned argumentative doctor who reasons upon every thing, anything, or nothing, waxes wroth at his opponents applying the word forme to a hat, and insists that the proper term should be figure; and then launches forth into an everlasting speech, on the cause and nature of things in general, leaves the stage, and appears at the balcony, where he continues his discourse, although pelted with stones by Sganarelle from the street. This was uncommonly well done by M. Regnier; so much so, that the public remained waiting for the second act, even after the actors had left the house, and nothing but extinguishing the gas could persuade them that all was over. We must also briefly notice that Le Mari de la Campagne was given on Wednesday; the part of Colombet, the husband who is ever out of town, and never leaves it, was capitally done by M. Regnier; Mademoiselle Denain made a charming Ursule. Mademoiselle Vallée was highly entertaining in the small part of Pauline, and Mademoiselle Fouquet made a lively and piquante femme de Chambre.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

SATURDAY was the epoch of a great event for the Royal Italian Opera—the appearance of Mademoiselle Fanny Elssler, after an absence of, we believe, five years from this country. During this period the glorious danceuse has turned the heads of half America, and ravished Italy and Allemanyne. This to Fanny was an easy task. People said, “the Yankees know nothing of great dancing, and so they won't understand Elssler.” But Fanny appeared and conquered New York with a pirouette, and each city of the United States with an entrechat. With a smile—and is there not infinity in her smile?—she enslaved Vienna, and Rome, and Naples, and Milan; and all the Northern, Southern, Eastern, and Western cities of the two great lands of song. France yet felt its influence—elle aussi, elle avait passé par là—the lapse of years had but softened down its fire to the calmer light of a lamp that burns eternally. And now Fanny has returned to conquer over again her rebellious subjects of England, who, since her flight over the broad Atlantic, have owned the allegiance of other queens of the dance—of the swan-like Taglioni, of the Hebe-lipped Cerito, and of the dove-eyed, slopy-winged Carlotta. And, not these alone have been worshipped, but the daring Grahn, the quick-footed Rosati, the astonished Marie Taglioni, have won their moments of empire—the first with a bound; the second with a forget-me-not sown by the feet; the third with a look of most expressive inexpression. But Fanny has returned to her dominions, charioted in fame, and has resolved to regain the footing she has lost. On Saturday her fickle, faithless admirers assembled, in vast multitudes, to scoff at her pretensions. Fanny appeared, robed in the splendour of eternal youth. Never looked she more coquettish, more pretty, more archly mutine, (mutinous, don't hit it). She defied the vain-glorious rebels to resist her. But their hearts at first were as stone. Seldom has a colder reception been accorded to an immortal artiste—for Fanny is immortal if there be divinity in twinkling steps.

Nothing daunted, Fanny mimed and flitted about the stage with a nonchalance that was combined of coquetry and art, and seemed to care, for the nonce, for nothing so little as for the audience. She cast a pretty look of disdain at the muddy-pated crowd, as they fixed upon her their vacant eyes, fit outlets for the emptiness of their hearts, with apparent unconcern. But Fanny had made up her mind to shame them at one coup. She spied out little Perrot, who sat in one of the boxes, gazing at her with a look of mingled sympathy and astonishment—sympathy for the great creature who stood before him unacknowledged, astonishment at the pig-like stupidity of the mob. She spied out little Perrot, and she said within herself—"Perrot is my audience—he is the greatest artist in the world—he alone understands me—and to Perrot alone will I dance." And with wonderful respect for Perrot, wonderful contempt for the audience, and wonderful unconcern for herself, this creature of a thousand triumphs, this fruitful mistress of the dance, Terpsichore's chosen emissary, the incarnation of the conglomerate attributes of all the Graces, moved leisurely to the back of the scene, and made her ready, in a pose, to accomplish her first step in the pas de trois. She danced! There was one hand to clap—one mouth to cheer! It was the hand and the mouth of the whole crowd, that, as some gigantic animal, roared and shouted with an ecstasy of delight. Encore! Encore!! Encore!!! was the unanimous cry. But no—Fanny was not such a butterfly. There must be time for her heaving bosom to subside—there must be time for her throbbing heart to cease its knocking. The excitement of resolve had for awhile stayed the anger and vexation that beat vainly their prison doors for egress—but that over, the triumph won, the infidels abashed, the fame retrieved, the talent avenged of the insult that had humbled it—and like strong waters stayed by an artificial dam, the dam removed, Fanny's blood rushed in torrents to her heart—her dead feelings burst their cerements and rose again to vigorous life, almost choking her with utterance. For awhile, she stood moveless and resolute, hardly deigning to acknowledge, by the slightest inclination of her charming head, the clamorous acclamations of the multitude. Fanny's soul thirsted for revenge, and she drank of the overflowing cup until she had emptied it to the very dregs. Then by degrees her bosom ceased its heaving, her heart its knocking, her blood its rushing, her pulse its blazing—then by degrees composure came over her like a soft vision, and its tranquil light beamed upon her expressive features. At first a pout of pretty irony—then a smile of sweet complacency—then a little frown that curled itself up in a corner of her brow like one of the good-natured devils of the German mythos—then a look that flashed the full consciousness of victory—and then she condescended to repeat the dance. A more complete and astounding triumph we never witnessed. And—Reader—if you could have heard little Perrot applaud, and have seen the content that sat upon his face, it would have done your heart good.

The divertissement produced for the appearance of Mdle. Ellsler is called La Bouquetière de Venise. It is slight and pretty. There is no attempt at a plot, and we shall, therefore, make no attempt to describe it. It served to exhibit the excellencies of the danseuse, and that was enough and a feast in all conscience. The principal dances were of course those in which Fanny Ellsler took a part. The first, a Pas de trois, contained the step we have recorded, in which the great artiste put the unfeeling mob to shame; the second, a Grande Pas de Masque, gave Fanny an opportunity of acting as well as dancing; and in teasing and perplexing an unhappy suitor, she displayed all the coquetry and graceful pantomime of which she is so consummate a mistress. The moment of throwing off the mask and discovering her identity, was glorious—the moon, emerging from behind an envious cloud, is not more beautiful than was Fanny at that instant. In short, Fanny Ellsler, both as a mimist and a dancer, is all her incomparable self. She never looked better, danced better, or acted better; and those myriad sparkling steps, "like light dissolved in star-showers," which characterise her style, and have long been, and must for ever be the despair of all who would emulate her excellencies, were there in all their ancient glory. Her pointing is miraculous as of yore; her gestures are as graceful and as full of meaning; her invention is as fertile and inexhaustible; her movements are as agile and quick; her looks as intelligent and fascinating as ever. The time is yet far distant when Ellsler shall find her rival. That she will endow Carlotta Grisi with her mantle we have little doubt, but that the enchanting Esmeralda may have a long time to wait is our earnest wish, and we have little doubt her own—for there is no jealousy or envy in the etherial Giselle!

The ballet, or divertissement, which was the great event of the evening, was preceded by the Puritani, with the same cast as on the Thursday. Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and suite were present, as was also His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who exhibited unmistakeable symptoms of delight at the singing of Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini.

On Tuesday the Italiana in Algeri was repeated, and Signor Marini having recovered from his indisposition, we had an opportunity of judging of his true merits. This artist possesses one of the most exquisite bass voices we ever listened to. It is rich, full, and mellow, and calls to mind, strongly, the quality of Zuchelli's voice, in the best days of that once popular singer. Signor Marini is an excellent artist in every respect, and although performing a part foreign to the line assigned him when engaged as a serious buffo, in the role of Mustapha he exhibited capabilities of a rare kind. His manly person was seen to great advantage in the Turkish costume, and his deep, full-toned, and flexible voice was of the greatest possible service in the concerted music. Signor Marini displayed admirable taste in his singing of the favourite duet, "Se inclinassi," with Signor Salvi, by the manner in which he adapted his voice so as to make it blend in the piano passages with those of the tenor. It showed that the clever basso had no desire to exhibit the power of his voice to the detriment of the music, and at the expense of the more delicate singer; a practice, we are sorry to say, too often indulged in by those who could afford to be modest on such occasions. Of Signor Rovere we can merely refer to what we have already said, leaving to another opportunity, when we have heard and seen him in a character, which will more legitimately tax his vocal and histrionic power, to discuss his merits at greater length. Signor Salvi was as excellent as on the first night; and Alboni more wonderful than ever. It is impossible to speak in exaggerated terms of the qualifications of this accomplished artist. Her cavatina in the second act was one of the most perfect specimens of vocalization we have ever heard. The opera was admirably rendered as a whole, the efficiency of the orchestra and chorus enhancing the general effect.

The opera was followed by the Bouquetiere de Venise, in which Fanny Ellsler was as incomparable as ever; and by the last act of the Reine des Fees, in which the elegant Dumilatre displayed her graceful talent to the greatest advantage. On Thursday, Semiramide was repeated for the fifth time, by general desire. Grisi was in magnificent voice, and never sang more splendidly. Alboni was equally fine, and both the great artists obtained repeated recalls during the performance. Owing to the length of the opera, the ballet performances were confined to La Bouquetiere de Venise; but the inimitable Fanny Ellsler is, in her own charming person, equal to a whole ballet, and she never danced better than on this occasion. Though it was the second appearance of Jenny Lind, at Her Majesty's Theatre, the house was immensely crowded.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday, I Due Foscari was given for the last time during the present season. For the sake of the music we are glad of this; but for the sake of Coletti we are sorry. The Doge is his great part, and we know of few things finer than his singing and acting in the last scene. Fraschini is also heard to very great advantage in this opera, and has gained considerably on the public since its production. Madame Montenegro is scarcely less to be admired for her impersonation of the character of Lucretia, a performance in which energy and grace are happily combined. The usual honours were accorded to the principal actors, and at the fall of the curtain Coletti reappeared, leading on Madame Montenegro. A divertissement followed, in which was combined the pas de cinq, from Cerito's own ballet of Rosida, produced, as our readers will recollect, last season, in which the fair danseuse was assisted by M. St. Leon, Mdles. Cassan, James, and Honoré; a grand pas, composed and executed by Lucile Grahn, supported by the same triad of coryphées, and the characteristic dance called La Manola, performed with admirable spirit by Cerito and St. Léon. A selection from La Favorita followed, in which Gardoni and Bouché officiated, and the picturesque ballet of Théa, with Rosati, Marie Taglioni, and Paul Taglioni, as the chief exponents, concluded the entertainments of the evening.

Tuesday was the evening fixed for the first appearance of Mademoiselle Jenny Lind. The excitement which heralded this important event beggars description. The prices offered and paid for boxes and stalls were fabulous. Some speculators evidently outdid themselves, for on the evening there were some dozen or more boxes empty. We were not sorry to see this, for we hold it to be unfair that the public should be obliged to pay through the nose for every good thing, while it has been paying the regular prices for matters less attractive. On our way to the theatre we were impeded at every step by the crowds of idle gazers anxious to catch, if possible, a glimpse of the Swedish Nightingale as she entered at the stage door. The Haymarket and the adjacent streets were actually gorged with vehicles, from the armorialised carriage of the aristocrat to the humble cab of the plebeian. It was with no small difficulty that we forced our way in—but when we arrived, the sight that welcomed our eyes well repaid the trouble we had found in penetrating to the interior. The house was one living mass of souls, and on the face of every individual present was the expression of one thought, of one idea—they were going to hear Jenny Lind—they were going to see the Nightingale of Sweden. The part selected for her debut was that of Alice, in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, an opera to which the composer chiefly owes his fame. The music of this opera is well-known in England, and we are spared the pains of an analysis, but a word or two about Meyerbeer himself may not be out of place here.

Meyerbeer's art career has been a singular one. A fellow student of Carl Maria Von Weber, under the notorious Abbé Vogler, he commenced by imbibing the stiff and pedantic notions of that brilliant but superficial empiric. His first operas exhibited abundant dryness and a false show of depth. These neither moved the heart of the populace nor excited the respect of the truly learned. Like the early operas of Weber, they were vapid inflations, without melody, or soul. That they are now forgotten is hardly to be regretted, since they contained nothing worth remembering. As dramatic compositions they were feeble and insipid, and as displays of contrapuntal profundity as worthless as the productions of the Abbé Vogler himself, who in the manufacture of his overture upon a subject of three notes, (so rabidly extolled by his disciples) simply manifested his inability to find an agreeable melody that should consist of more. Both Weber and Meyerbeer, who have since become illustrious, suffered irredeemably from the defective mode of instruction, adopted by this eccentric system-maker—a kind of musical Paracelsus, but without the genius of that coaster on the borders of philosophy. Even their masterpieces show it, in vagueness of form, want of connection, and superfluous redundancy of style. Meyerbeer, a man of less faith than his celebrated fellow-pupil—who was true to his principles, hollow as they were, to the last—soon found occasion to throw off his allegiance to the Abbé Vogler, and thoroughly to change his style. Enchanted with Tancredi, and some of the earlier operas of Rossini, his mind became filled with new ideas and new notions of art. As impressionable as water, and as unstable, the talent of Meyerbeer will ever reflect the form and colour of whatever outward influence may predominate for the time. The originality which he seems to possess is not the offspring of spontaneous feeling but the result of a certain obstinacy of volition, which by long exercise has enabled him to make old forms wear the aspect of novelty, by exaggerating their characteristics, or by omitting some points essential to their symmetry. Thus, in his hands, a melody that would at first sight appear but a vulgar tune, affects a kind of exclusiveness on the strength of a quaint turn of cadence, an unusual distribution of a chord or two in the harmony, or absolute oddity in the orchestral arrangement. Innumerable examples of this kind of treatment, scattered over the surface of a large work, such as a grand opera, endow the whole with a distorted something which is not originality but its shadow. Meyerbeer is for ever straining for effect. His melodies are rarely fresh and genuine; they do not, like Mozart's, flow from the soul, as water from the hidden springs. His effects are seldom vigorous and natural illustrations of sentiment or incident, but, like the images which delirium paints upon darkness, vague, incoherent, and without manifest purpose. Yet, with all this, Meyerbeer is a remarkable man. Influenced, himself, by the brilliant models of his time, he influences others in his turn, and may be said to have originated a school, at the head of which stands Halévy, the French composer. After writing one or two operas, however, under the temporary influence of the "Swan of Pesaro," with whose sensuous fancies he was for the time intoxicated, Meyerbeer became bitten with the modern German style, which may be regarded as the actual eclectic, albeit it is but a poor representative of the universal. Il Crociato in Egitto, the second best opera of the composer, was the result of this new mania. There we find the Italian cantilena without its sentiment, the French tune, without its sparkle, and the German harmony without its depth. But the instrumentation is entirely Meyerbeerian, and the whole has a charm that is not easily definable. The next coup d'essai of Meyerbeer was at the Académie Royale de Musique in Paris. The successes of Spontini and Rossini at this institution—erst the temple of Gluck, Méhul and Cherubini, and since the arena of Auber's most dazzling triumphs, La Muette de Portici, and Gustave III.—had been followed by a dearth, exhibited in the failure of several grand operas consecutively. Meyerbeer was called to the rescue. His Robert le Diable had been composed with an eye to the great singers who were then the stars of the Académie—Falcon, Cinti Damoreau, Nourrit, and Levasseur. It was the work of long and arduous toil. Meyerbeer was conscious that his chef-d'œuvre was now in his portfolio; and it was resolved on all sides to bestow the minutest care on its production. Nine months were devoted to the rehearsals, during the whole of which period it was the unanimous topic of public interest and conversation. At length it was produced, and in a style of splendour unexampled even at the Académie. The mise en scène was gorgeous and magnificent, and the celebrated Taglioni, then in the zenith of her popularity, was the principal danseuse in the ballet scenes. Great as had been the success of Il Crociato, that of Robert was far greater. It was Meyerbeer's grand triumph. He gave, from his own pocket, a sum, little short of twenty-five thousand francs, towards the expenses of getting it up. Crowds flocked to the Opera, and the fortunes of the Académie were completely renovated. Robert was shortly afterwards brought out in London, at both the national theatres—Bishop presiding at Drury Lane, and Rophino Lacy at Covent Garden. Subsequently, in 1832, it was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, when under the management of Mr. Monck Mason, with the original French company, and in the French language—but, strange to say, its success was less brilliant in that fashionable theatre than at the more plebeian temples of the drama. Robert le Diable, in a short time, became known in every musical town of Germany and France, emasculate Italy alone being deaf to its elsewhere irresistible attractions. Its melodies were the delight of salons and the aliment of the orgues de Barbarie. The popularity hinted at in the Crociato was confirmed in the Robert, and Meyerbeer was forthwith installed among the musical "Penates." The Huguenots, the only opera he has since produced at the Académie—albeit there are still two new ones that remain in manuscript in his portfolio—has not increased his fame. It has not the strong dramatic interest, the picturesque melody, nor the vigorous freshness of the Robert; while it abounds in experiments of harmony and orchestration that are decided failures, and in fantastic passages only remarkable as convulsive efforts at originality, ending in the result of being musically disagreeable. The Robert must, unless the Prophète or the Africain snatch away its laurels, remain the acknowledged masterpiece of Meyerbeer. But for the King of Prussia, at whose command Meyerbeer, Director of the music at the Opera of Berlin, wrote the Camp of Silesia, the composer of Robert would have remained silent unto this day. The cause is easily explained. Meyerbeer is a wealthy man, and writes con amore. His sensitiveness verges on the ridiculous. He is never satisfied with the resources that are placed at his disposal, and fifty rehearsals of an opera are not enough to content him. Of the singers who have recently figured at the Académie, Duprez, the famous tenor, at their head, Meyerbeer has no opinion, and he has consistently declined to trust either of his MS. operas to their interpretation. The manner in which he writes places his arias altogether out of the reach of ordinary vocalists, and the massive fulness of his orchestration demands lungs of brass to strive against. This is the defect of modern opera, which must shortly decay for want of singers to interpret it. The style of voicing and instrumentation that has prevailed in Italy and France, since Rossini ceased to compose, is gradually destroying all the available voices. The legitimate canto of the operas of Mozart and Cimarosa, which also characterises the early and mediæval operas of Rossini, Mercadante, and Donizetti, is now fast fading into oblivion; but, it is much to be feared, that what has usurped its place is neither so natural nor so musical. If Verdi continue writing successfully, there will not be a voice in all Italy in ten years. Is not this inevitable consequence of the present mode of voicing worthy the consideration of composers? Without voices there can be no singers, and without singers no operas. But, we have little doubt, that modern opera, as it now stands, will speedily die of its own excess, and that a new and healthier form of dramatic composition, combining the imperishable principles established by Mozart, with modern form and colour, and modern taste and sentiment, will arise, Phoenix-like, from its ashes.

However, the public interest, on Tuesday night, was not in Meyerbeer's opera, but in the representative of Alice—Madlle. Jenny Lind. The opening chorus of knights, spirited as it is, was listened to with apathy by the immense crowd—all anxious for one thing—all bent upon one object. Raimbault's pretty ballad, "Jadis régnait," although sung by the especial favourite, Gardoni, passed equally without notice. Staudigl's mysterious ones in Bertram, and Fraschini's valiant bearing in Robert, were equally overlooked. There was but one desire in the bosoms of all present—and when that was gratified, as Alice was forced on by the pages of Robert, demanding protection and appealing for pity, the one shout that burst spontaneously from three thousand throats made the roof of the edifice vibrate and tremble. It was a multitude of insensate madmen, in a sea of hats and handkerchiefs. We never recollect such a sight within the walls of a theatre, or without them. The object of all this enthusiasm, though evidently moved by its exhibition, responded to it modestly and humbly, saluting and bending to the audience with a girl-like grace, that, before she sang a note, conquered the suffrages of at least one-half of the audience. The other half—the stony-hearted ones—waited to hear, and then to judge. There was little in the music by which the vocalist could distinguish herself previous to the romance, "Va dit-elle." Yet she found means to thrill her hearers by the earnest pathos with which she declaimed the recitative, wherein Alice confides to Robert the news of his mother's death. Her "Piu non vi lice, nè vederlo, nè udirlo" went to every heart, and at once proclaimed the presence of a great artist, and a soul full of poetry. The romance sung, gave us an opportunity of forming some notion of Jenny Lind's qualities as a vocalist, although the repeated interruptions of the excited crowd, and the nervousness attendant on so critical a moment, stood much in the way of the possibility of arriving at a sound opinion. The exquisite purity, and bell-like fullness of tone, with which the first five sustained notes of the romance—B, E, G sharp, B, E—were delivered, at once gave us a notion of the beauty of that voice, in the praises of which so much of the ink of criticism has been used, and so many of Rumour's tongues have wagged. The general reading of the romance was as delicately pure as it was fervent and natural. The cadences at the end of each couplet were quite novel, and executed with the utmost taste and finish. The second couplet was prefaced by a long shake, and another cadence of singular elegance. All these ornamental matters, and the general excellence that marked the entire interpretation of the romance—impaired as it was, slightly, by a nervousness that was inevitable under the circumstances—threw the audience into such a paroxysm of rapture, that they continued shouting, clapping, bravaing, and waving hats and handkerchiefs about, for upwards of three minutes. Our own opinion, however, albeit we were irresistibly compelled to join in the applause, was not quite formed on the subject. The remainder of the scene with Bertram, which is all comprised in recitative, was admirably declaimed and acted. The moment at which Alice perceives Bertram, and starts back affrighted, exclaiming, "Cielo chi veggo," was exquisitely embodied by Jenny Lind. Her declaring that he resembles a likeness of Satan that she has seen in a picture, still frightened, and yet half-ashamed of her weakness, was equally good. Not less admirable was her exit, shuddering as she passes near to Bertram, yet irresistibly compelled to turn back and gaze at him as she slowly glides away. Her disappearance was followed by long and reiterated applause. In the mind of the audience, Jenny Lind was, almost, if not quite, confirmed the Jenny Lind of Fame's repute; albeit her talent as yet had been but half disclosed.

The second scene in which Alice appears—that of the glen among the rocks of St. Irene—completely set doubt at rest, and proved Jenny Lind to be all that has been said of her by those who speak without raving in unintelligible hyperbole. The way in which she twice repeated the name "Rambaldo," as she wound her way down the rock's side, swelling the note gradually into forte, and then as gradually diminishing it to the nicest piano, was truly charming. At the close of the recitative of which this forms the commencement, she introduced a cadence so entirely new, and at the same time so intrinsically elegant, and executed with such finished delicacy, that it drew down peals of applause. Her delivery of the first part of the ballad to which this leads, "Quand je quittai la Normandie," seemed to us unfinished; she did not stay long enough on the first B flat, and took the G and F that terminate the first half of the first half phrase somewhat abruptly, thereby damaging the even flow of rhythm which is one of the chief charms of this simple melody. These spots in an ordinary singer we should have passed without noticing, but every note that is uttered by Jenny Lind has sufficient value to be criticised. The rest of the song—excepting the cadence at the end of the first couplet, which was less elegant than most of her cadences, and was executed with less absolute facility and perfection, admitted of nothing but unqualified admiration. The pianissimo echo of the flute phrase on the words "Ahimè! l'attendo ancor," was delicious. The cadenza with which she prefaced the second couplet, holding a high F for a long time, and increasing the volume until it filled the whole theatre with vibration, and then, when you thought she had finished, and no more breath was in her, taking the G above as the first note of a florid and elaborate flight of vocal display, leading ultimately to the reprise of the theme, was little less than astounding. The cadenza with which she terminated the second couplet was even more beautiful and more wonderful; and the pianissimo shake on C, D, leading to the concluding notes, was executed with a clearness, equality, and perfection for which we should in vain seek for a precedent. Mdle. Lind begins the shake on the highest note, and rounds it off with wonderful finish and completeness, calculating the exigencies of rhythm and accentuation to a nicety. It is unnecessary to speak of the applause with which this delicious display of vocalisation was greeted. In fact, it would be somewhat difficult to find words big enough for the task, and we are tired of recording the raptures of an audience that so often indiscreetly lavishes its enthusiasm on mediocrity. Suffice it that both couplets were encored unanimously, and both fully merited the compliment. Jenny Lind's triumph was now complete, and it did not require anything more to establish her in the highest opinion of the best judges assembled in the house.

But we have many more things to praise. The acting of the whole of this scene proved Mdle. Jenny Lind to be as great a histrionic as a vocal artist. Her terror on discovering the horrors of the cavern was impressive in the extreme. In the duet with Bertram her acting was as fine as the finest efforts of Rachel or Grisi, those twin mistresses of the dramatic and lyric stage. As passages recalling themselves forcibly to the memory, we may specialise the half-stifled cry with which she uttered the words, "A mezza notte-misero," and further on, "Quale orrore! mi reggo appena," when she overhears that at midnight her foster brother, Robert, must be sacrificed to the powers of evil. And when Bertram seizes her by the wrist and savagely asks her what she has seen and heard, her answer, "Nulla nulla," was terrible in its truth. Her fragile form quivered with emotion, and the words seemed to force themselves involuntarily from her lips. Her fleeing to the cross for protection, at the approach of Bertram, was wonderfully fine; and her attitude betokening a mixture of terror and resolution, was singularly picturesque and beautiful. Nor can we pass over without mention the earnest devotion with which she pronounced the words, "Il Cielo è meco," and the startling intensity that marked her exclamation of "Vien Roberto," at the approach of her foster-brother. Her singing in this duet—which, by the way, is one of the best compositions in the opera—was quite as fine as her acting. The cadenza a due was so perfectly intonated, and delivered with such animation and boldness, that the effect was quite electric. In the unaccompanied trio, "Crudel momento," with Robert and Bertram, we remarked with what extraordinary facility Mdle. Lind played with the high notes, dwelling upon C in alt. with the utmost ease, and then taking D above it, as the commencement of a florid passage, without the slightest appearance of effort. Her acting after this trio—involving her determination to stay by Robert and brave the danger, and her subsequent hurried exit—was beyond praise.

Alice's next and final appearance is in the grand trio of the last act, the best piece of music in the opera. Here Mademoiselle Lind's acting and singing were of a piece with the rest of her performance. If we must specialise points where all was great, let us refer to the impressive manner in which she addressed Robert while tendering him his mother's testament:—"Roberto, prendi, figlio ingrato,"—her impassioned fervor in the prayer, "S'è in te pietade, o Cielo," and the heavenly enthusiasm with which she shrieked out the words, "Mezza Notté! ah! che il Cielo lo salvò!" when she hears the roll of the midnight drum, and knows that Robert is saved. Again, and to conclude, no words can convey the infinite meaning of her gesture in the last scene, when seeing Robert kneel at the altar, she gives vent to her delight at having been the instrument of saving her foster-brother from destruction, conveying, without a word, by the mere poetry of motion, as much as could be conveyed by all the eloquence of a poet's inspiration. The curtain fell amidst a torrent of enthusiasm, and Jenny Lind was called forward again—no less than three distinct times. But of this we take little account. We should have been equally delighted had her performance not received a single hand.

Judging, then, by her performance in Robert le Diable, it will be easy to perceive, that our opinion of Mdlle. Jenny Lind differs materially from that which we felt constrained to offer upon her Norma, two years and a half ago, in a letter addressed to this journal from Cologne. We then considered her vastly overrated; we are now of a totally opposite opinion. Whether it be that Norma is a character out of her speciality, or that she has made wonderful progress in the time that has elapsed since we then heard her, we are not prepared to say; but that one or the other is the case, we have too much reliance upon our own judgment, when formed after calm consideration, to doubt. Certain it is, that as an actress Mdlle. Lind now ranks amongst the highest—and that as a singer few can compete with her. The exquisite purity, fulness, quality, and flexibility of her vocal organ—the consummate art she possesses in the leggere, which the Italians rightly prize as the greatest vocal requisite—her almost irreproachable intonation—her prodigious facility in executing florid passages—and the numberless beauties of her style and expression, proclaim her right to associate with the greatest mistresses of the art of singing that the world has produced.

Of the general performance of the opera, on Tuesday night, we would rather say nothing. From this implied censure we can make few exceptions. But there was much to palliate the imperfections of the execution. The fatigue of constant and long rehearsals, and the excitement dependent on the issue of so important an event, upon which hung the ruin or renovation of a great and magnificent establishment, being enough, in all conscience, to excuse the artists and the subordinates, who naturally felt deeply interested in the matter. It is but just to state our opinion, that with any other conductor than the talented and indefatigable Balfe, the opera would never have proceeded to the end without a dead stop.

On Thursday, matters wore a different aspect. Mdlle. Lind renewed her triumph of the previous night, and the other artists seemed to have recovered all their lost composure. Staudigl, whose engagement at this theatre has been one of the wisest steps of the administration, was magnificent. He is undoubtedly the best living representative of Bertram, and his acting and singing on this occasion were worthy of his name and reputation. Fraschini was far better in Robert than we had anticipated. Gardoni's Rambaldo was exquisitely natural, and his duet with Bertram, "Ah l'honnête homme," was inimitably acted, and sung with the most finished art. The opera, as it stands, is but fragmentarily represented. We suggest, therefore, as a further curtailment, the excision of the whole of the third act, in which poor Madame Castellan has to sing to great disadvantage. How much better would it have been to have given the opera entire, with a ballet soigné, in which Mr. Lumley's whole choregraphic force might have been employed. The performance would have lasted long enough to preclude the necessity of an after-ballet, and Meyerbeer's dignity would not have been offended by the mutilation of his acknowledged chef d'œuvre. It is to be hoped that the run of Robert will have concluded, ere the celebrated composer makes his promised appearance in England, or we would be loth to answer for the consequences. To a certainty, Meyerbeer would turn Covent-Gardenite forthwith. However, the band and chorus were much more like the thing on the second night, and with Mr. Balfe's vigilance and ability we have hopes that the third performance will be still better. At all events, Jenny Lind has saved the fortunes of Her Majesty's Theatre, and that is everything. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present on both occasions.

The ballet on Tuesday and Thursday consisted of a divertissement, called Une Soirée du Carnaval, in which the talents of Cerito, Lucile Grahû, St. Léon, and the principal coryphées were employed in the exposition of various dances.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"An English Harvest Home," the words by G. LINNÆUS BANKS, Esq. the Music composed by GEORGE DIXON. "The Stricken Oak," song written by JOHN DUMAN, Esq.; the music composed and dedicated to his pupils, by GEORGE DIXON.—COVENTRY & HOLLIER.

Mr. George Dixon's two ballads are very nicely written, and have pleasing tunes. They are easy for the voice. "The Stricken Oak," in 3-4 is the best of the two. The poetry in either is barely tolerable.

"I wander o'er moorland and lea," song of the Zephyr, written by R. W. HAMMOND, composed by L. LAVENU—CHAPPELL.

Very simple and very pretty. Mr. Lavenue has hit the words admirably. His ballad throughout is as light and aerial as the Zephyr itself. The poetry is neat.

"The Wood Nymphs," duet, sung by the Misses BIRCH and E. BIRCH, written by A. W. HAMMOND. Composed by G. A. MACFARREN.—CHAPPELL.

An exquisitely graceful effusion, full of musical points of interest, admirably voiced, and entirely expressing the sentiment of the words. Mr. Macfarren is now our most successful composer of chamber duets and the present charming specimen is, in every respect, worthy of his reputation. Simple, natural, and flowing, as is the melody, it does not prevent the accomplished musician from giving us some new and beautiful points of harmony that declare no common hand to have been at work.

"Theory of the New Patent Diatonic Flute; by ABEL SICCAMÀ. B. A. Patentee, CRAMER, BEALE, & Co.

The work before us is not a mere key to the newly invented flute, whose peculiarities and essential properties it lays down and explains at large, but enters philosophically into the theory of sounds, and elucidates with sufficient clearness the causes, harmonically speaking, that have long stood in the way of rendering the flute perfect in its tone in every key. There is much good musical discourse struck out in the introduction, and the author is evidently a man who has looked beyond flutes and their stops. To the flute player, and to such as are anxious about obtaining perfect intonation on that instrument, The Theory of the Patent Diatonic Flute will be found extremely interesting, if not highly useful in the perusal; and to such we may honestly recommend the work. Of the Patent Diatonic Flute itself we can say nothing, never having heard one.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MUSICAL MOUSE.—A few days ago a gentleman, residing in South Moulton Street, sent for a tuner to put his piano to rights, which had suddenly taken it into its head to lose nearly all its tone. Upon removing the sound-board, lo! a mouse had built its nest beneath the wires and had brought forth four young ones. The leather of the hammers were nearly all eaten away.

Mr. Wilson's ENTERTAINMENTS.—The fourth of these interesting soirées was given on Monday evening, in the Music Hall, Store-street. Mr. Wilson introduced several novelties, including "O! Waly, Waly," "Despairing Mary," and the lament "McLeod of Dungevan." The latter is quite a gem, and was exquisitely sung by Mr. Wilson; indeed we seldom recollect to have heard him in better voice. Mr. Land presided at the pianoforte with his accustomed ability.

Mr. VINCENT WALLACE, the popular composer, purposes taking a Benefit at Drury-lane, on the 17th inst., on which occasion one of his recent operas will be performed, and afterwards a grand concert, in which he will be assisted by several eminent artists, and the Beneficiaire will play a grand fantasia for the pianoforte, of his own composition. The Dedication of Mr. Wallace's opera of Matilda of Hungary has been graciously accepted by the King of the Belgians. This opera is to be produced at Vienna in August next. Mr. Wallace, in consequence of the delicate state of his health, purposes taking a tour this summer through Italy and Germany, during which period he will be occupied in the composition of two new operas. He will locate himself in Vienna in August, to superintend the production of his opera of Matilda of Hungary, which is to be produced in great splendour in that city.

HUNGARIAN INSTRUMENTAL VOCALISTS.—Among the greatest novelties of the day, we are assured that the four Hungarians, Messrs. Weis, Zorer, Schwarz, and Grunzwag stand conspicuous. If we are to accredit the French and German journals, they are the wonder of the age. Their success in Paris has been so great that Louis Philippe, before whom they performed, honoured them with an especial recommendatory epistle to Queen Victoria on their departure for England. In compliance with, or in compliment to the French King, the Hungarian Vocalists have been already honoured with a hearing by Her Majesty and Prince Albert, both of whom evinced, we are told, great delight at their singing. Their first public performance takes place this morning at the Haymarket theatre, when a grand concert will be given, in which the Hungarian brothers will sing solos, concerted pieces, and give their imitations on wind and stringed instruments. We shall speak of these artists more at large when we have heard them.

MISS EMILY GRANT gave a farewell soirée musicale at the Music Hall, Sheffield, on Friday evening, April 30th, under the immediate patronage of the Mayoress and ladies of Sheffield. The Hall was very much crowded on the occasion, the fair artist being supported by her numerous friends and admirers. The programme comprised some capital music, selections being made from the best masters, and the performance, on the whole, was highly satisfactory. The beautiful recitation and aria from the Orfeo of Gluck, "Che faro senza," was given with great judgment and expression by Miss Grant, and gained her considerable applause. Miss Grant was equally good in the grand scena from Fidelio, "Sweet Hope, I have no friend but thee." She was also extremely happy in several other pieces, in the majority of which she was rapturously encored. Miss Grant is a very great favourite with the good folk of Sheffield, who step forward on all such occasions as the present to pay homage to her as an excellent artist. The rest of the performance demands no particular notice, if we except the singing of Miss Seale, a pupil of Miss Grant's, who made a very promising debut.—From a Correspondent.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA FABBRI, in the admired Pas, La Castigliani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

A FRENCH CRITIC IN LONDON.

THERE being nothing to talk about in art-matters at Paris, a daily journal, called Le Constitutionnel, has dispatched its feuilletoniste, Monsieur P. A. de Fiorentino, to London, for the purpose of going everywhere and describing everything, in a series of letters, called "Lettres de Londres." This is the first visit M. Fiorentino has paid to England—but, doubtless, in less than six weeks, Le Constitutionnel will be enlightened thoroughly on the state of music, the drama and the fine arts, in this country. The French critics, especially those of Paris, have a marvellous facility in exploring the short roads to knowledge, and in respect to swallow, are decided ecclectics. M. Fiorentino is one of the liveliest and most pleasantly loquacious of the body, and combines, in his own literary person, the brevity of Janin, the solidity of Achard, the vivacity of Fétis père, the ingenuousness of Gauthier and the musical depth of Henri Blanchard; the whole smoothed down and rendered palatable by that compound of modesty and a desire to learn which is the character of Italian critics in general. We shall, therefore, look for much agreeable reading in the "Lettres de Londres," and have little doubt of being enabled, from time to time, to present our readers with divers epistolary bonnes bouches for their peculiar relish. While on the subject, however, let us implore M. Fiorentino not to be too severe on us poor English. Every word he says will have its weight, and as we do not wish to stand in a worse light than is necessary before the nations of the world, we hope he will be indulgent, and not swamp us in an epigram. We know that in matters of art we are far in the rear of French acquirement; and that in profundity we are, to the Parisians, as a bowl of soup to a bottomless well. But we make so bold as to remind M. Fiorentino that the mere fact of his coming amongst us for the purpose of showing us up to the consideration of the volatile country which he has made his own, argues that there is something in us worth noticing. That he may criticise us tenderly and charitably is our earnest petition.

The first letter of M. Fiorentino has missed us, or rather we have missed it, and can, therefore, say nothing about it. The second is d'propos of the début of Jenny Lind. The description is eloquent, complete, bustling, and readable. M. Fiorentino is in raptures with the Swedish Nightingale, but abuses everything else. This may be excused, on the plea that the letter was written at two o'clock on Wednesday morning, as is shown by the words with which it opens:—"Il est deux heures de matin: je vous écris en sortant du théâtre pour ne pas perdre une seule impression de cette longue et curieuse soirée." But as the main interest of the letter hangs upon Jenny Lind, we shall proceed, at once, to quote M. Fiorentino's opinions on that point, for which, as they are all favourable, Mr. Lumley will, no doubt, feel obliged to us. The brilliant feuilletoniste thus describes the manner of her reception: (We give it in plain English, with many apologies to M. Fiorentino for the lameness of our translation).

"To describe the welcome accorded her were impossible. The explosion lasted twenty minutes (!) and was only arrested, at intervals, to be resumed with increased violence. At last the cantatrice felt wholly at a loss how to express her feelings and her thankfulness; she bowed to the earth, joined her hands together, lifted her eyes to Heaven, advanced to the foot-lights, turned towards the boxes with an expression of modesty, gratitude, and happiness, which sat very well upon her mild and candid countenance. Jenny Lind's features are not regular; but she has very beautiful hair of a light brown colour, and blue eyes which sparkle and flash whenever her physiognomy becomes animated. Her voice entirely fills the theatre; not the lightest tone of it is lost. The whole of her upper octave is of surpassing beauty, purity, freshness, and brilliancy. The middle notes, slightly veiled at the beginning, as soon as the voice is exerted, become as beautiful and pure as the higher ones. Jenny Lind must have an admirable talent to sing as she sang, amidst the emotions of an evening the like of which will not present itself twice in her entire artist-life. Could you but have heard her first romance, 'Va dit elle!'—what taste, what refinement, what elegance in the minutest details, what firmness of style, what truth of intonation, and with all this what a comprehension of the scene, what passion, what fire, what soul!—for Jenny Lind is such an actress as was Falcon in her best days. The sceptical said, before her début—'Wait and hear; her voice, which is enchanting in a small room, will not fill a large space; she will not gain in London, or in Paris, the prodigious successes she has obtained in Germany.' But now the experiment has been made; in London and Paris, as in Italy and everywhere else, Jenny Lind will inflame the crowd and captivate the artists. Though previously unacquainted with the Italian language, she acquired it in three weeks (Ky.) and pronounces it to perfection. Her organization is one of the richest, happiest, and finest endowed that I ever remember in the dramatic world. Heaven has been prodigal towards this child of the North, and Art has charged itself with the accomplishment of what Nature has so well begun."

The compliment to Mdlle. Lind's Italian is the more flattering since it proceeds from one who is an Italian by birth, a translator of Dante, an editor of the Corsaire-Satan, and a feuilletoniste of the Constitutionnel. But M. Fiorentino has not yet done with the fair Swede. Further on he remarks:—

"Jenny Lind was admirable, beyond all expression, in the duet, and trio of her great scene. You should have seen her clinging to the cross, with a terror that was quite real; raise herself upon her feet, stand erect and thunder-strike the cursed one, with a faith sublime. She was obliged to repeat, three times, the couplets; 'Quand je quittai la Normandie,' a masterpiece of delicacy and grace, and they would have been again re-demanded, but for the energetic cries of, 'No—no—shame—shame!' that proceeded from one part of the audience. It was, indeed, a shame thus to impose upon an artist."

Still further on, M. Fiorentino describes his impressions of Jenny Lind in the last act:—

"Jenny Lind re-appeared, amidst the plaudits of the house, and the horizon once more looked bright. She acted and sang in the final trio—that struggle for supremacy between the genius of evil and the angel of gentleness and innocence—with a power of inspiration, a flow of tenderness, an accent so appealing and irresistible, that the public did like Robert, and threw itself at the feet of the songstress. Meyerbeer himself, in this moment of exultation, would have pardoned everybody. Then the curtain fell, and Britannic enthusiasm was enabled to vent itself with all its strength; clapping of hands and feet, re-calls, showers of bouquets, waving of handkerchiefs, hats thrown into the air" (Qy.—a custom exclusively Neapolitan); "in short they were at a loss what more to do or to imagine to fête the young cantatrice. I have witnessed few examples of a like phrenzy. To conclude, the triumph of Jenny Lind was one of the most brilliant and well-merited in my recollection."

With Jenny Lind the enthusiasm of M. Fiorentino is at an end, and with a few more passages, taken at random, our review of his epistle must end also. Of the general performance of Robert he speaks in terms of unqualified censure. He pummels the band and pummels the chorus. Of the latter's execution, in the drinking chorus of the first act, he asserts, that "it was enough to turn wine into poison, so *aisé*ment and so falsely was it sung." Of Fraschini, M. Fiorentino thus delivers his opinion:—

"Fraschini is un assez beau garçon, of the middle height, muscular and robust; he has a magnificent voice and sings à pleine poitrine with extraordinary facility and power. But the part of Robert is precisely the one which least suits him, and he had to learn it and play it in ten days. (Qy.) Fraschini is no actor; he comes on and goes off the stage like a man sadly embarrassed with his person, and this evening, in particular, his habitual restraint amounted to an absolute torment. He has never seen Robert le Diable performed; he has neither the esprit nor the traditions of his part; he therefore confined his exertions to the occasional utterance of several loud notes, and in the concerted music only was he enabled to display the resources of his admirable tenor voice. After the drinking chorus, Fraschini rose and directing his goblet to the public, exclaimed—'Illustres chevaliers, c'est à vous que je bois.' But the public did not appear to relish his toast, and applauded only with the finger-tips, out of mere courtesy."

Of Staudigl we have a criticism somewhat more elaborate. It runs thus:—

"A moment afterwards, Bertram addresses Robert, in an under-tone, with these words:—'Votre ingrate patrie.' The whole audience appeared to have waited for this point to acknowledge the presence of Staudigl, the celebrated German basso. Applause and prolonged bravos issued from all parts. Staudigl rose slowly from his seat, placed his hand upon his heart, and made two steps towards the foot-lights. His costume was simple and severe; his head-dress was not wanting in originality; it was arranged almost on the top of the skull, the front being nearly bald, a black lock pointing Mephistopheliquement to heaven, as a sign of revolt and pride; moustachios thin and pointed, and beard en fer de lance, gave a sinister length to the visage, and to the lower part of the face a diabolical expression of irony and malice. Staudigl has a voice of rare compass; it descends to the low E flat, and mounts to the G of the tenor" (say A, or B flat of the barytone, friend Fiorentino) "with surprising facility; he has two octaves and a half of perfect equality, fulness, and tone. But he appeared so miserable under the obligation to sing in Italian, that it would be cruelty to judge him by this first essay. His pronunciation is truly comic, and the English, who have not the right to be difficult on the point of Tuscan accent," (why not?) "were themselves scandalised."

Concerning the popular and admirable Gardoni, we have this brief sentence:—

"Gardoni, whom the public, and the women in particular, have taken under their powerful patronage, was long and noisily applauded on his entrée, and sang his ballad and the comic duet in delicious style."

Perhaps no artist will quarrel with the strictures M. Fiorentino thinks proper to make upon the mutilated condition in which Meyerbeer's chef d'œuvre was represented. Let us extract some passages:—

"After the triumphs and re-calls of the first act, I expected Madame Castellan, with a certain degree of inquietude. To sing the air of Isabelle, by the side of Jenny Lind would have been a rough trial for the most proved and confident talent. But judge of my astonishment when the curtain rose upon the third act. An entire act was suppressed without ceremony, and not one voice from among the audience was heard to protest against this incredible mutilation. Oh, Meyerbeer! you did well to remain at Berlin."—"The scene of the nuns had been singularly modified by the Lord Chamberlain. First, the nuns are no longer nuns, but simple dames, who, by the way, appeared to me charming. The corps de ballet is very agreeably composed, and I saw no specimens upon the stage of those figures heteroclitiques, designated in Paris by the sobriquet of 'Rats,' for want of a more courteous appellation to suit them. Moreover, the tombs were suppressed, for the English public would never have tolerated such a profanation." (Had M. Fiorentino made inquiries he would have ascertained the fact that the profanation was tolerated, by the English public, at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, some years, by-gone). "The nuns issue from the two side scenes, upon their chemin de fer," (a remarkably slow-paced one!) "and the Abbess and Robert are reduced to the extremity of playing at dice upon the ground, much to the annoyance of poor Fraschini. The part of the Abbess, who is no longer an Abbess, but a simple châtelaine, is filled by Mlle Rosati, a Milanese danseuse, of admirable talent and high promise. Mlle. Rosati has a very pretty face, very intelligent, and very expressive; she dances with much lightness, vivacity, and entrain. The haut du corps is well formed and is shaped with natural grace. Some of her points were remarkable for precision and vigor. At Paris Mlle. Rosati would be greatly relished. The fourth act has been revised, corrected, and considerably augmented;—I know not by what Vandal, and if I knew the name of the offender I certainly would not point him out for the just vengeance of M. Meyerbeer. Here we stumble upon an old acquaintance which we missed on our way—the air of Isabelle—and, from the style in which it was executed by Madame Castellan, I perfectly understood why it was cut out of the second act, but I could not understand why it was replaced in the fourth. In short, from beginning to end of this unhappy act, Madame Castellan and Fraschini, assisted by the orchestra and chorus, played at who should most effectively plunge a poignard into the bleeding heart of Meyerbeer; and I am sure, for the honour of the country, the Lord Chamberlain will, for the subsequent representations, order the excision of the whole of this act, which can only be regarded as an act of high treason."—"To conclude, the execution of the opera was pitiable. The parts were neither studied nor rehearsed. Staudigl, embarrassed by the Italian tongue, which he mangles frightfully, was far beneath Levasseur, or even Alizard. Fraschini, who walked through this infernal drama with the most candid astonishment, did not understand the first letter of his part. Madame Castellan knows very well what she intends, but her forces betrayed her. Gardoni is a charming Raimbaut; but he has nothing but a ballad and a duet to sing, after which he appears no more in the opera. The choruses reconciled me with those of the Salle Ventadour. I will not speak of the orchestra because I hope that Balfe will finish by en avoir raison. By the way, I forgot to tell you what was the part of Sacerdote, so pompously announced in the programme. In the final scene, Bouché sang with the chorus behind the scenes, 'Gloire à la Providence, &c.' I am not aware whether it be the Lord Chamberlain, or any other lord, who, for these few words, has christened Bouché, 'High Priest'—but, at all events, I have no intention to offer any opposition to it."

The undue severity of this criticism may be tested by our positive assurance that we have frequently witnessed a much worse execution of Robert le Diable in Paris than that memorialized by the hyper-zealous feuilletoniste—and, worse still, we have listened to works of a still more exalted order, such as Guillaume Tell, Der Freischütz, (Robin de Bois), and La Muette de Portici, (Masaniello), mangled in such a villainous manner, that, in comparison, the exhibition at Her Majesty's Theatre was absolute perfection. The candid critic should first pick the mote out of his own eye, and then begin to examine his brother's. Of all cities in the world, the vaunted Paris is the one in which we have presided at the vilest musical desecrations. Moreover, M. Fiorentino, in judging so severely the band of Her Majesty's Theatre, might have found a little oil to pour into his salad of abuse, extracted from the fact that one third of that band is Italian; one third, French; one sixth, Belgian; and one sixth English. We should like to see the renowned Habeneck at the head of such an army and find what he could make of it—whether, like our spirited Balfe, he would have the courage to marshal them to victory, or, like the redoubtable Sir John Falstaff, refuse to march with them through Coventry. If M. Fiorentino would like his own musical criticisms examined with the same severity, we are ready to do it for him—let him but give the word.

One or two more extracts and we have done. The following paragraph admits of a retort somewhat awkward for the epigrammatic champion of the French:—

"The orchestra was conducted, as usual, by Mr. Balfe, who gave himself infinite trouble to make it go properly, and, in spite of his skill, knowledge, and zeal, he only half succeeded. Robert le Diable was got up in ten days and the musicians had but four rehearsals."

In Paris Robert le Diable was got up in NINE MONTHS, and the musicians had nearly TWO HUNDRED REHEARSALS, with the composer always at hand to tell them how dull and stupid they were and what a number of blunders they committed. With this in his eye, Mr. Balfe, and his hybrid orchestra may laugh at the sneers of adverse criticism d'outre mer. It would have been amusing enough to hear the French Robert after four band rehearsals! Quelle brouhaha infernale cela aurait été!! A word more and we have done. What does the lusty feuilletoniste mean by the following?—

"Meyerbeer, whose arrival had been announced with loud flourishes, and who was himself to have conducted the orchestra, on this solemn occasion, remained at Berlin, contenting himself by writing five or six letters a week to Jenny Lind, letters in which the illustrious master indulges in a new method of signature:—in place of his name he writes, on every occasion, a new point d'orgue."

We own ourselves at a loss to comprehend this. Can it be possible that Jenny Lind, whose musical organization has been lauded with such extreme enthusiasm, whom Mendelssohn himself has extolled to us (so we can vouch for it) before any other singer—can it be possible that a creature, thus gifted, is incapable of inventing that which demands so small a modicum of invention as a point d'orgue—or, in other words a cadenza? The notion is preposterous, and yet, if not that, what does M. Fiorentino mean? He, of course, can readily explain, since Jenny Lind has, doubtless, shown him the letters and permitted him to peruse their contents—or, how could he describe them thus minutely, even to the peculiarity of the signature? At the same time, we must confess to hold it rather strange, that Mdle. Jenny Lind, who, (influenced by some unknown and mysterious restraint) has forgotten even to leave her card upon ourselves—in spite of what we know that her friend, the Chevalier Meyerbeer, would have desired, for her sake and for ours—should, with so little difficulty have laid before the witty feuilletoniste—who never saw her before her début at Mr. Lumley's theatre, and, moreover, is not in any way acquainted with her—the contents of her most private, valuable, and intimate letters. Nevertheless, it must be true, or M. Fiorentino would not insinuate it.

In conclusion, we are glad to see M. Fiorentino amongst us, and hope that his "Lettres de Londres" will amuse his readers in Paris as much as we are sure they will amuse his readers in London. We can assure him that since his arrival here, we have looked for the Constitutionnel almost as regularly and anxiously as for The Times. In short, we cannot enjoy our breakfast without it.

MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.

THE second part opens with an air and chorus, in which the Lord God declares his readiness to stand by and help the faithful, no matter what adverse circumstances may beset them. The air is in two parts, written for a soprano voice. The first part, in B minor, "Hear, ye Israel," is conceived in a style of tender reproach, as though while chastising for the sake of chastening, the great Creator felt pity for the weakness of his creatures, and gave expression to it through the mouth of a beneficent angel. It would not be easy to combine beautiful melody, originality of instrumentation, and pathetic feeling, more happily than in this. The second part, in B major, "Thus saith the Lord," involves the encouraging admonitions of the Lord, and is marked by a more stirring character of melody, and an additional fullness of orchestration in fine keeping with the modification of the text. The continuousness of healthy fresh and vigorous tune is as remarkable in this second part as the exquisitely plaintive phraseology of the first. Altogether the song is one of the most elaborate and important in the oratorio. The chorus, "Be not afraid," is the climax to this powerful expression of benevolence and encouragement. It is in the key of G major, and the unceremonious manner in which the new key is taken, without modulation, by the whole force of the choral and instrumental orchestra, has a noble and inspiring effect. This chorus is long, and written with masterly power. It abounds in splendid effects, and one in particular, which occurs at every reprise of the theme, gives a peculiar character to the whole:—we allude to the unanticipated transition from the chord of B major to that of G major at each reoccurrence of the original subject, the B major occurring in the chorus as a half close upon the dominant of the relative minor of the key. The chorus is varied by an episode in E minor, on the words, "Though thousands languish," which is agitated and desponding, full of deep thought and impassioned energy. This also leaves off upon a half close on the chord of B major, which is uttered by the entire power of the brass instruments, the basses descending gradually to G, when the first theme is resumed in all its majesty of pomp, on the words, "Be not afraid." In this magnificent chorus, which is absolutely inspiring, from the wonderful feeling of hope and mental energy that it excites, the changes of time and measure from the first part to the episode, and thence back again, must be nicely indicated and intelligibly enforced by the conductor, or confusion is certain to ensue, as in the first performance at Exeter Hall.

A scene of great power and considerable importance in the conduct of the oratorio then occurs. Elijah reproaches Ahab for his idolatries and his iniquities, and threatens him with God's anger. The expression of the concluding words, "And the Lord shall smite all Israel, as a reed is shaken in the water," is wonderfully fine; the continuous tremolando of the violins on high notes, and the solemn tones of the bass voice underneath, denouncing the wickedness of Ahab, have a most grand and imposing effect. Jezebel, the Queen, incensed at the boldness of Elijah, throws herself upon the people, and recounting one by one the offences of the prophet, incites them to agree to his destruction. This is expressed in a series of accompanied recitatives between Jezebel and the people. The contralto solos of the wicked queen and the choral responses of her subjects are finely contrasted. The gradual increase of intensity, in the expression of the feelings of vengeance generated in the minds of the people by the queen's words, is rendered with graphic power; first the low muttering tones with which they exclaim, in answer to Jezebel's enquiry, "Have ye not heard he hath prophesied against all Israel"—"We heard it with our ears"—and then the swelling, as of distant thunder gradually coming near, with which the words, "He shall perish," are ejaculated, are vivid demonstrations of genius. The Queen's last recitative, "So go ye forth and seize Elijah," is wonderfully energetic, and works the people up into a frenzy of rage, which is powerfully and terribly expressed in a chorus, in E minor, "Woe to him, he shall perish," which climaxes this dramatic and masterly scene. This chorus is conceived in the same style as the "Stone him to death," in St. Paul, but much more elaborately developed. It begins with a kind of muttering, as of an infuriated crowd resolving upon some act of ferocity, and swells suddenly to a loud burst, as from a thousand voices. The unison passage at the end, "So go ye forth, seize on him, he shall die," is awful and tremendous. No part of the Elijah is more interesting, more exciting, or more terribly true than the whole of this fine scene.

Obadiah now warns Elijah of his danger, and incites him to seek the wilderness for safety, in a tenor recitative, which ends with an exquisite phrase of melody on the words, "The Lord thy God doth go with thee," full of consolation and promise. Elijah, in a short recitative, consents, and departs on his way; but the strength of the prophet fails him—his spirits are exhausted, and he longs for death. This is musically expressed in a song of great intensity and beauty, "It is enough, O Lord." The key is F sharp minor, and the instrumentation is characterised by passionate phrases allotted to the violoncellos, which sing throughout the first part, and the reprise of the theme, as though in sympathy with the prophet's anguish and distress. There is a second part to this song, which is of a more agitated and exciting character; it occurs upon the words, "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of Hosts," and by the contrast it ensures obviates the monotony that might arise from the profound melancholy of the first part. This song is built upon nearly the same plan as the "O Lord God have mercy," in St. Paul, the pathetic loveliness of which it emulates, if not surpasses. Angels come to comfort Elijah: they tell him to look towards the mountains, for the Lord cometh to help him; they reproach him for languishing under his trials, and cite God's watchfulness and unsleeping care for Israel, as an example for the prophet to follow. This is comprised in a tenor recitative, "See how he sleepeth under a juniper tree;" a trio of angels, in C major, "Lift thine eyes to the mountains," for three female voices (a soprano and two contraltos), without any accompaniments; and a chorus of angels, in G major, "He watching over Israel." The trio is simple and unaffected, but not the less captivating. The effect of female voices, without accompaniments, is most happily calculated, and after the gloomy excitement of what has just preceded it, comes like the first breath of a fresh breeze on a burning summer day, when the sky is as copper—or as the sight of a green tree in a desolate waste. The chorus is beautiful beyond all possible description. Melody never assumed a more enchanting form, and Harmony never arrayed it in more dazzling beauty. The instrumentation is transparently lovely—voluptuous as the fragrant breath of the south—soft as the gently undulating surface of a peaceful lake, or as the bosom of the one beloved, rocking and cradling the melody as a mother its child, exciting it with undefinable pleasure, while scarcely seeming to disturb its slumbers. This chorus might be played in heaven to the angels, so pure is it, so full of meekness, gentleness, and love. Like a maiden that glows and blushes as though ashamed of her own beauty, it unfolds its hidden graces with a certain coyness that is more ravishing than all the unblushing splendour of the sun. It implores you by its beauty, and not strikes you—but you are the easier and more surely conquered! (To be concluded in our next.)

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

THE fifth concert took place on Monday night, in the presence of a very crowded audience. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Sinfonia in G Minor, Op. 59	-	-	Haydn.
Romanza, "Ciel che feci," Signor Salvi (Oberto di di St. Bonifazio)	-	-	Verdi.
Concerto, Violin, Herr Joachim	-	-	Beethoven.
Recit. "Trascorsi è l'ora,"	} Made. Persiani (Ines Aris, "Quando il cor," de Castro)	-	Persiani.
Overture, "Oberon"		-	C. M. von Weber.

PART II.

Sinfonia in A (No. 7)	-	-	Beethoven.
Duetto, "Ah si tu per gli occhi tuoi," Madame Persiani and Signor Salvi (Guglielmo Tell)	-	-	Rossini.
Overture, Les Deux Journées	-	-	Cherubini.

Haydn's symphony has not been played for more than ten years; it therefore came out with all the freshness of novelty. As a whole it is one of the composer's inferior works, and though a collection would be incomplete without it, it is not of sufficient importance to occupy a place in an annual series of concerts, during which not more than sixteen symphonies can be performed. The first movement, allegro spiritoso, is bold and masterly. The themes are short, well contrasted, and ably developed. The andante is trivial in construction and rococo in style, while its instrumentation is meagre and ineffective; with the exceptions of here and there a phrase or two for the oboe, clarinet, and flute, the stringed quartet has all the work to do. The minuet is lively enough, and contains a striking unison passage for the stringed instruments; but the trio, confined chiefly to a common-place flute solo, has little or nothing to recommend it. The finale is in the rondo form—the subject a jig tune, with no other characteristic than its extreme vulgarity. Nor is this last-named movement remarkable for the scientific treatment which so frequently redeems the rondo-finales of Haydn from insipidity. A bold progression of harmony, anticipating the first reprise of the theme, is the only point worth noting. The exhumation of this symphony was very injudicious on the part of the directors, who seem bent upon regaling their subscribers with the weakest specimens of Haydn's genius. Haydn wrote many symphonies for particular occasions that he would have been loth to rest his fame upon, and this and the one in B flat (played at the first concert) are among the number. Nor did the excellence of the performance excuse the feebleness of the composition. Not merely were there many wrong notes uncorrected in the parts, but the general character of the execution was slovenly and unfinished. The symphony was followed by something of a very opposite nature:—the magnificent violin concerto of Beethoven, which, as Signor Salvi had not arrived to his time, was played before the aria of Verdi. Beethoven wrote but one concerto for the violin, and even this was originally intended for the pianoforte, and was adapted by the composer for the former instrument at the instigation of a music-publisher. It is, nevertheless, a noble work, and superior to almost anything of the kind that has been written. The allegro in D is large, expressive, and passionate, and instrumented with as much grandeur and variety of effect as most of the symphonies of the master. The slow movement is a kind of serenade; the subject, tender and soothing, is relieved by an episode, cantabile, of exquisite grace and playfulness; the orchestra being employed with the utmost fancy and ingenuity. The theme of the finale, a rondo, treated by any other hand than that of Beethoven, would be considered ordinary, if not vulgar; but the masterly style in which it is developed, the felicity with which it is varied, appearing at every reprise in some new and happier form, entirely redeems it from common-place. This concerto—like the pianoforte concerto in G, played by Dr. Mendelssohn at the last concert—should only be attempted by an artist who is equally a musician and a finished executant. The general complaint that it is not written for the display of the violinist's peculiar powers, abounding rather in passages and tours de force than in canto—the latter being principally developed in the orchestra—is not altogether without truth. But the zealous musician will bear in mind that Beethoven should be interpreted at any sacrifice, and that in giving expression to his immortal inspirations the egotism of self-display is irrelevant and unartist-like. What Beethoven has written must be performed as it is written, and that in faith and humbleness. Joseph Joachim is one of those who best understand and most willingly accept this condition. He knows and feels that in giving a tongue to Beethoven's thoughts he is glorifying his art, and he has too much modesty to regard himself at such a moment. But he has the secret of so interpreting the great master as to produce more effect than the most practised performer of fantasias could arrive at in the execution of never-so-brilliant and flighty a bravura-piece; and this he proved triumphantly on Monday night. It was a great and noble and artistic performance in every respect. To speak of the excellencies of the young violinist were to catalogue almost all the perfections that result from long and arduous study, facilitated by a rare natural aptitude. The fullness and beauty of his tone, the correctness of his method, the rapidity and evenness of his scale passages, the sweeping grandeur of his arpeggios, the closeness and equality of his shake, the crisp lightness and energy of his staccato, and the healthy vigour of his style, which lends itself easily and unaffectedly to every variety of expression, from the most energetic to the most tender, are alike worthy of praise. These were exhibited to singular advantage, albeit he had to manifest them on a violin (a Guarnerius), which, though sufficiently good for an ordinary player, was scarcely capable of resisting the energy of his attack, or of answering all the exigencies of his tone. His cadenzas, of which there were two (in the allegro and the finale), were admirable as musical conceptions, and astonishing displays of mechanical force. Formed upon the themes of the respective movements in which they were introduced, they appeared as natural episodes in the work, rather than as superogatory demonstrations of executive skill. The applause was warm and frequent without, and at the end quite enthusiastic. Since he last performed this concerto at the Philharmonic, three years ago, Joachim has made great progress, although even then, as a mere child, he caused some of the first violinists to tremble for their reputation. How much farther he may go it is impossible to guess, for it is not easy to put bounds to the aspirations of such extraordinary genius and energy. The aria of Verdi, selected by Signor Salvi, was that which he sang, four years ago, at the Philharmonic concerts. There is some evidence of feeling in the opening agitato, and the voice part begins boldly, but it has little else to recommend it, and even Signor Salvi's very refined singing hardly succeeded in rendering it effective. We recommend the accomplished tenor to seek for a new concert-song, the music of Verdi being singularly out of sorts with a programme of classical pretensions. The overture to Oberon was brilliantly executed, though we question whether Sig. Costa does not carry the meno mosso with which he introduces the second subject, beyond the intention of Weber; it is sufficiently contrasted in character and notation with the first subject to save the necessity of so marked a diminution in the rapidity of the movement. Madame Persiani, in the recitative and aria of Signor Persiani, which is skillfully adapted to set off the accomplishments of florid vocalising, displayed the wonderful facility in ornament and fiorette, and the variety and taste in their employment, for which she is famous, winning the most lavish applause. The clarinet obligato was admirably played by Mr. Williams.

The great symphony in A was not interpreted in a style worthy either the splendour of the music or the reputation of the Philharmonic band. There was a prevalent coarseness and uncertainty in the whole performance, that could only have arisen from the incompetency of the orchestra, or from the conductor's superficial acquaintance with the score; and as it would be treasonable to suppose the former, we have no alternative but to attribute the deficiency to the latter. The time of the vivace was pretty accurate; but the allegretto, in A minor, the trio of the scherzo, in D, and the finale, allegro con brio, were all taken so manifestly too slow as to damage the general effect, and induce longueur in a work that is intrinsically one flash of brilliant genius from the first bar to the last. The mistakes and carelessness of some of the principal wind instruments were also painfully and constantly remarkable, and though these could hardly be cited as arguments against the conductor's skill, they were not calculated to strengthen his boasted reputation as a disciplinarian. From its grandeur, beauty, and importance, the symphony in A should have been the chief point of interest in the concert, but as matters went, it lost half its significance. The clever duet of Rossini was finely sung by Madame Persiani and Signor Salvi, but its place is the stage, not the concert-room. Cherubini's overture, perhaps his orchestral master-piece, was entirely ruined by the unusually slow pace at which it was taken. The score demands an allegro molto, but Signor Costa overlooked the affretando which leads, by a succession of chords, into the second movement, and it was half over before an approach to the proper time had been accomplished.

On the whole this concert was of a very average quality. There was only one novelty, and that by no means an interesting one. There was the old mistake of giving two lengthy pieces by one composer, whose music thereby occupied a good half of the evening. The two overtures have been hacknied until even the Philharmonic subscribers are tired of them, as was sufficiently evident in the Oberon failing, for the first time in our remembrance, to obtain an encore. The vocal music was decidedly mediocre, and entirely out of character with the principles that should regulate the Philharmonic selections; and the general inefficiency of the execution threw an unusual coldness over the whole proceedings. The repetition of the minuet and trio, in Haydn's symphony, was quite a volunteer on the part of the conductor, since there was certainly no demand for it. The one redeeming point, however, was young Joseph Joachim's performance of Beethoven's violin concerto, and that was enough to make amends for even a greater number of defects than we have felt it our duty to notice in the general character of Monday night's performance.

PART II.—CHAPTER XIV.

SHE hastens to the new building, she calls the surgeon, she gives him the child. This man, who is prepared for all emergencies, treats the delicate corpse step by step in the ordinary way. Otilia assists him in everything; she makes, she brings, she tends, as if indeed she were wandering in another world, for the greatest unhappiness, as well as the greatest happiness changes the aspect of every object, and it is only when, after going through every trial, the good man shakes his head, thus silently answering her hoping questions, and then replies with a soft "no," that she quits Charlotte's bedchamber in which all this has taken place, and she has scarcely entered the sitting-room, than being unable to reach the sofa, she falls exhausted with her face upon the carpet.

At this moment they hear Charlotte arrive. The surgeon urgently implores the by-standers to remain behind—he will meet her and prepare her, but she already enters the room. She finds Ottilia on the floor, and a girl belonging to the house hastens to her, crying and weeping. The surgeon comes in, and she learns all at once. But should she at the same time also give up every hope! The experienced, accomplished, skilful man only regrets that she may not see the child; he retires that he may delude her with new preparations. She has seated herself on her sofa, Ottilia is still lying on the ground, but raised against her friend's knee, upon which her beautiful head has sunk. The medical friend is going backwards and forwards; he seems to busy himself about the child, but is really busying himself about the ladies. Thus midnight arrives, the death-like stillness becomes deeper and deeper; Charlotte no longer conceals from herself the fact, that the child will not again return to life, she desires to see it. It has been recently wrapped up in warm woollen cloths, and laid in a basket, which is placed by Charlotte on the sofa. Only the face is left uncovered, and it lies quiet and beautiful.

The village was soon in a state of excitement on account of the accident, and the news had travelled at once as far as the inn. The Major had taken the well-known roads, he went round the house, and by stopping a servant who was running to fetch something from the adjoining building, he obtained nearer intelligence, and had the surgeon called. He came, surprised at the appearance of his old patron, informed him of the present position of affairs, and undertook to prepare Charlotte for an interview. He then went in, began a misleading conversation, and conducted the imagination from one subject to another, until at last he made present to Charlotte her friend, his certain sympathy, and his proximity to her mind and feelings, which he soon transferred into a real proximity. She learned in fact that her friend was standing at the door, that he knew all, and wished to be admitted.

The Major entered, and Charlotte greeted him with a melancholy smile. He stood before her. She raised the green silk coverlet which concealed the corpse, and by the dim light of a taper, he saw, not without an inward shudder, his lifeless resemblance. Charlotte pointed to a chair, and thus they sat through the night opposite to each other. Ottilia still lay gently on Charlotte's knees; she breathed softly, she slept, or seemed to sleep.

The morning dawned, the candle went out, both the friends appeared to wake from a heavy dream. Charlotte looked at the Major and said, composedly, "Explain to me, my friend, by what dispensation do you come here to take part in this scene of woe?"

"This," answered the Major, quite softly, as she had questioned him—as if she had been unwilling to wake Ottilia—"This is not the time and place to keep back, make introductions and approach gently. The position in which I find you is so monstrous, that even the important matter about which I came, loses its value in comparison.

He then confessed to her, quite calmly and plainly, the object which Edward had in sending him; the object of his coming, so far as his own free will and interest were concerned. He stated both very gently, but quite openly. Charlotte heard with patience, and seemed neither to be astonished nor indignant.

When the Major had finished, Charlotte answered in a voice so soft that he was forced to draw his chair nearer: "I have never found myself in a case like this, but in similar cases I have always asked, 'how will it be to-morrow?'" I feel clearly that the fate of many is now placed in my hands, and what I have to do is beyond a doubt, and may be soon expressed. I consent to the separation. I should have resolved upon it earlier; by my own delay and resistance I have killed the child. There are some things which destiny obstinately purposes. In vain is it that reason and virtue, duty, and all that is sacred, place themselves in its way; something shall happen which is right to destiny and not to us, and thus at last it carries its point, let us conduct ourselves as we may.

"But what am I saying! Destiny is really bringing forward once more my own wish, my own plan, against which I have inconsiderately acted. Have I not myself already looked upon Ottilia and Edward as the most suitable pair? Have I not myself tried to bring them close together? Were not you yourself my friend, acquainted with this plan? And why could I not distinguish the caprice of a man from genuine love? Why did I take his hand, when as a mere friend I could have made him and another wife happy? And only look upon this unhappy slumbering girl! I tremble to think of the moment when she will awaken into consciousness from her half-deadly sleep. How can she live, how can she console herself, if she cannot hope by her love to compensate Edward for that, of which as an instrument of the most wondrous chance, she has deprived him? And she can restore him all, through the affection and passion with which she loves him. If love is able to endure all, much more is it able to compensate for all. I must not be thought of at the present moment.

"Retire quietly, dear Major; tell Edward that I consent to the separation, that I leave it to him, you, and Mittler, to conduct the whole affair; that I am unconcerned about my future situation, and can be so in every sense. I will sign any document that is brought to me, only do not let me be asked to co-operate, reflect, or advise."

The Major rose, she extended to him her hand over Ottilia. He pressed his lips against that dear hand. "And for me—what may I hope?" he softly whispered.

"Let me still owe you an answer," replied Charlotte. "We have not deserved to be unhappy; but neither have we merited to be happy together."

The Major withdrew, deeply pitying Charlotte in his heart, without however being able to feel compassion for the poor departed child. Such a sacrifice seemed to him necessary for the general happiness of all. He imagined Ottilia with a child of her own upon her arm as the most perfect compensation for that of which she had deprived Edward; he imagined himself with a son upon his knee, who would bear his likeness with more right than the departed one.

These flattering hopes and images passed before the mind of the Major, when on his way back to the inn he found Edward, who had been expecting him all night in the open air, as no signal by fire, no thundering report, had announced to him a fortunate result. Edward already knew of the misfortune, and he also, instead of pitying the poor creature, looked upon the event—without however confessing it to himself, as a dispensation, by which every obstacle to his happiness was at once removed. He easily allowed himself to be persuaded by the Major, who had speedily communicated to him his wife's resolution, to return again to the village, and then to the little town, where they might consider and commence what was immediately necessary.

Charlotte, after the Major had quitted her, sat only a few minutes absorbed in her meditations, when Ottilia rose and gazed on her with widely opened eyes. First she raised herself from the lap, then from the ground, and stood before Charlotte.

"For the second time," thus the noble girl began with an unconquerable graceful seriousness—"for the second time, the same thing has befallen me. You once told me, that men often in the course of their lives meet something similar in a similar way, and always in moments of importance. I now find the remark true, and am compelled to make you a confession. Shortly after my mother's death, I, as a little child, had moved my stool close to you; you sat on the sofa as you do now; my head lay on your knees; I was not asleep, I was not awake, I was dozing. I heard all that took place around me, conversation especially, very plainly, and yet I could not move, could not utter a word, and even if I had wished it, could not indicate that I felt conscious of myself. You then talked with a female friend about me, you pitied my fate, as being left a poor orphan in the world, you pictured my dependant position, and showed what dangers might surround me, if some fortunate star did not watch over me. I understood well and accurately, perhaps too rigidly, all that you seemed to desire for me, and to require from me. According to my own limited views, I made for myself laws on this matter. According to these I long lived, according to these I regulated what I should do and what I should leave undone. At the time when you loved me, took care of me, then received me into your house, and even some time afterwards.

"But I have stepped out of my path, I have broken my laws, I have even lost the feeling for them, and after a frightful event you again enlighten me as to my position, which is sadder than the first one. Resting in your lap, half lifeless, and as if from another world, I again hear your soft voice over my ear; I learn how appearances stand with respect to myself; but, as formerly, so on this occasion also, have I in my half-deadly sleep, prescribed for myself a new course.

"I have come to a resolution as I did then, and that which I have resolved upon, you shall hear at once. I will never be Edward's! In a frightful manner has God revealed to me the crime in which I am involved. I will atone for it, and let no one think to move me from my design. According to this intention, my dearest, my best friend, take your measures. Let the Major return, write to him that no steps have been taken. How painful was it to me that I could not stir as he departed! I wished to spring up, to cry out, that you should not dismiss him with such impious hopes."

Charlotte perceived Ottilia's situation, and felt for it, but she hoped by time and representation to prevail over her in some degree. But when she uttered some words which pointed to a future, to an alleviation of the pain, to hope, Ottilia with elevation cried: "No, seek not to move me, to deceive me! At the moment when I learn that you have consented to the separation, I will atone in the same lake for my offence—for my crime."

SONNET.

No. XXXIV.

Never look coldly on me, never give
One single glance that aught but fondness tells;
Thinking thou lov'st me less, my bosom swells
With such wild anguish, that I dread to live;
And when another day arrives, I grieve
To think that fate my bleeding heart compels
To linger here—that still on earth it dwells
Where I must curse each hour that I receive.
One frown from thee, love, makes the whole world dreary.
And whatso'er I do, where'er I go
There is no respite for the inward strife;
Until at last my tortured soul grows weary
And asks why it should bear this weight of woe.—
Oh, smile, if thou would'st have me prize my life.—N. D.

LINDA DI CHAMOUNI IN DUBLIN.

(Extract from our Correspondent's Letter.)

Linda di Chamouni was composed for the Court theatre at Vienna in 1841. Anxious to obtain the lucrative and high post of Maestro di Capella, and composer of the private concerts of the Emperor Ferdinand the First, Donizetti dedicated more time and care than usual to the composition of Linda; and certainly no work of his, not even the Favorita, exhibits more recherché, elaborate, and classical harmonies, happier melodies, or more rich orchestral combinations. The opera is altogether worthy of the best living composer.

The adaptation of Linda di Chamouni to the English stage is excellently done. The poetry is sparkling and finished, and the dialogue neat and smart. It is certainly one of the best, if not the best, of our operatic translations. The story is told in the English version with simplicity and perspicuity, and is exceedingly interesting. The part of Linda is certainly de. Bishop's happiest effort. The Dublin journals have been highly laudatory in their criticisms on the acting and singing of the fair cantatrice, but not one of them is a jot too eulogistic. Take the Freeman's Journal, for instance, which appears to me to say nothing but what is conscientiously true:

"The second representation of the Linda di Chamouni, last night, proved more triumphant even than the first. We have now no hesitation in saying that it is far the most beautiful and most successful opera which has been produced in Dublin for many a long day. It includes in its score a greater number of original and attractive melodies and concerted pieces than almost any of the modern operas. The first act is full of the purest and most delicious melodies. In the second there is also abounding richness—its finale particularly, as sung by Madame Bishop, is one of the greatest vocal triumphs we have ever listened to; the finale of the last act, though not so magnificent a composition, was even more wonderful as a triumph of vocal skill. In it Madame Bishop played with all the difficulties of her art, the marvellous flexibility of her voice enabling her to lavish the most profuse ornament. The audience seemed positively astounded, and would not be content without a repetition; to their unanimous call Madame Bishop cheerfully responded a compliance, which those who witnessed the arduous nature of the performance of Linda must have gratefully appreciated."

No doubt you will, ere long, have an opportunity of judging for yourself of Madame Bishop's exquisitely truthful delineation of the gentle Swiss peasant-girl; for the London managers will jump at the opportunity afforded them of presenting the public with so admirable an adaptation of a most pleasing drama, and such delicious music, interpreted by so great an artist, as Madame Bishop. Till which time, I leave you to your anticipations.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE*

(To the Editor of "The Musical World.")

SIR,—I observe, in a late number of The Musical World, a paragraph headed, "Church Music;" reflecting great credit on Mr. Surman, the conductor of the Harmonio Society, (meaning the Sacred Harmonic Society), for having introduced at Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road, a long wished for alteration in the manner of performing the service, which entitles him to the thanks of the congregation and the gratitude of the parish. I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the word grotesque, as applied to the poor charity boys; and, in fact, the meaning of the whole of the last five lines of the paragraph is obscure; but, what I would condemn, sir, is the practice of turning a church into a concert room, as is the case in this long wished for (?) alteration. I am the last to condemn, and, on the contrary, have always upheld the proper introduction of music into our church service; as, for instance, in the manner in which it has been lately done by Mr. Henry Smart, at his church in Old Street; but, when Mr. Surman, engages some of our principal singers to exhibit them on a Sunday evening, advertises these engagements, with a programme of the performances, canvasses for subscriptions from those attending, and solicits contributions, at the foot of a printed notice at the doors, I think it my duty to lift up a voice against this desecration of the Lord's Temple. If Dr. Worthington pleases to engage Mr. Surman, there can be no objection; but he has no right to give Mr. Surman a carte-blanche to do what he pleases in a church consecrated only for holy purposes.—Yours, most obediently.
LONDON, April 28, 1847. PHIL-HYMNOS.

(To the Editor of "The Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—It is with much pleasure, I perceive, you have commenced your promised elaborate analysis of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Of all things ever published in The Musical World I never read anything with so much interest as those occasional criticisms of the great works of our greatest masters with which we have often been favoured, and, if it is not inconsistent with the plan of your work, I should esteem it a great obligation if you would give us a similar criticism on each of Beethoven's Symphonies. I know that doing so, would oblige more than one of your readers in this place—a place, where, notwithstanding its proximity to London, not one of Beethoven's Symphonies has ever been performed. We have had Jullien here once, who gave us the Rustic Dance and the Storm from the Pastoral symphony, and that is all that has ever been performed here, if I except some little performance of parts of one or two of the others, arranged as septets. If it be too much to ask for an analysis of each symphony, perhaps you would not object to favour us with an examination of the Pastoral. I have been an amateur for some years, yet, I blush to say, my principal acquaintance with those magnificent works has been made through the medium of pianoforte arrangements. One cannot always come to London to hear a great work, and, as that is the only chance have of doing so, I regret to say, I have made much less acquaintance with the masterpieces of art than I could wish. Begging you to excuse my troubling you with these remarks,—I am, sir, yours obediently,—A CONSTANT READER.

REVIEWS ON MUSIC.

"Deux Valse, et une Polka," for the Pianoforte, by MADemoiselle HORRENBARGER.—Published for the Authoress, 19, Portsea Place, Connaught Square.

Of the two waltzes, to which the fair authoress gives the names of "La Coquette," and "The Arabella," we can speak most favourably. The Coquette is, perhaps, the most pleasing of the two. They are both pretty and neatly written. The Polka, called the Virag, is better still, and is new. The theme is well handled throughout, and is capitally varied.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

FRENCH PLAYS.—There has been little novelty this week. Les Demoiselles de St. Cyr, Le Mari à la Campagne, and Le Médecin Malgré Lui, have formed the principal attractions. the first of these pieces was noticed by us at some length last week; as regards the second, we may venture to assert, that it is one of the best plays produced on the modern stage; besides the great moral lesson inculcated in it, it contains much wit in the dialogue, and is withal, so neatly constructed and characteristic, that a frequent repetition of it is, by no means, tiresome, and is even desirable to arrive at a proper appreciation of its intrinsic merit. We may, however, be allowed one observation, namely:—that one of the principal characters is rather too palpably a plagiarism of our old friend Tartuffe, modernized to suit the exigencies of the age. This being admitted, for conscience sake, we give our unqualified praise to all the remainder. Madame Colombet, actuated by her worthy mother—such mothers being not unfrequently a reality, as many husbands can testify—makes her husband miserable at home by her excessive austerity; she loves him, but thinks it sinful to let him know it. Of course this is done at the instigation of the bon Monsieur Matthieu, a modern Tartuffe, who eats large quantities of fricandeaux for supper and swallows six glasses of eau sacrée. Our poor Colombet, who is of an easy nature, and hates quarrelling above all things, puts up with the infliction; and, on pretence of going into the country, sets up as a bachelor, and frequents balls and suppers. At one of these he is discovered by his wife and mother-in-law; but the timely arrival of his friend César; brings about a revolution he makes him assert his rights, reconciles the husband and wife, brings over the latter to less austere principles, and, finally, turns the mother-in-law and the excellent Monsieur Matthieu out of doors. The piece was carefully played by all, and admirably so by Mesdemoiselles Denain and Duverger, and by Messieurs Cartigny and Regnier. The latter more particularly kept the house in a continual roar during the second act and the latter part of the third. The meeting between him and his friend, César, in the first act, when they talk over the follies of former times, forgetful that the excellent Monsieur Matthieu is present, was admirably done, M. Cartigny looking over his spectacles at them; and such a look! It petrifies poor Colombet when, in the midst of his merriment, he happens to meet it. The meeting of Colombet and his wife, and afterwards his mother-in-law, at the house of a certain widow, of the name of Madame de Rohan, to whom he had been paying his court, when it comes out that he is to be married to her, and his excessive joviality suddenly turned into melancholy, were ludicrous in the extreme, and admirably managed. Then, again, the last scene, where Colombet asserts his independence, backed up by his friend, César, elicited roars of laughter and applause. Monsieur Reignier, whose Southern accent (we think he must be from Marseilles, at any rate, from the South of France), is rather favourable than otherwise to the parts which he usually undertakes, confirmed us in the opinion we have already given of him. Mademoiselle Denain, also, gives us no cause to retract the excellent opinion we had formed of her; she is remarkably lady-like, and her pronunciation of French is a study for tyros in that language. Her exceedingly handsome person enhances the charm of her intelligent and refined performance. Mdlle. Denain is a most valuable acquisition to Mr. Mitchell's troupe, and is already in high favor with his fashionable habitués. Madame Grassan was good in the part of the mother-in-law, and M. Cartigny admirable in the modern Tartuffe. The other parts, played by Mesdemoiselles Duverger and Vallée, and by Messrs. Langeval and Bérou, deserve our warmest commendation. No one is more agreeable and effective than the pretty and lively Mdlle Vallée in parts like the one allotted to her in this clever comedy. The Médecin Malgré Lui, known in English by the title of The Mock Doctor, was given on Wednesday, M. Regnier playing the part of Sganarelle, with much applause. We must not omit to mention that Her Majesty was present on Monday, and seemed fully to enjoy the perplexities of the worthy Colombet.

JULES SCHULHOFF.

This celebrated pianist and composer has lately arrived in London from Prague, and has brought with him, or more properly, sent before him, a great name. M. Schulhoff performed for the first time before a British audience, at Madame Puzzi's concert yesterday, and was at once recognised as a first-rate pianist. His performance is distinguished by remarkable brilliancy of tone, immense facility of execution, and an intuitive conception of the beauties of the work he interprets, which serves to exhibit his taste and judgment in a remarkable manner. As a composer, M. Jules Schulhoff has obtained a considerable reputation on the continent. Our excellent friends, the Messrs. Cocks and the Messrs. Wessel, have severally transmitted to us sundry works of the celebrated pianist, which we shall review and consider carefully next week.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

DONIZETTI's opera seria, Maria di Rohan, was brought out, for the first time in this country, on Saturday last. This opera was chosen for a double purpose, independent of its intrinsic merits:—first, to introduce Madame Ronconi to the subscribers of the Royal Italian Opera and the public; secondly, to exhibit Signor Ronconi in one of his greatest parts. The general cast was admirable, and was as follows:—

Maria di Rohan	MADAME RONCONI,
Ricardo, (Count of Chalais)	SIGNOR SALVI,
Armanda di Gondi	MADemoiselle ALBONI,
De Fiesque	SIGNOR POLLONINI,
Enrico (Duke of Chevreuse)	SIGNOR RONCONI.

Maria di Rohan is one of Donizetti's latest works, written some five years since, but is certainly not one of his most meritorious. The story, which is powerfully dramatic, is constructed indifferently for lyric exhibition. In this work we find no single sustained concerted morceau, and no chorus of moment, whereby the opera loses considerably in its importance. Donizetti is reported to have written Maria de Rohan with exceeding care. We give little credit to the report. The opera certainly boasts of a regularly constructed overture, and this tells something in favour of rumour, since the composer seldom hazards a work of this kind: but then, the overture itself is such as the maestro might be supposed to have improvised, and there are unmistakeable indications throughout the opera of hasty and careless writing. Maria di Rohan, in our estimation, may be ranked among Donizetti's weakest productions. The hand of the prolific master is, however, occasionally apparent. The ballata in the first act, "Per non istare," sung by Gondi, is assuredly the offspring of one of the composer's very happiest moments of inspiration. The aria in the second act, "Ion leggero nel amore," also sung by Gondi, is hardly less beautiful. The supplication-song of Chalais in the second act, and the duet in the last act, between Chalais and Maria, are entitled to great praise for their passionate expression and dramatic feeling. With these exceptions, we remember nothing worthy of particular notice in Maria di Rohan. Certainly an opera of this kind should be granted more than one hearing to entitle the critic to proffer a well-grounded opinion on its merits; but, as we paid all the attention in our power to catch the music; and, as the opera has now been postponed, in consequence of the indisposition of Madame Ronconi; and, as our paper comes out on Saturday, and, as we bring every novelty of the Royal Italian Opera under our weekly notice, we concluded it was better to give a candid opinion on its first production, than to wait for a second hearing and deprive our readers of an anticipated critique. The story of Maria di Rohan is of French extraction, and is familiar to the frequenters of the St. James's Theatre. It is founded on the drama, Un Duel sous Richelieu. The plot is simple, and may be thus told:—

Maria, Countess of Rohan, has loved and been loved by Count Chalais. Their union is interrupted, and Maria marries privily the Duke of Chevreuse, being forced, or instigated thereto, by reasons which do not appear in the operatic version. Chevreuse has killed the nephew of Cardinal Richelieu in a duel, and conceals himself to evade the vengeance of the minister. Chalais, at Maria's entreaty, and still innocent of her marriage, obtains a pardon for Chevreuse, and the latter, thereupon, declares his marriage with Maria. Chalais is infuriated, but conceals his rage, and, as a sort of escape-valve for his frenzy, quarrels with Amanda di Gondi, a young courtier, and challenges him to single combat. The challenge is accepted, and the hour signified. Chevreuse volunteers to become the second of Chalais. Maria, who, despite the nuptial tie, nourishes a passion for Chalais, having gained intelligence of the intended meeting, flies to him to urge him to forego the duel. While she is pleading with him, the husband enters, and Chalais conceals his mistress in a closet. This is certainly no tragic situation, more especially as nothing arises from it, the three being left, at the end, in precisely the same circumstances, with regard to the audience, as before the duke entered. When the husband departs, Maria is still seen pleading with Chalais to forego the combat. We see no possible motive for bringing Chevreuse on in this scene, except for the mere purpose of affording the foolish husband and shameless lover an opportunity of singing an obstreperous duet. Maria at last prevails on Chalais to stay at home, and lay aside the weapons of his honour for those of Master Dan

Cupid. Previous to the coming of Maria, Chalais had written a letter to his mistress, which, with her portrait, he had enclosed in a packet, to be delivered to her in case he should fall. Chevreuse, meanwhile, goes to the field of combat, and as his principal does not arrive, Irish like, takes up the cudgels, alias sword, for his friend, and receives a wound in the sword-arm from Amanda di Gondi. In the last act, Chalais comes under the ban of Richelieu's displeasure, and plays another game of hide-and-seek with the wily minister. The duke, anxious for his false friend, contrives a means for his escape. Chalais departs, urging Maria to fly with him, and vows that unless she will follow him to a certain place before the clock strikes the next hour, he will return and die at her feet. Now comes the moment of retribution for the guilty lovers. Richelieu, suspecting the Count of treasonable purposes, dispatches a guard of archers to his house, who, in rummaging his papers, discover the packet addressed to Maria, and bring it to the cardinal. Richelieu, having perused it, sends it to Chevreuse, who becomes distracted at the perfidy of his wife and friend. He threatens to kill her, but relents, when Chalais arrives, and a scene of terror ensues. The Duke snatches two pistols from the table, and calls on the Count to render him instant satisfaction. Chalais, seeing all is lost, seizes one of the pistols, rushes into an adjoining apartment, followed by the duke. They fight: Chalais is killed. The duke re-enters, Maria falls senseless to the ground, the royal archers arrive, and the curtain falls on a dramatic tableau. Such a subject, it will be seen at once, does not present a very happy vehicle for music. There are, nevertheless, situations in the opera that demand, in the artists, dramatic powers of the highest order, and, in these situations, the vocalists of Tuesday evening, left nothing to be desired. Madame Ronconi, who made her first appearance on Tuesday, had previously appeared, some ten years since at Her Majesty's Theatre. She is an intelligent artist, both as singer and actress, but unfortunately laboured under a severe cold, and was consequently held to great disadvantage. We understand her singing at rehearsal was far superior to that of her evening's performance; for which reason we do not feel ourselves justly warranted in discussing the fair debutante's merits at any length. That she is a good musician and clever actress is evident; and, we have no doubt, that she will, ultimately, prove a useful and worthy member of the company of which she forms an item. Salvi acted with great ability and sang most beautifully. His artistic vocalisation of the prayer in the second act won him an enthusiastic encore, and her obtained great applause in his portion of the stormy scenes in the last act. Mademoiselle Alboni gained another ovation on Tuesday night. Her singing of the ballata, in the first scene, was absolutely faultless. She roused her auditors to a state of excitement, seldom witnessed at the Royal Italian Opera, and this was accomplished almost without an effort. The extreme purity and delicious quality of voice, the chasteness, grace, and exquisite finish, exhibited in the simple and quaint ballad, could not fail of impressing any audience with enthusiastic emotion. She was encored in a perfect tornado of applause. The same words apply to the fair contralto's singing of "Per non istare," in the second act, also uproariously encored. In the part of Armanda di Gondi, Mdlle. Alboni exhibited comic powers of much excellence, for which we had given her little credit, and obtained as much applause in her acting as in her singing. In the character of Enrico, Duke of Chevreuse, Signor Ronconi upheld his name and fame as one of the very greatest operatic singers of the age. Indeed, we should accord him the very highest place among dramatic singers, so long awarded him on the continent, did we not reckon fine quality of voice as one of the essentials of dramatic singing. Signor Ronconi's voice is hard and guttural and possesses little of that charm, peculiar, with some exceptions, to Italian vocalists. It has, however, great power, and is as available in the upper register as any barytone we know. This hard organ the artist manages, occasionally, with fine effect, and in the mezza voce he is heard to singular advantage. When singing thus the tones of his voice sound like those of a tenor, a peculiarity we have not observed in any other barytone. As an actor we cannot confer too much praise on Signor Ronconi. Here he is truly great. Possessed of power, energy, intense feeling, fine dramatic conception, and keen judgment, he adapts himself to the delineation of the higher passions with a life-like earnestness hardly to be described in words. The great tragic artist is perceptible in every look and motion, and every shade of feeling is depicted with powerful truth. In the entire of the last act Signor Ronconi's acting was beyond praise. We have hardly ever witnessed on the stage, anything more terribly real than the scene with his wife after he discovers her perfidy, and the fiendish cry of exultation that escaped his lips when he finds Chalais within his grasp, was so fearfully natural, that it went like an electric shock through the whole house. One universal shout of astonishment and delight greeted this artistic display. Nor must we omit to do full justice to Signor Ronconi's singing. In one morceau, which he gave with prodigious effect, he was encored, and afterwards recalled twice. A greater triumph it was hardly possible to achieve. The scenery and mise en scene were excellent, and the dresses extremely splendid. The choruses were good, but had not much to try them. The band was hardly so irreproachable in Maria di Rohan as it was in the previous operas produced at this establishment. Another performance will, no doubt, set matters right, and exhibit Signor Costa's orchestra in its wonted perfection.

After the opera, the divertissement, La Bouquetière de Venise, was repeated, in which was introduced, for the first time, a pas de deux, by Mademoiselles Fanny Elssler and Dumilatre. This was no other than the favourite Spanish dance, La Gitana, doubled for the fair danseuses. The dance was received with great favour, and though it was the last performance of the evening, it produced a furor and was encored with tremendous acclamations, the enraptured spectators waiting, to a single individual, to catch the last twinkle of the all-gracious Fanny's feet, and the last pose of the elegant Dumilatre. It was a sight to win all gaze that way, to behold the two artists, in their various styles, perform the same steps, and go through the same evolutions. Now the eye rested on the Juno-like suavity of Fanny Elssler's movements; and, anon, the Sylph-like attitudes of Dumilatre, rivetted the attention. Now Fanny tossed her head proudly as an Andalusian barb, and seemed to tread the earth as conscious of supremacy; and, again, Dumilatre sailed onwards, like a Swan of Cynthia, winning her way by graceful undulations. The pas de deux was by far the most excellent production of the ballet department since the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, and will, no doubt, be repeated for many many nights, with the same effect.

On Tuesday, in consequence of the continued indisposition of Madame Ronconi, Maria di Rohan was postponed until further notice, and Sonnambula was performed instead, with Madame Persiani, Mademoiselle Corbari, Mario, and Tamburini, in the principal characters. La Bouquetière de Venise followed, in which Mdles. Fanny Elssler and Dumilatre again enraptured the spectators with the pas de deux produced on Saturday.

On Thursday the Elisir d'Amore was produced, for the first time, very strongly cast. Persiani played Adina; Salvi, Nemorino; Rovere, Dulcamara; and Tamburini, Belcore. Persiani was not in such fine voice as we have heard her. She played, however, most charmingly, and, in several instances, sang with her usual brilliancy. Salvi was excellent in Nemorino. He gave all the music with the greatest taste and nicest finish. In the beautiful aria, "Una furtiva lagrima," he was encored with universal acclamations. Tamburini is by far the best Belcore we ever saw. Indeed, it is hazardous, for any Dulcamara—except ONE—to come in contact with him in this opera. He is so full of whim and drollery, whether he be singing, or unoccupied in the dialogue, or music, that he elicits laughter the whole time he is on the stage, and seems to hold every eye fixed upon him. His giving the word of command to the soldiers in English had a very laughable effect. The singing of this artist, in Belcore, was no less admirable than his acting. Of Rovere, we have far higher opinions, since we have seen his Dulcamara. If he possesses not any of that rich, unctuous humour, we have been accustomed to witness in the great artist who has identified himself with this character, he is vivacious and bustling, and his singing is highly artistic. Signor Rovere was admirable all through the first scene, and in the duet with Adina in the second act he proved himself a first-rate comic actor and buffo singer. He caused immense laughter, and received great applause in the course of the performance. The opera was carefully done, the chorus being excellent. The new scenery was beautiful. After the Elisir, a selection from Semiramide was performed, embracing the grand duet, "Se la vita," for Grisi and Tamburini; the aria, "Il si barbara," for Alboni, and the duet, "Ebben a te ferisci," for Grisi and Alboni. This portion was the most acceptable of the evening's entertainments. The duet, "Se la vita," was magnificently given by Grisi and Tamburini, the execution of which won a unanimous re-call from all parts of the house. We never heard the Diav sing more exquisitely. Alboni was likewise in splendid voice, and sang with all that miraculous charm that touches every heart that comes within its sway. The Bouquetière de Venise followed, in which Fanny Elssler introduced the cachucha, and won a new triumph, and the performances concluded with an extract from La Reine des Fées, for Dumilatre. The last act of Puritani was announced, but the selections from Semiramide were substituted in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Signor Mario.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday, Roberto il Diavolo was given for the third time. Madlle. Jenny Lind's performance justified all we had advanced in favour of the two first representations. The band and orchestra were greatly improved—Balle had moulded them into something like the proper shape—and the principal singers were also much better. Staudigl was very grand in Bertram, and Gardoni charmingly natural and unaffected in Raimbert. In regard to Fraschini, we suspect that it is nothing more than his Neapolitan sluggishness of temperament that prevents him from doing justice to Robert, a part for which nature has singularly gifted him. He has a noble voice, can sing with infinite spirit, and act as well as most Italian singers (better than many)—what then, but sheer apathy and indolence prevents him from placing these enviable qualities in request when he has so good an occasion to win honour and fame by their demonstration? Madame Castellan was in better voice, and sang the airs of Isabelle much better than before. Her "Robert" was highly expressive and graceful, if not as intensely passionate as the theme and its musical illustration would suggest. Mademoiselle Jenny Lind was honoured with the same enthusiastic applause, the same double-encore to her ballad, "Quand je quittais la Normandie," the same recalls, and the same "ovations." One thing, however, we could not but remark. This was the evident source of all she effects being in study, not spontaneity. Perhaps, after all, this is what brings a perfection otherwise unattainable in art. Still we could not sometimes but think of poor Malibran, and her daring improvisations, as astonishing as they were beautiful. Malibran did not ask De Beriot to write cadenzas for her, as M. Fiorentino insinuates of Jenny Lind in respect to Meyerbeer; no, indeed, her fancy was teeming with them, ever new; they flowed from her soul as water from the hidden springs; they sprang from her heart as wild flowers from the fertile soil, fairer in their untutored waywardness than all that cultivation could produce of fair. At the same time, let us avow that Mademoiselle Jenny Lind is a more finished artist than ever was Malibran. But is she such a genius? When we have seen her in some more of her parts we shall be better able to say. The ballet of Saturday evening was Une Soirée du Carnaval, in which Marie Taglioni danced the Pas de la Rosière, Cerito and St. Léon the Manola, and Rosati and Perrot the Pas de deux, composed by the latter. The house was crammed.

A mere record of the proceedings of Tuesday evening must suffice. The performances consisted of L'Elisir d'Amore, with Castellán, Gardoni, Lablache, and F. Lablache; a divertissement, in which Cerito, St. Léon, Mdles. Cassan, James, and Honoré, danced the Pas de Cinq from the ballet of Rosida, Marie Taglioni, (her last appearance but two!) her Pas de la Rosière, and Cerito and St. Léon, the Manola; the last act of I Due Foscari, in which we heard Coletti in the Doge, with the greater pleasure, since, from the announcement, we had not anticipated that treat again; and the ballet of Thea, with Rosati, Marie Taglioni, (her last appearance but two!!) and Paul Taglioni. Enchanting little Marie danced divinely; and we have singled her out for special mention, since—as we have twice inserted in parenthesis, as if the fact were of no consequence, although it is really of a consequence most melancholy—since, we mournfully repeat, it was her last appearance but two. As soon as Carlotta has flown to England, Marie must fly away!—sad though it be to contemplate, we must accept the fact. Two moons cannot shine in one heaven, and where the moon Carlotta beams, the moon Marie can beam not—and vice versá, bé it clearly understood. The house was not so well attended as usual. The "Lind" mania would seem to have bitten all London, and all the other artists, vocal and choregraphic, either go for nothing, or move as satellites about the great refulgent planet of the sky.

Thursday was such a night as we shall remember to the very last hour of our existence. The report that Amina was Jenny Lind's best part had travelled over from Germany to England, and the curiosity excited was even greater than on the night of her débüt. It was a rare sight—the mob that thronged the doors from four o'clock till seven, the hour of opening. It was a still rarer to see the rush for entry, when the trembling portals, creaking on their hinges, announced the long anticipated moment when the dense immovable mass should become a living stream in motion, flowing into the Opera-hall, as it were into the sea of its desires. Not wishing to risk our neck, our legs, or our arms, we waited till the doors had swallowed the largest portion of the crowd, and, gorged with repletion, rejected all else that forced itself a passage in. Hundreds after hundreds were vomited forth, and went their way—some to feed the appetite of the Royal Italian Opera, as the crumbs from the rich man's table fed the hungry Lazarus—others to their silent homes, where, over the fire-side, with perchance a cigar and a tankard, they chewed the cud of their disappointment, and promised themselves to be in better time on Saturday. The prices paid for boxes and stalls were sinful, when we consider the starving condition of one-third of the empire. As much as nine guineas was paid for a single pit-stall by several persons. Money was rejected at the doors in handfuls, like so much dirt.

At length, having gazed and wondered our full at the mad crowd, and hearing the first bars of the overture—which fell upon the ear like the tones of "the loud bassoon" in Cole-ridge's Ancient Mariner—we directed our steps, with sufficient indifference, to our corner in No. O—to the extreme left of the extreme box, on the highest point of the proscenium row, which had been kindly preserved for us by our excellent friend N—, one of the most valuable and indefatigable officers in Mr. Lumley's establishment. If the house on the night of Jenny Lind's débüt was crammed, it was on this occasion packed so close together, that it reminded the initiated in such matters of the letter-press in a page of type, when it has been placed in chase, hammered and wedged in immovable tightness. So closely crowded was the audience, that scarce a man could breathe without giving his neighbour offence. It was the same all over the house; in gallery, boxes, or pit you could not have found a place to insert a pin without running it into the flesh of some unfortunate individual.

The criticism we shall have to offer on the performance is much less comprehensive than we could desire, but the disadvantageous position we were in must be our excuse. Jenny Lind's reception, as might have been prophesied, was tremendous. She looked the orphan peasant-girl to the life, and the neat plainness of her attire was in keeping with the naïf simplicity of her expression. It was evident at a glance that the fair Swede had conceived the character of Amina in the same light as poor Malibran, but the fact of her never having seen that great dramatic singer absolves her entirely from the charge of plagiarism. There, however, was the innocent country-maiden—her face beaming with love for all nature, and ignorance of all but the depth of her own heart. Jenny Lind had but to come upon the boards in Amina's dress, and you saw at once that she understood the character. You saw at once that her conception of it was poetic and you felt assured of her triumph, even in the very footsteps of Malibran. Such is the prestige of genius!—for that Jenny Lind is a genius no one can deny who has seen her in Amina. Her first recitative, "Care compagne," was delivered with an air of conscious happiness that befitted the modest maiden, whose dearest hopes were on the point of confirmation. The Amina, on the eve of marriage with her fondly beloved Elvino, was in every phrase, in every note. The feeling was still more thoroughly portrayed in the air, "Come per me sereno," which Mademoiselle Lind introduced with a singularly happy cadenza on the last words of the recitative, "e questo amplesso." The air itself was ornamented with shakes and cadences profusely though judiciously; but not a turn or a grace was out of character with the theme. The last cadence was quaint and original, just such a one as we could imagine Meyerbeer would make at the termination of a florid solo on the flute. The cabaletta "Sovrail ser la mar mi posa," was beautified in a similar manner, but the character of the ornaments was modified to suit the increased tenderness of the words. The duet with Elvino, "Dal di che i nostri cori," with its elegant cabaletta, "Ah! vorrei trovar parole," was most expressively sung, albeit it was transposed a whole tone to suit the tenor. The cadenzas at the reprise of the minor subject, and at the conclusion, were admirable for their elegance and originality. Equally beautiful was her cadence at the end of the pretty chorus, "A fosco cielo," in which the Somnambulist is described, and throughout the whole of which the voice of the fair Swede sounded as clear and distinct above the rest as that of the nightingale above the rustling of the forest-leaves, when they are agitated by the evening breezes. We are indebted to Mademoiselle Lind for the restoration of a very pleasing duet which occurs at the end of the first scene. The theme is a conversation between the two lovers. Elvino is jealous of the attentions which Count Rodolpho has been paying to Amina, and is going to part with his mistress without the tender embrace, which, on the eve of their nuptials, would have been nothing more than natural. Amina chides him—an explanation ensues—Elvino, ashamed of his jealousy, sues for pardon—Amina grants it—and they part lovers and friends as before. This duet is highly important to the action of the drama and materially aids in the development of the two opposite characters of the hero and heroine, the one all jealousy and irritability, the other all confiding simplicity and faith. The music is pretty and without any pretence to energy or passion illustrates the sentiment in a charmingly natural way. It was sung with great purity and truthfulness by Mdle. Lind and Gardoni. Among other passages worthy noting we may cite the tender hesitating manner in which Mdle. Lind whispered the words "Saresti tu geloso,"—the graceful way in which she ornamented the phrase that occurs upon the words, "Son, mio bene, del zefiro amante,"—and the charming half-repressed emotion which characterised her utterance of the concluding words of the scene, "Pur nel sonno il mio cor ti vedrà." Through the whole of this first act (the opera being disposed into three, as has lately been the custom)—the applause was incessant and noisy, and at the end of the scene we have just described Mdle. Lind was re-called upon the stage with one voice, and was led on by Signor Gardoni. The prophecy of an immense triumph was already spoken.

If the first act was the prophecy of a triumph, the next, and all that followed, was its fulfilment. Our readers are aware that the first exhibition of Amina's somnambulism, when she unconsciously enters the chamber of the Count, occurs in this part of the opera. The appearance of Mdle. Lind, as she entered at the window, and moved noiseless across the stage, white as a ghost, was the signal for a general "hush" all over the house. The audience sat still with mute expectation, and a feather might have been heard to drop. There sat every living soul, "quiet as a stone." Nor was expectation one atom disappointed. Reader—if you were not present to hear, or rather to feel, the half-suppressed murmur with which the sweet sleep-walker uttered the words, "Elvino!—Elvino!" and the query, "Non rispondi?" when she finds there is no answer to her appeal—if you were not there to hear this, you lost a moment of pure delight that words refuse to give a name to! And then, again, how prettily she whispered, "Geloso saresti ancor dello straniero?" and how deliciously she played with the phrase, elaborating it with an ornament the notes of which came from her silver throat like pearls. And when her soft bosom heaved as a dove's, and she tenderly ejaculated, holding out her hand, "Un bacio imprimi in essa, pegno di pace," it was as the voice of an angel speaking from above; and as she ceased, her eyes, unconscious of their office, were filled with a deep expression that no tongue could speak—thought's melody being too sweet for utterance! Her appeal to her mother, "O madre mia, m'aita, non mi sostiene il piè," and her vow of eternal fidelity to her husband were equally impressive and beautiful; and when at length she staggers to the bed, murmuring the name of Elvino, the silver notes of her voice seemed melted gradually into a sound so small and still, that between it and silence there was room for nothing—

"A music so delicate, soft, and intense,
It felt like an odour within the sense!"

But the great point of this act was yet to come. From the moment of awaking, and finding herself in a strange bed-room, till the instant when she clings to her lover with the desperation of one who grasps all she holds dear upon earth, and is on the point of losing it for ever, her acting and singing were transcendent. The abandon with which she falls senseless upon the ground, when her efforts to retain her lover have proved fruitless, and he tears himself away, made one of the most natural and beautiful pictures that could possibly be conceived. The whole scene was admirable, and we were never more sensibly impressed by any dramatic effort in our remembrance. At the fall of the curtain Mdle. Lind was again recalled, amidst the most clamorous and incessant applause.

The third act involved a display of wonderful vocalisation for which the first two gave comparatively rare occasions. There were so many points to eulogise, that we scarcely know where to begin. In one of the recitatives, while in a state of somnambulism, where the words "Quanto infelice io sono felice ei sia" occur, she dwelt upon C in alt with exquisite purity and precision, for a considerable length of time, swelling and diminishing the intensity of sound with the utmost ease. On the words, "Ti bacio ancor," (addressed to Elvino's flowers, which she takes from her bosom) she introduced another quaint and beautiful cadenza; but the most exquisite point in her whole performance was the cantabile, in the minor, "Ah non credea mirarti," her expression of which was absolutely divine, while her vocalisation was irreproachably pure. The whole thing can be likened to nothing more appropriately than a long-drawn sigh.

The delicate poesy of the ornaments with which she, so to speak, gilded the melody—the long-sustained shake that scarcely exceeded the loudness of a breath, and was yet so equal and so clear—and the chaste and exquisitely chiselled cadences, as smooth and as polished as the sinuous outlines of the Greek ideal beauty (if such matters may be forced into comparison) were alike things to charm and to surprise. The management of the breath in this cantabile was miraculous—something that no conceivable method could impart—something that must perforce derive from rare physical organization. The final rondo, "Ah Giunge," was a prodigy of florid execution, in which extraordinary flights of fancy were regulated by the nicest taste, and fashioned into symmetry by the ripest and severest judgment. The originality of some of the cadences amounted to the singular, and involved some daring invasions of harmonic boundaries, in the shape of passing notes and apogiaturas—but the whole thing was so marvelously exciting, that the attention hung upon her every accent, as a culprit upon the words of a judge who is about to administer sentence of acquittal or condemnation; the imagination sailed upon the waves of her sweet singing, and was hurried on to where she listed, until it was fairly lost in the ocean of infinite melody. The audience were spell-bound while the rondo lasted, but the terminating cadence—one of unprecedented energy and boldness, attacking the highest notes in the register with a daring impetuosity that was nothing short of astounding—fairly lifted them from their seats, and the house rose to a man to cheer her. The applause was deafening, and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs resembled a storm-tormented sea. Of course Mdle. Lind was compelled to repeat the air, and in repeating it, she embellished it with newer wonders. After the fall of the curtain she was recalled three times, and was handed on, each time, by Gardoni—but the uproar still continuing unabated, the happy songstress, her heart, no doubt, bursting with the fullness of its gratitude, ran on the stage by herself, with the innocence and playfulness of a little kitten, kissed both her hands to the crowd, threw a glance at them that said with eloquent intelligibility, "I love you all, and should like to be always with you," ('but—oh! poesy-killing but!—I am hungry and must go home to supper') and then ran off again with the ingenuous simplicity of a child. The flattered audience, each member of which considered himself the favored one, transported to the seventh heaven, roared and shouted its delight. Never did such a scene occur before in grey-eyed England!

We shall have again to recur to the Sonnambula, for we have got a world of things to say of Jenny Lind's acting, which, as yet, we have but hinted at. Till next week, then, one word must suffice for the admirable manner in which Gardoni did his devoir in Elvino, winning a loud encore in the "Ah perche posso," by the side of the Lind herself; for the sensible and intelligent Rodolpho of F. Lablache; and for the irreproachable accuracy and spirited energy of the band and chorus, under their excellent conductor, Balfe. To Piatti, whose beautiful tone and fine playing on the violoncello were heard to advantage in several points of importance, we consecrate a sentence by itself.

The opera was followed by a divertissement, in which Cerito, Rosati, Marie Taglioni, (her last appearance but one!!) St. Léon, and others, assisted, and by a tableau from the ballet of Coralie. To-night the Sonnambula will be repeated.

CONCERTS.

M. ALEXANDER BOUCHER.—This gentleman who at one time enjoyed great repute as a violinist, gave a concert on Friday, the 7th instant, in Willis's large room. He gave a specimen of his style in four pieces, in all of which he was assisted by a quartet band under the able direction of M. Nadaud. These pieces were a Maestoso from one of Viotti's concertos, varied by sundry improvisations by the performer; a theme of Mozart, with variations by Rode, eke enriched with improvisations; two fragments from a quartet of M. Boucher's, intitled Reve d'Endymion, and The Waters of Toeplitz, in one of which the voice of birds was imitated, in the other the voice of waters—as Wordsworth has it—

"A nightingale and two to three thrushes,
With a noise of wind that rushes,
And a noise of water that gushes"— and lastly the fragment of a quintet, equally the offspring of M. Boucher's invention, the theme of which was a bolero in the Spanish style. All these pieces were executed with an animation that was prodigious, a style that was original, and an execution that was capricious—and all were received with uproarious applause from the whole room. The next feature was of a more modern and less eccentric kind. This was a duet of Thalberg, on airs in Norma, performed upon two pianofortes by Mdle. Coulon and M. Benedict. We have before had occasion to speak warmly of the talents of Mdle. Coulon. Though a very young pianist, there is already a charm and an energy in her style, a neatness and brilliancy in her execution, that give promise of the highest excellence. These qualities were abundantly displayed by the intelligent young artist in the execution of her share of Thalberg's duet, the difficult passages in which she delivered with a precision and force that surprised and delighted every body. We must speak with equal praise of the graceful and easy manner in which she delivered the more expressive phrases, and indeed the rare intelligence that marked her entire performance. Mdle. Coulon was applauded continually with the most unrestrained enthusiasm, a distinction she well merited, and it was doubtless gratifying to her young ambition to share it with her accomplished companion, M. Benedict, who played in his usual masterly and effective style. Later in the concert Mdle. Coulon joined her experienced and clever friend M. Sinton, in a duet, by Osborne and De Beriot, on subjects from Guillaume Tell. The performance was altogether excellent, and the dashing brilliancy of the young lady's execution, kept her experienced and admirable coadjutor on his mettle throughout. The duet was applauded liberally. Another point to note in this concert was the flute performance of M. Cesare Ciadi, of which we shall have more to say. Not being down in the programme, this wonderful exhibition of mechanical perfection agreeably surprised and no less delighted the audience. M. Rousselot's sensible and musician-like style, in a solo on the violoncello, must not be left unrecorded. The vocalities were on the whole excellent. First of all let us mention two German songs, "Die Thrane," and "Die Grenadiere," essayed by Herr Brandt, and both the compositions of Herr Luders, a young musician of refined and admirable talent, who has for some time resided in London, and comes before the public much more rarely than his merits deserve. Both these songs are charmingly written and full of character. The first "Die Thrane," in B flat minor, is very melodious and expressive, the second, "Die Grenadiere," in E flat, bold and martial in style. The accompaniments to both are musician-like, polished, and full of character. We should like to hear these songs again, especially as they were not done full justice to by Herr Brandt, who was not in his best voice on this occasion. With a word for Signor Marras' graceful reading of the "Adelsida," Miss Duval's spirited delivery of Rossi's fine old air "Ah rendimi quel cor," and the beautiful contralto voice and artist-like talent exhibited by Mrs. A. Toulmin in an arietta by Brambilla, and a romance by Clapisson, our notice must conclude. Madame Pasta Anglois, and Mad. Costa Tamplini were among the vocalists. The conductors were M. Benedict and M. Luders, both of whom accomplished their duties to perfections. The concert was unusually amusing, and a great number of celebrities formed part of the very crowded audience.

HUNGARIAN INSTRUMENTAL VOCALISTS. On Saturday last we attended the first concert given at the Theatre Royal Haymarket, by Messrs. Weiss, Zorer, Schwarz, and Grunswag, importations from the Hungarian dominions, who have undoubtedly discovered a very novel mode of illustrating the power of the human voice. Two of these gentlemen sing duets, and the other two play an accompaniment with their mouths, imitating every instrument in the orchestra. The effect is more new than delightful; nevertheless, the execution and imitation is so far beyond what the mind can give credit to, that it excites no small degree of pleasurable emotions. The Hungarian vocalists are certainly the greatest curiosity in London at this moment. They will appear every evening next week during the dramatic performances.

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. RODOLPH WILMERS.—We have a memoir of this pianist, who is now the great executive wonder of the day, which is translated from one of the feuilletons of the Constitutionnel, written by M. Fiorentino. We shall print it in our next number. Meanwhile we may inform our readers, that M. Wilmers gives a matinée d'invitation on Monday, at two o'clock, to the principal members of the profession and the press. We yesterday had the pleasure of hearing M. Wilmers play several pieces at the establishment of Messrs. Broadwood, on a splendid new piano-forte from the manufactory of those eminent makers, and can testify to the almost unprecedented wonders of his execution.

M. MOSCHELES, the celebrated composer and pianist, has arrived in London for a short period.

MADAME HENNELLE—This popular and intelligent vocalist, has arrived in London for the season. We trust to have the pleasure of hearing her very soon at some of our concerts.

GERHARD TAYLOR, a harpist of considerable note, has arrived, and will shortly give his first public performance.

Sig. CIABATTA, the excellent barytone and popular concert singer, has also arrived.

Mr. PERRY, the Leader of the Sacred Harmonic Society, has just completed the composition of a new Oratorio entitled "Hezekiah" which will be given at the Hanover-rooms, on the 28th of June.

THOMAS BAKER'S MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR.

M. JULLIEN

Has the honor to announce, that he has just published the above work, which he flatters himself will be found the desideratum so long sought after by the profession. Notwithstanding the improvements that have taken place in Pianoforte Playing, within the last ten years, no deviation has been made in the system of teaching from Tutors of the Old School; in consequence, many gifted with brilliant talents have been unable to execute the music of the present day. For this reason, the

MODERN PIANOFORTE TUTOR

Has been introduced, and met with the greatest success from the elite of the profession, who have universally adopted it. The work is divided into two parts: the first being a complete Tutor in itself, containing the

RUDIMENTS OF MUSIC,

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the sixth edition of his

MUSICAL ANNUAL FOR 1847

Is now Published, and will be found by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared; containing no less than

Thirty Pieces of Vocal and Fourteen of Instrumental Music,

The greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors.

The portion which has already appeared comprise those pieces only whose decided success has induced M. JULLIEN, at the request of numerous influential patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately executed Covers, Title, and Dedication pages, include two magnificent Views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre. The one taken during the brilliant scene exhibited in that splendid arena of the occasion of M. JULLIEN'S GRAND BAL MASQUE; the other a VIEW OF THE THEATRE TAKEN DURING THE CONCERTS, the grouping of the Figures in both Views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the Theatre on either occasion, the ALBUM will form a delightful SOUVENIR, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene.

A splendidly-coloured PORTRAIT of the celebrated Danseuse, Madlle. FLORA RABRI, in the admired Pas, La Castighani. An original subject, "THE FORTUNE TELLER," illustrating Baker's beautiful ballad of that name.

The whole of this department of the ALBUM has been under the active superintendence of J. BRANDARD, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production.

Nothing more need be said in favour of this Work, and in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe.

It will also be perceived that in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the ALBUM contains some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany, France, Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti. Price 18s. and £1 1s.

CARLOTTA GRISI.

WEALTHY as London has been for this two months past in the treasures of choregraphic art the latest arrival has doubled the store. Carlotta reached England on Sunday, by the steamer from Boulogne. Her coming was heralded by fine weather. The sun, who had hid himself for a month behind a cloud, emerged from his obscurity and went forth to meet Carlotta on the beach. Since her arrival he has never ceased to shine. Who can blame him for loving to rest his beams upon the fairest of his children?

To-night, the eyes of the faithful will once more gaze upon the form of Esmeralda, which, for two years past, has mocked them in visions. To-night, Carlotta will once more shine in her own hemisphere—the brightest star of all.

With Jenny Lind in opera and Carlotta in ballet Mr. Lumley may safely rest upon his oars; the boat, moved by its own impetus, will float him on to fortune.

MADAME BALFE.

THIS accomplished artist and amiable lady has announced a grand Soirée Musicale, under the immediate patronage of H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent. The performance will take place in the Music Hall, Store Street, and the members of the Amateur Society will give their assistance. The programme promises to be one of very great interest. The music will be entirely selected from Balfe's operas of Falstaff and L'Etoile de Seville. The former opera, though it has not been played since the first season of its production at Her Majesty's Theatre, is one of the best of all the operas of the composer, and its revival has long been ardently desired by the habitués of the establishment. The latter was produced at the Académie Royale in Paris, for which it was expressly written. The curiosity to hear it in England is naturally very great, and, from the opinions we have gathered from the best continental judges, it is every way worthy the reputation of its popular composer. The selections from these operas will be executed by Madame Castellan, Madame Balfe, Signor Gardoni, Signor Coletti, Her Staudigl, Sig. Lablache, and others. These eminent artists, backed by the excellent and numerous orchestra of the Amateur Society, will ensure a performance of the most sterling order. Among other attractions will be a new manuscript ballad, composed by Mr. Balfe, and sung by Mrs. Balfe. Mr. Balfe will conduct the concert. The soirées will be held on Wednesday, June 9th. We have not the slightest doubt that Madame Balfe will find that encouragement due to her talent and amiability, and that the room will be crowded to suffocation.

SIGNOR AND MADAME RONCONI.

THERE has been some little unpleasantness in connection with the opera of Maria di Rohan, which has sown a temporary disunion among the excellent troupe of the Royal Italian Opera. It was evident that neither the public, nor the press, were satisfied with Madame Ronconi's performance of the part of the heroine—a part which belonged to Grisi, and which for the well-going of the opera should have been played by Grisi. To please Signor Ronconi, however, the direction awarded it to his lady. The latter, quite alive to the unfavourable impression she had produced, wrote the following letter to the principal journals, two days subsequent to the first representation of Maria di Rohan:—

"10, Cavendish Road, St. John's Wood.

MONSIEUR,—Des personnes ou malveillantes ou mal informées, ont prétendu que j'ai exigé de la direction le rôle de Maria di Rohan, pour mes débuts—ce rôle m'a été gracieusement offert par Madame Grisi, à Paris, et je ne l'ai accepté que dans la ferme conviction qu'elle ne voudrait pas s'en charger. Mais aussitôt que j'ai appris les desirs des abonnés, je me suis empressée de me rendre en personne chez la célèbre artiste, et je l'ai suppliée de gracieusement céder le rôle. J'espère qu'elle voudra bien se rendre à ma prière et aux vœux du public, afin que j'aie la satisfaction d'être la première à l'admirer et l'applaudir, agréer, &c., &c.

GIOVANNINA RONCONI."

The Morning Chronicle accompanies the publication of this letter with the following tribute to the "head and heart" of the writer.

"This is a letter which reflects equal credit on the head and the heart of the writer, who, if she cannot acquire the suffrages of a public as an artiste, must, at least, command their sympathies as a woman. It also shows how great is the truly artistic feeling, excluding all selfish considerations existing at the Royal Italian Opera."

It appears, however, that the writer reckoned without his host. Madame Grisi consented to play the part, and, of course, required (not having performed it for four years) a reasonable time to refresh herself in the study of it. But, this would not do for Madame Ronconi, who, as it turns out, induced Signor Ronconi to insist upon the second performance of Maria di Rohan taking place last Tuesday; to which the management objecting, on the plea, that Madame Grisi could not, possibly be ready, the Signor adopted the very uncourteous proceeding of inserting an advertisement in The Times, to the effect, that he was ready to play the part on that day, and had written "to his director, Signor Persiani," to that purport.

The engagement with the Ronconis was made by Signor Persiani, and the advertisement denoted, that Signor Ron-coni only acknowledges that gentlemen as his director, whereby he wilfully, and foolishly overlooks the absolute constitution of the management of the Royal Italian Opera, and offers an unprovoked slight to the other worthy individuals who form part of the quorum, and, especially, to the amiable and intelligent director in chief, Mr. Beale, whose authority has been recognised as undivided by the general consent of the shareholders of the speculation. This is the more ungrateful, since it must have been well understood, by Signor Ronconi, that Madame Ronconi, who is at best a second-rate artist and has no reputation whatever, was only engaged on the liberal terms that are accorded her in deference to his (Signor Ronconi's) feelings, and in respect to his undeniable abilities. But we much question, if matters are to take this turn, whether even the Signor's services, valuable as they may be regarded, are worth having at such a sacrifice. The opera of Maria di Rohan was brought out at a large expense, the mise en scene costing not a penny less than eight hundred guineas. Madame Ronconi's three superb dresses, upon which she insisted—resolving, it would seem, to look well, if she could not sing well—were supplied, at a considerable outlay, on the part of the establishment, which, considering the effect they produced, was little better than thrown away. It would be rather hard upon the Royal Italian Opera shareholders to saddle them with such enormous disbursements for an opera that, performed as it was in one particular, would have kept money out of the house—or, on the other hand, for an opera that should only be given one night. The gentlemanly and liberal behaviour of the directors of the establishment towards the artists employed has been unanimously lauded—and it is ill done on the parts of two of the most largely remunerated to repay that behaviour in so unhandsome a manner. In conclusion, we promise to make all the facts, connected with this matter known to the public as they have occurred or as they may occur. We are always ready to be the artist's champion, but we are equally forward to own that the manager is occasionally, as in this remarkable instance, in great want of an advocate.

JENNY LIND AND MR. BUNN.

In recounting the impressions produced by the Swedish Nightingale on our English audiences, we have overlooked the question pending between her and the worthy lessee of Drury Lane Theatre. An inquiring letter from a subscriber has, however, recalled the subject to our attention. Since the last letters were printed in connection with this complex affair the following was sent to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, while she was still at Vienna.

"London, March 16, 1847.

MADemoisELLE,—I have received, through the hands of Mr. Lumley's solicitor, a copy of a letter with your signature, dated Vienna, the 28th ult., and before I reply to the offer you have therein made, I must take leave to correct some of the assertions it contains. You know perfectly well that, as respects 'The Camp of Silesia,' had you not broken your contract, M. Meyerbeer undertook to lend me its music, and to come to England and conduct it; and as respects the other opera you agreed to play ('La Sonnambula') its translation and all its music have been for years in this theatre. You were induced, in the first instance, to violate your engagement through the misrepresentations made to you by parties in Mr. Lumley's interest, well known to me, affecting my own character and that of my own theatre; and your resolution was confirmed by the enormous offers, in excess of mine, subsequently made you. I owe it, therefore, to my own honour to make such stipulations with you in any proposed arrangement arising out of your want of faith as will exonerate me to my public from appearing to have broken mine. You offer me 2,000*l.* to annul your contract with me; but, acting on the soundest legal advice, I shall lay my damages at a far larger sum if compelled to proceed against you. As, however, my object is to maintain the integrity of this establishment by the engagements I enter into, and not with fines offered by those who break them, I will consent to take the 2,000*l.* you offer as a partial compensation, and trust for any further indemnity to the result of your singing three times in this theatre (before you sing elsewhere in England) in any language you prefer. This is a sine quâ non with me; as I am determined, as far as I have the power, to falsify the assertions of those who have ventured to malign me.—I have the honour to be, &c.

A. BUNN."

Mr. Bunn consented then to take the £2,000. But consenting to take it and getting it are two very different matters. The subjoined advertisement, indeed, would seem to insinuate that they were absolute contraries.

"THEATRE ROYAL DRURY LANE.—MADemoisELLE JENNY LIND.—The Lessee begs to state that the engagement entered into with this artist having been violated by her, and she having been announced, on her arrival in this country, to sing at another theatre, he has no alternative but to carry out the assurance, conveyed to the public through his prospectus at the commencement of the season, viz., that of immediately instituting legal proceedings against her."

The above was inserted, by Mr. Bunn, in all the morning papers, and was followed by the paragraph below, which appeared in The Times a day or two afterwards.

"MR. BUNN AND JENNY LIND.—An action has been commenced, by Mr. Bunn, in the Court of Queen's Bench, against Jenny Lind, for an alleged breach of contract; and, on Friday last, an appearance to the writ of summons, issued a few days previously, was entered by a solicitor on the part of the defendant. The next proceeding will be the declaration, in which the plaintiff will estimate his damages. Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Cockburn, Q. C., have been retained for Mr. Bunn. The cause cannot be tried until the sitting after Trinity Term, commencing the middle of July."

And here, for the present, the matter stands. As we began by taking an interest in this legal dispute, we think it our duty to our readers to publish whatever may transpire, in order that they may be so thoroughly initiated with the proceedings as to enable them to form their own judgment. It is a knotty point and Mademoiselle Lind's immense success may possibly have some influence on its ultimate decision.

MEMOIR OF MADEMOISELLE ALBONI.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

Marietta Alboni was born at Cesena, in 1826; she is, therefore, barely two-and-twenty. Contrary to the wishes of her parents, she was at an early age sent to the Academy of Bologna, where her musical education was conducted under the immediate superintendence of ROSSINI, for whose compositions the lady evinced an early and passionate predilection. "Il Gran Maestro," during the first month of her education, upon being questioned as to the lyric destiny of his pupil, replied, "At present her voice is like that of an itinerant ballad singer, but the town will be at her feet before she is a year older." And, in fact, scarcely a year had elapsed when she received the honorary medal, accompanied with an order for appearance. She accordingly appeared for the first time at the Opera, in Bologna, in DONIZETTI's Lucrezia Borgia, being then scarcely sixteen. The result of this début was an immediate engagement for the Scala, at Milan; and the manager of that theatre renewed her engagement for four successive seasons, after her admirable creation of Leonora, in Donizetti's Favorita. From Milan, Alboni proceeded to Vienna, where she won fresh laurels, being the prima donna there for three consecutive seasons. Mdlle. Alboni's career from that period has been one of steady uninterrupted success, when she shone forth at the Royal Italian Opera like some dazzling meteor, second to none amid the galaxy of overwhelming talent, the veritable and perfect exponents of the lyric drama, who now grace the boards. No preliminary puffery, no ill-judged laudation, no fulsome adulation preceded the advent of Mdlle. Alboni. But the audience on her first appearance in Arsace were astounded at the wondrous sweetness and capacity of her organ, and our audiences, be it said, now possess a taste and appreciation in musical matters not quite so contemptible as some of the continental dilettanti formerly ascribed to us. To La Alboni are we indebted for that beautiful aria "In si barbara" in Semiramide—hitherto suppressed for want of a contralto with sufficient compass capable of giving full effect to the brilliant conception of the composer. Marietta Alboni is to Rossini, what Jenny Lind is to Meyerbeer. She has reached that pinnacle of celebrity her great master predicted she would attain; he witnessed the budding of that renown it was his pride to foster and enhance. Rossini himself signed her two first engagements. "I am," said he to her in 1840, "the subscribing witness to your union with renown, and success and happiness attend the union." A characteristic trait of the high-minded independence of Mdlle. Alboni deserves to be recorded. Soon after her arrival at Berlin, she was asked if she had waited on M——. "No," said the lady, "what is this M——?" "Oh! added her querist, "he is the most influential journalists in Prussia." "Well," exclaimed Alboni, "and what is that to me?" "Why," rejoined her friend, "if you do not before-hand insure his favourable report you are ruined!" "Well," rejoined the artiste, "let it be as Heaven directs, but I wish it to be understood that, in my breast, the woman reigns paramount to the artiste; and though failure were the result, I would never degrade myself by purchasing success at so humiliating a price." This, too, was at a time when her reputation was not firmly established. The anecdote was related in the fashionable salons of Berlin, and, to the honour of the society in that metropolis be it said, the noble sentiment of the young artiste was properly appreciated, for King William invited the spirited cantatrice to sing at his Court, where she received the well-deserved plaudits of an enraptured and admiring auditory, and from royalty more substantial proofs of the estimation in which her talents and integrity were held. Mdlle. Alboni's last engagement prior to her arrival in London, was at Venice, where she created quite a furor as Rosina in the Barber of Seville, Cenerentola, Tancredi, L'Italiana, &c. Her next part will be Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia, at the Royal Italian Opera; and she will appear in succession in Tancredi, Pietro in Linda di Chamouni, Pippo in La Gazza Ladra, Malcolm in La Donna del Lago, &c. A new opera for the display of her varied powers will be expressly composed for her, for the season 1848, by an eminent composer. The extraordinary compass of her organ, combining as it does the complete register of a contralto and of a mezzo soprano, will afford every opportunity to the composer to develop her vocal and histrionic genius more decidedly even than in her existing repertoire. Although Mdlle. Alboni possesses considerably embonpoint, her stage deportment is graceful and appropriate; her features are handsome, and in the expression of her face she can portray every varied emotion. The unrivalled charm of her voice, and her wonderful ease in singing, are now known to the whole of the musical public, and the rapture excited by her performances is unbounded.

VIEUXTEMPS' NEW CONCERTO.

(From La Gazette Musicale.)

"The arrival of Vieuxtemps in Paris, the virtuoso who sings on his violin as Rubini does with his voice, was one of the events of the season. The concert he gave on the 5th of April, in the Salle Herz, attracted the élite of the artistes of Paris, who all, without exception, applauded the above beautiful composition, as well as the admirable execution of the great artiste. Vieuxtemps's first concerto, a majestic composition, brilliantly instrumented, full of orchestral effects, abounding in ideas, all of which are made accessory to the general design, has been for these six years admired by every connoisseur; but as this remarkable work had been preceded and followed by a number of trivial fantasias, a report got abroad that the author had been assisted by others in the composition of this fine concerto. Now, however, Vieuxtemps returns to us armed with a rich and beautiful composition, resembling that which we first heard, in style, energy, and completeness, which has placed his reputation as an original composer for the violin on a firmer basis. The tutti of this new concerto—or rather, let us say, of this noble symphony, in which the violin, the king of instruments, is grandly predominant—commences with a poetical phrase, given by the flutes, the oboes, and the clarionets, afterwards repeated by the stringed instruments. The horns and trumpets announce the theme of the solo, which the principal instrument speedily attacks; then follows a striking and melodious cantabile for the clarionets; and above all the hubbub of the orchestra, the violin is heard crying like Virgil's Neptune, "Quos ego!" At the sound of this powerful voice the harmonious tumult subsides, and subsequently follows, assists, flatters, and caresses the voice of the violin as it revels in ethereal accents and in melodious sounds, which succeed each other diatonically with inconceivable rapidity. In these ascending and descending chromatic passages, not a single note is found missing by the most experienced violinist. The principal subject of the first solo, on the fourth string, is full of grandeur and grace; it is delineated on the sustained notes of the violins and the pizzicato of the basses; then comes a tremolo for the principal violins, in a diapason brought out with new effects, above all with that recitative that walks so poetically hand-in-hand with this tremolo of the orchestra. The orchestra replies by a succession of chords, and the principal part is heard above all in the grand subject of the first solo. The principal passage of the second solo is varied with charmingly natural modulations, and is gorgeously instrumented. The recitative returns in the primitive key, and with the same tremolo on the high notes of the orchestral violins. To this recitative a long cadence follows, which connects itself by a grand passage, bowed with the lower part of the archet, and executed in the smooth and tranquil manner that characterises the style of Vieuxtemps, and by which his rhythmical precision, and his legitimate desire to truthfully interpret every note of the most difficult passages, is shown to admiration. On a characteristic roll of the kettle-drums, rich orchestral effects intervene before the reprise of the principal motivo. A sliding leap from the highest octave of the fifth position on a D sharp of the third string, if we recollect aright, an easy and insignificant effect, repeated twice, quite astonishes the ignorant amateur. This fall from the top to the bottom of the instrument, recalls to us the sonnet of Oronte, in the Misanthrope, so much praised by Philinte, although we have no intention of applying the repartee of Alceste to Vieuxtemps. The adagio of this beautiful concerto is a tranquil and beautiful elegy, in C major, grave and natural in style, the melody simple, the harmony clear, and the instrumentation clever, though not complicated. These just praises authorise us in finding the encore awarded this movement, somewhat exaggerated. The honour was better merited by the last movement of the concerto. This finale unites the richness of accompaniments to the originality of melody, and the Paganini-like boldness of the first part. The subject is a charming Sicilienne, in A minor. We know not which to admire most—the elegance of the theme and the variety and beauty of the accessory ideas, or the vivacity and fire with which the player interprets it. Staccato passages, crisp and pearly—double octaves, powerful, and perfectly intonated—abound in this piece of vigorous execution. In a coda, fiery and dramatic, the principal subject returns with double octaves, of which we have just spoken, and sustained by the bassoon, which the composer has employed most happily; then follows a passage for the flutes, in the form of the Rans des vaches, responded to by the clarionettes; and then a brilliant shake on the dominant, under which is heard a beautiful melody by the clarionettes and flutes; and then again a thousand melodies and ingenious and bold harmonies, that transport and enrapture the auditor, and make him again wish to hear this beautiful instrumental composition, and the artist who wrote it, and could alone so beautifully interpret it."

BOUCHER AND BEETHOVEN.

(From the French of Castil-Blaze.)

Boucher, the violinist, setting out on a musical tour, took care to be provided with plenty of letters of introduction; among them, no less than twenty were addressed to Beethoven. On Boucher's arrival in Vienna he was anxious to pay homage to the "greatest musician of the day." Boucher traversed the faubourgs of Vienna, endeavouring to find his abode, and after great difficulty succeeded, and could say "Pho trovato questa porta benedetto!" but he could hardly believe his eyes when he viewed the humble abode of the "prince of musicians." A domestic, in answer to his inquiries, informed him that Beethoven was absent from home, and that it was uncertain when he would return. Boucher had therefore no alternative than to leave his card, accompanied by one of his letters of introduction, and return to his hotel, quite disappointed in not meeting with the object of his visit. The next day he was in no better luck; to the same inquiries he had the same replies; so he left another of his letters of introduction, and another card. In this manner, fourteen days elapsed, Boucher each day, at different hours, leaving a letter and a card, but without any satisfactory result therefrom. As the time of Boucher's departure from Vienna drew near, he was determined on a coup de grace, viz., to deliver the whole of his remaining letters at once. Beethoven really was absent when his domestic received letter number sixteen. This letter number sixteen, nevertheless, said no more than the fifteen previously delivered, but Goëthe had written it, Goëthe had signed it. The whole world knew the devoted friendship of these two men of genius. Beethoven, when he received this last letter, stamped his foot, and struck his forehead with vexation; rushed out of the house, and ran into the various hotels, demanding Boucher, without success. At last he staid to rest himself at Salieri's. No sooner was he seated, than he said to him, 'Find for me the violinist I have been seeking; bring him to me tomorrow; I will remain at home all day, for I absolutely must see him.' Next day Boucher received a visit from Salieri, overwhelmed with joy, he hastened, with his companion, to call on Beethoven; this time he felt sure of not being denied to him. Beethoven received the French violinist with great affability, and wished him to hear his latest compositions. The Great Master was on the extreme verge of deafness; he played on a piano that his friend Clementi had purposely made for him in London; it was built on the principle of acoustics, and a sort of dark room of a size sufficient to hold the performer and his auditor, contained the instrument. It was in this "harmonious box," in this "mysterious nook," that Boucher was admitted several times, tête-à-tête with the sublime improvisateur. One day, armed with a large pair of scissors, which he found on the table, the violinist demanded permission to cut off a lock of the master's hair; this had hardly been granted, ere the precious relic was in the hands of the spoiler; not content with this, the ambitious Boucher brought forward a sheet of music paper, with which he had provided himself,—a wise precaution, as nothing was more rare in Beethoven's house, for more than one of his inspirations, sometimes even an entire composition, was written by the Great Master on a sheet of common white paper, on which he had drawn some very irregular lines.—Beethoven noted down for Boucher, a petit duo for two violins, a duo composed solely in one phrase of seven bars followed by these lines. "Écrit le 29me, Avril, 1822, quand Monsieur Boucher, grand violon, me faisait l'honneur de me faire une visite." Louis van Beethoven. (written this 29th April, 1822, when M. Boucher, a great violinist, did me the honor to pay me a visit.) The illustrious musician spoke French excellently; the words "faisait," "faire," written down on the paper, presented a disagreeable combination to his delicate ear; although afflicted with deafness, the word "faisait," corrected several times, proved that Beethoven wished his language to be perished, and rendered more harmonious. Many of our poets are not so scrupulous.

THE AFFINITIES.

PART II.—CHAPTER XV.

It is in a happy, peaceful condition of living together, relations, friends, inmates of the same house, converse about what is happening, or about to happen, more than is necessary or reasonable; if they repeatedly communicate to each other their projects, undertakings, and occupations, and, without actually taking mutual counsel, yet always treat the whole of life, as it were, in a consulting manner; we find, on the other hand, at important moments, just when it would seem that man stood most in need of the support and assistance of another, that the individuals retire into themselves, strive to act each on his own account, each in his own fashion; and that while the single means are mutually concealed, it is only the issue, the end, the object attained, which again becomes a common property.

After so many wondrous and unhappy events, a certain quiet seriousness had thus come over the two friends, which expressed itself in an amiable forbearance. Quite privately, Charlotte had sent the child to the chapel. There it rested, as the first sacrifice of a foreboding fate.

Charlotte, as far as was possible, returned back into practical life, and here first she found Ottilia, who stood in need of her assistance. She chiefly busied herself with her, without, however, letting it be observed. She knew how much the heavenly girl loved Edward; she had, by degrees, gradually investigated the scene which had preceded the misfortune, and had learned every circumstance, partly from Ottilia herself—partly through letters from the Major.

Ottilia, on her side, greatly lightened Charlotte's immediate existence. She was frank, even talkative, but never spoke of the present, or of that which had just past. She had always remarked—always observed, she knew much; and all this was now made manifest. She amused and diverted Charlotte, who still nourished the secret hope of seeing so estimable a pair united.

But with Ottilia it was otherwise. She had revealed to her friend the secret of her course of life; she was released from her former restraint—from her servitude. By her repentance, by her resolution, she also felt herself freed from the weight of her fault—her misfortune. She no longer needed any power over herself; in the depth of her heart she had forgiven herself only on the condition of perfect self-denial, and this condition was inviolable for the whole future.

Thus some time had passed, and Charlotte felt how the house and park, the lake, the groups of trees and rocks, revived daily in them both nothing but melancholy sensations. It was perfectly clear the place must be changed, but how this was to be done, was not so easy to decide.

Should the two ladies remain together? Edward's former desire seemed to order it—his explanation and threats to render it necessary; but it could not be mistaken, that both the ladies, with all their good will, with all their reason, with all their efforts, were in a painful position when with each other. Their conversation was of a shunning kind. Often they wished only to half-understand something; but often an expression was misinterpreted, if not by the understanding, at least, by the feelings. They feared to wound each other, and this very fear was the first both to give and receive wounds.

If they could change the place and separate, at least, for a time, then came again the old question, where was Ottilia to go? The great rich family had made vain attempts to obtain for their hopeful daughter and heiress a companion who should amuse her and stimulate her by emulation. On the last visit of the Baroness, and recently by letter, had Charlotte been exhorted to send Ottilia thither; and now she again brought the subject under discussion. But Ottilia expressly refused to go where she would find, that which is usually called, the "great world."

"My dear aunt," she said, "that I may not appear narrow and self-willed, let me speak out that which, in another case, it would be my duty to dissemble—to conceal. Persons singularly unfortunate are, even if guiltless, marked in a fearful manner. Their presence excites a sort of horror in all who see them—who perceive them. Every one wishes to observe in them the monstrous affliction to which they are subjected. Every one is curious, and, at the same time, uneasy. Thus, a house, a town, in which some monstrous deed has taken place, remains fearful to every one who enters it. There the light of day shines less brightly, and the stars seem to lose their lustre."

"How great, and yet, perhaps, excusable, is the indiscretion, the silly importunity, the awkward good-nature of people towards such unfortunate persons. Pardon me for speaking so, but I suffered incredibly for that poor girl, when Luciana brought her forward out of the private apartments of the house, treated her with kindness, and, with the best intention, wished to compel her to play and dance. When the poor girl, growing more and more uneasy, at last fled and fainted, I caught her in my arms; the company were alarmed and excited, and every one was now, for the first time, really curious about the unhappy one. I did not then think, that a similar fate awaited me; but my sympathy, so true and lively, still exists. Now I can turn my compassion upon myself, and take care not to occasion similar scenes."

"But, my dear child," said Charlotte, "you will never be able to withdraw yourself from the sight of mankind. We have no convents, in which a refuge for such feelings might be found."

"Solitude creates no refuge, dear aunt," returned Ottilia. "The most precious refuge is to be found where we can be active. No atonement, no denial, is capable of withdrawing us from a vindictive destiny, if it is determined to persecute us. It is only if in an idle condition, I am obliged to stand as a spectacle to the world, that it becomes repulsive to me and torments me. But if I am found happy in my toil, unwearied in my duty, then I can endure the gaze of every one, as I need not fear that of God."

"I am very much mistaken," said Charlotte, "if your inclinations do not take you back to the school."

"Yes," answered Ottilia, "I do not deny it; I consider it a fortunate distinction to train others in the ordinary path, if we have been trained in the most singular manner. And do we not see in history that men, who, on account of great moral calamities, retired into the deserts, were by no means concealed and enveloped as they hoped to be? They were called back to the world, to lead wanderers into the right way; and who could do it better than those already initiated into the labyrinth of life? They have been called to assist the unhappy, and who can do it better than they whom no earthly evil can again befall?"

"You choose a singular destination," returned Charlotte. "I will not oppose you. Let it be, if only—as I hope—for a short time."

"How much I thank you," said Ottilia, "for allowing me this trial—this experiment. If I do not flatter myself too much, I shall succeed in it. In that place, I will remember how many trials I endured there, and how small, how utterly trivial, they were, compared to those which I was afterwards forced to experience. How cheerfully shall I observe the embarrassments of the young saplings, smile upon their childish sorrows, and, with gentle hand, conduct them out of all their little difficulties! The happy are not fitted to preside over the happy. It lies in human nature to require more from one's self and others, the more one has received. Only the unhappy, who have recovered themselves, know how to foster for themselves and others, the feeling that even a moderate good should be enjoyed with delight."

"Let me," said Charlotte, at last, after some hesitation, "make one more objection, which seems most important of all. The question is not about you, but about a third party. The disposition of the good, intelligent assistant is well known to you; in the path by which you go, you will become every day more valuable and indispensable. Since even now, in accordance with his feelings, he does not like to live without you, so in future, when once accustomed to your co-operation, he will, without you, be no longer able to manage his business. You will, at first, help him in it, to render it distasteful afterwards."

"Fate has not dealt gently with me," said Ottilia, "and those who love me have not perhaps anything much better to expect. Good and intelligent as our friend is, I hope that the feeling of a pure relation towards me will be developed in him. He will see in me a consecrated person, who perhaps can only outweigh a monstrous evil for herself and others, by devoting herself to that Holy Being, which invisibly surrounding us, can alone protect us against monstrous, intruding powers."

Charlotte made all that the dear girl had so feelingly uttered a subject for great consideration. She had in different ways, but most gently sounded Ottilia as to whether an union with Edward might not be possible, but the slightest mention, the least hope, the smallest suspicion seemed most deeply to move her; nay, once, when she could not avoid it, she expressed herself quite plainly on the subject.

"It," replied Charlotte, "your resolution to renounce Edward is so fixed and unchangeable, beware of the danger of seeing him again. When absent from the beloved object we seem, the more lively our affections, to have the more mastery over ourselves, by turning inwards the whole force of the passion which was directed outwards; but how soon, how swiftly are we snatched from this error when that with which we thought we could dispense, at once stands again before our eyes as indispensable? Do, now, what you consider most suitable to your circumstances; examine yourself—nay, rather change your present resolution, but do it from yourself—from your own free, willing heart. Do not let yourself be drawn by accident or by surprise into your former position; for then, for the first time, there will be a discord in the feelings, which is insupportable. As I have said, before you take this step, before you quit me, and begin a new life, which leads you—who knows whither—reflect once more, whether you can really renounce Edward for the entire future. If you are determined upon this point, we will make a compact, that you shall have no communion with him, not even so much as a conversation, if he seeks you, or forces himself upon you." Ottilia did not reflect a moment; she gave Charlotte the promise she had already given to herself.

But now before Charlotte's mind constantly floated that threat of Edward's, that he would renounce Ottilia, only so long as she was not separated from Charlotte. Circumstances had, indeed, so much changed since that time, so much had occurred, that a word wrung from him, at the moment, might be considered void with respect to succeeding events. Nevertheless, she did not wish to venture or undertake anything that could wound him in the slightest degree, and therefore Mittler was to sound Edward's views upon this point.

Since the death of Charlotte's child, Mittler had often, though only for an instant visited her. This calamity, which made the re-union of the married couple seem improbable in the highest degree, had a powerful effect upon him; but always, according to his natural disposition, hoping and striving, he now rejoiced in secret at Ottilia's resolution. He trusted to the softening influence of passing time, thought still to bring together the married pair, and regarded these passionate emotions as mere trials of conjugal love and fidelity.

Charlotte had from the very beginning informed the Major in writing of Ottilia's first declaration, had most earnestly entreated him to prevail upon Edward, that no further steps should be taken; that all should keep quiet, and wait to see whether the feelings of the dear girl would change. She had also communicated what was most necessary of the late events and views, and now Mittler was entrusted with the difficult problem, of preparing a change in Edward's mind. Mittler, however, well knowing that one sooner puts up with that which has already happened, than consents to that which has not yet taken place, persuaded Charlotte that it was best to send Ottilia at once to school.

On this account, as soon as he had departed, preparations were made for the journey. Ottilia packed up her things, but Charlotte plainly saw that she meant to take with her, neither the beautiful chest nor anything out of it. She remained silent, and let the silent girl do as she pleased. The day of departure arrived; Charlotte's carriage was on the first day, to take Ottilia to a well-known lodging for the night, and on the second, to take her to the school. Nanny was to accompany her, and remain as her servant. This impetuous girl had, after the child's death, immediately attached herself to Ottilia, and now, clung to her as before, from nature and inclination. Nay, she appeared by her entertaining loquacity, to make up for her former omissions, and to wish thoroughly to devote herself to her beloved mistress. She was quite beside herself at the happiness of travelling with her,—of seeing new regions, as she had never been beyond the place of her birth, and she ran from the castle into the village to announce her felicity to her parents and relations, and to take leave of them. Unfortunately, in the course of these visits, she entered the rooms of persons sick with the measles, and at once felt the consequences of infection. The journey was not to be put off; Ottilia herself was urgent about it; she had already travelled on the road, she knew the people of the inn where she was to stop, the coachman of the castle took her, and there was nothing to be feared.

Charlotte made no opposition. She also in thought already hastened from the spot, and only wished to arrange for Edward, the rooms in the castle which Ottilia had inhabited, just as they had been before the arrival of the captain. The hope of receiving a part felicity always flashes up once more in man, and Charlotte was justified in forming such hopes, nay, was compelled to entertain them.

STARTLING INFORMATION. (From Pusch's London Correspondent.)

"I have a great literary secret to impart to you, which I picked up at the door of one the Clubs, from a porter who enjoys my confidence. My news is neither more nor less than this—which I hasten to divulge; for I am determined that your paper shall be the first, either in or out of London, to communicate the startling intelligence. Well, then, the fact is, that Macaulay has quarrelled with the Edinburgh Review, and has joined Lloyd's List, which is shortly to appear under his avowed editorship. He commences the next number with one of his brilliant essays on shipping; and the Edinburgh Review will, it is expected, merge in the Observer, to which it will form a quarterly supplement. The corps of the Edinburgh being thus dispersed, will leave many of its writers free, and it is expected they will go over in a body to the Musical World, which will be enlarged to six times its present size, and will be published every half-hour. By the bye, Hallam does not write a burlesque for the Olympic, nor is the lessee in treaty with Dr. Kaye Shuttleworth; though if these two eminent men could be induced to combine their strength, an immense treat might be expected."

SONNET.

No. XXXV.

I often ask this question when alone;
Whether the love I feel for thee is wrong.
Then comes an answer like a Seraph-song,
So soft and so consoling is its tone,
Telling me thou art destin'd for my own,
That though around me many troubles throng,
I must resist them with endurance strong.
And then, at last, they all shall be o'erthrown.
Oh, think not that our love can come to nought,
And that the purest feeling man can cherish,—
A love that shows its origin from Heav'n
Such wondrous changes in my heart has wrought,
Only to fade away and sadly perish.
Think not a blessing for a curse was given.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

RUSSELL v. SMITH.—Sergeant Talford. The plaintiff is the well-known performer of musical entertainments of his own composition; the defendant has been in the habit of imitating them. The action was brought to try the plaintiff's right. The composition was, "The Ship on Fire," the piece was sold to Cramer and Co. The defendant, Smith, had become a servile imitator; he sang the same music and same words as Mr. Russell, who had brought this action to vindicate his right to the exclusive performance of his own work. Mr. BEALE (examined). "The Ship on Fire" is a song of a dramatic character. (Cross-examined). I have heard it sung by Russell; he accompanied himself. There is a piano and forte in most songs; "All's Well" is not a dramatic song, it's a duet. "The Ship on Fire" is as original as any song we have; it may resemble Rooke's Amilie in one part; I call it a dramatic song. Mr. WEST (examined). I have heard Mr. Smith perform "The Ship on Fire"; it was the same as Russell's, note for note. Mr. Russell's piece, as a part of the diatonic major-scale; the same as Rooke's Amilie, but the harmony in Mr. Russell's song is original and the time and key are different in the two pieces. The diatonic major-scale belongs to me or any one. Sir HENRY BISHOP. "The Ship on Fire" is an original song; it is as original as songs are in modern days; Haydn was not always original but the songs that he brought out are still called his; few composers can be called original; Beethoven and Cherubini were original; there are passages in Beethoven similar to previous composers; this occurs in the works of all the great composers. "The Heavens are Telling" resembles "The Lass of Richmond Hill."—Verdict, Forty Shillings Damages.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN VOICE.

Compiled by FREDERICK WEBSTER, Professor of Elocution to the Royal Academy of Music.

THE art of speaking well, has, in most civilized countries, been a cherished mark of distinction, between the elevated and the humble conditions of life, and has been immediately connected with some of the greater labours of ambition and taste. It may, therefore, appear extraordinary, that the world with all its works of philosophy should have been satisfied with an instinctive exercise of the art, and without occasional examples of its supposed perfection: without an endeavour to found an analytic system of instruction productive of more multiplied instances of success. Due reflection, however, will convince us, that even this extended purpose of the art of speaking, has been one of the causes of neglect. The renowned of the senate, the pulpit, the bar, and the stage, applauded into self-confidence by the multitude that surrounds them, cannot acknowledge the necessity of improvement: for the rewards that await the art of gratifying the general ear are in no less a degree encouraging to the faults of the voice than the approving judgment of the million is subversive of the rigid discipline of the mind.

Physiologists have described and classed the organic position by which the alphabetic elements are produced. On other points their attempts have not been so satisfactory. In investigating the subject of intonation, they have not designated, by some known or invented scale, the modes and degrees of such movements. They have rather given their attention to such questions as these:—Whether the organs of the voice partake of the nature of a wind or stringed instrument? how the falsetto is made? and whether acuteness and gravity are formed by variations in the dimensions of the glottis, or in the tension of its chords. They have carefully inspected the cartilages and muscles of the larynx, to discover thereby the immediate cause of intonation, whilst they were ignorant of the very modes and degrees of that intonation. In short they have tried to see sound and touch it with the dissecting knife—and all this without reaching any positive conclusion, or describing more of the audible effect of the anatomical structure, than was known two thousand years ago.

The Greek and Roman rhetoricians and writers on music recorded their knowledge of the functions of the voice. They distinguished its different qualities, by such terms as hard, smooth, sharp, clear, hoarse, full, slender, flowing, flexible, shrill, and austere; they knew the time of the voice, and had a view to its quantities in pronunciation. They gave to stress, under its form of accent and emphasis, appropriate places in speech. They discovered two modes of ascent and descent in pitch; one, by a continuous rising or falling slide, which they called concrete sound; the other by a discontinuous movement, which they called discrete sound, they also ascertained that the concrete was employed in speech and the discrete on musical instruments. Though from carrying the analysis no further, they erroneously supposed, as we shall learn hereafter, that the concrete was solely appropriated to speech, the discrete solely to instruments. The uses of pitch or the tones of the voice as they are called were conducted altogether by imitation, and the means of improvement were not reduced to any precise or available directions of art.

The few and indeterminate designations of the modes in reading, compared with the number and accuracy of the terms in music, imply the different degrees of success with which each has been cultivated. The inquirers into the nature of speech have given up their judgments to authority, and their pens to quotation. The musician has devoted his ear to observation and his labour to the trial of its truth. The words quick, slow, long, short, loud, soft, rise, fall, and turn, include nearly all the analytic terms of the art. How far they fall short of an enumeration of all the functions of the voice, and how fairly the present condition of our knowledge is here represented, shall be determined by an age to come, when the ear will have made deliberate examination.

A conviction of the imperfect state of our knowledge in some of the branches of the art of speaking first suggested the design of the ensuing investigation, whilst a hope to influence others to assist in the completion of a desirable measurement and method of the voice produces the present work.

I cannot withhold from this place a remark, on the importance of fixed principles in the arts; not only because these principles are the true sources of the intellectual enjoyment, which the arts afford, but because they are the most effective means for their improvement; and, although the entire want of such principles for the government of intonation, has unnecessarily led to the belief that they cannot be instituted, it will be shown, in the following essay, that they are not only as essential, but, likewise, as attainable in elocution, as in any other art which employs the judgment and interests the imagination. Music, with its infinitude of details, would still have been a mystery, if the doctrine of its intervals and time, and the mode of their construction could have been caught, only from the multiplied combinations and rapid execution of the orchestra. The accuracy of mathematical calculation, joined with the sober patience of the ear, over the slow practice of its elements, has not had more success in disclosing the system of this beautiful and luminous science than a similar watchfulness over the deliberate movements of speech will afford for the facilities of observation and the conscious use of its acquisition. If there is any scope in the works of nature, or any foredoomed efficiency of means to complete the circle of her designs, we shall find, on the development of the scheme of speech, those unalterable rules, within the pale of which, the voice should be variously exercised, in order to give light to the understanding and pleasure to the ear.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday and Tuesday La Sonnambula was played for the second and third times. On Thursday, an extra night, Roberto il Diavolo was given. The ballet-performances have consisted of the same entertainments we have already so frequently noticed, viz:—Tableaux from Coralia, or Thea, and several incidental dances, with Cerito, Rosati, Marie Taglioni, Perrot, St. Leon, &c. Lucile Grahn has been seriously ill but has now, we believe, quite recovered. Cerito, has also been slightly indisposed, so as to prevent her dancing on Tuesday and Thursday.

The houses have been overflowing and the enthusiasm of Mlle. Lind has not one item abated. Her next character will, we understand, be in the Fille du Regiment of Donizetti, which is now in active rehearsal. Mr. Lumley is certainly a lucky man, but no one can grudge him what he has obtained by indomitable energy and perseverance. He won Jenny Lind well—may he wear her long. We wish him no better, nor worse.

On Saturday Marie Taglioni danced for the last time. She was received with that applause which was due to her great merits and unassuming character. Perhaps no dancer ever won reputation and friends so quickly as Marie Taglioni. She made her first public début, at Her Majesty's Theatre, on the opening night of the season. Her charming talent was, at once, appreciated, and her personal beauty and agreeable manner achieved what her artistic promise began. She is already an established favourite here, and her annual appearance amongst us will be looked for with anxiety. Mr. Lumley could not possibly have made a more happy addition to his choreographic troupe. We believe Marie Taglioni is scarcely sixteen; if so her talent is the more remarkable and the greatest things may be anticipated of her future career. She has gone, with her father, M. Paul Taglioni, to Berlin, where the latter resumes his duties, as ballet-master, at the Opera.

To-night Carlotta Grisi makes her first appearance, this season, in Esmeralda. This will be a fête for the lovers of the ballet. The popular and admirable danseuse is engaged for two months.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The production of Lucrezia Borgia on Saturday night was, as yet, the greatest triumph of the new operatic establishment. Whether we take into consideration the ensemble of the band and the chorus, or the principals severally, we shall find nothing to award but the very highest praise. It was one of the most complete operatic performances ever presented to a British audience. Nearly the whole strength of the company was made available, and the smallest parts were entrusted to artists, who, hitherto, had been accustomed to appear in nothing subordinate. This speaks loudly in favour of the management, but still more loudly for the leading members of the vocal corps, who, throwing aside all feelings of rivalry, had no ulterior consideration beyond that of illustrating a great work of a master in the most complete manner. To Signor Marini, especially, the chiefest thanks is due, for not only undertaking an inferior part, but for resigning to another artist, without a murmur, a principal character in the opera, in which he had won himself a great continental reputation. This is truly pulling together in the same harness, and while works are thus produced, as Lucrezia Borgia was produced on Saturday night, the management can have no fear of realizing its most sanguine hopes of success. On some few occasions we have found reason to stint our praise of the Royal Italian Opera; on the present occasion, we cannot be too loud, or laudatory in its commendation. Let the reader peruse the cast of characters, and judge for himself, whether we are attempting to hyperbolise.

Our readers and the public are sufficiently acquainted with Donizetti's opera to preclude us from entering into the merits of the music, or the drama. The opera is considered one of the master's best serious works, and with this estimate we feel inclined to agree. The drama is taken from Victor Hugo's celebrated tragedy, Lucrezia Borgia, and though not happily adapted in the operatic version, it still retains much of the fearful interest, and several of the striking situations of the splendid original. The first indication of the superior manner in which the opera was got up on Saturday evening, was instanced in the performance of the chorus in the first scene, "Bando a si triste," which was so magnificently given as to elicit a tremendous encore. It was sung to perfection, which can hardly be a matter of doubt, when we mention Alboni, Marini, Tagliafico, Mario, and Polonini among the singers. Marini's magnificent bass voice came out grandly in the forte, and towered above all the rest. The scene between Astolfo, the agent of the Duchess, and Rustighello, the agent of the Duke, when the latter has the former seized by a band of soldiers, was also admirably managed, and given with completeness; the singing of Pietro Ley and Lavia being worthy of very great praise. The chorus, "Al suo nome," was rendered with fine effect. What we have noted here of the chorus in the above morceaux, may be applied to their entire share of the performance. They were uniformly excellent throughout the whole opera. Of Alboni, we have already spoken so much in terms of praise, as almost to have expended our vocabulary of eulogy. She was at least as great in Orsini as in any of her previous efforts. The audience seemed to think the artist was far greater, for on no former occasion did she excite so much enthusiasm. In the romanza, "Nella fatal di Rimini," she was encored, and subsequently recalled. Such an encore, and such a recall, we have rarely witnessed indeed. In the bacchanalian ballad, "Il segreto per esser," a still greater triumph awaited her. She was encored twice, and recalled afterwards. Her acting in this scene was admirable. Her whole performance created a veritable furor. Mademoiselle Alboni was in splendid voice—when is she not?—and sang most exquisitely—when does she not? Mario, when he commenced, exhibited symptoms of his late illness. We were aware of his still labouring under the effects of his attack of influenza, but, sooner than disappoint the subscribers and the public, he waived all thoughts of self, and would not postpone the opera a single night. In the last act, however, he seemed to have discarded all his illness, and sang and acted as finely as ever. The beautiful aria, "Come e soave," was deliciously given, and rapturously encored. We hardly ever remember Mario to have sung with more sweetness and more expression. In the last scene his acting was really great, and his death managed with the highest possible art. Tamburini, as the Duke, had but one scene in which his powers were called forth, but in that one scene the artist was surpassingly fine. His cold-bloodedness and Iago-like aspect as he watched the Duchess's countenance when Gennaro was brought in to be put to death, was masterly in the extreme; and the serpent-like smile he put on when he demanded of Lucrezia, "Noto vi e desso?" was worthy of the greatest tragedian. Many more delicate points were given in this scene with the deepest skill and insight into character, which unfortunately were lost on the majority of the audience, who were in utter ignorance of the words the great artist uttered. If audiences at our Italian Operas could understand the language which forms the vehicle to the music, they would not always bestow their loudest acclamations upon the strongest singers, but would sometimes feel that passion has other grand vents besides force and vociferation. In this scene of Tamburini's we ourselves felt the full power of the great actor, and were assured his consummate art was never more truthfully, or intensely exhibited. It was such a piece of acting, so unexaggerated, so deep and full of meaning, as Macready would have loved to look upon. Nothing could be finer than the assumed calmness of the artist, while he was probing his faithless spouse to the quick, till she inquires of him, "who makes him so determined against Gennaro?" when turning upon her, he utters, in a tone of frenzy, "You!" and then follows an explosion of passion, intensely real and grand. The whole of this scene, between Grisi and Tamburini was a great dramatic feast. Our friend, a brother of the daily press, in his notice on Tamburini's performance of the Duke, is something stinting in his praise, because, as he says, he had seen Lablache, who was the original of the part. We beg to assure our honest and thoroughly impartial cotemporary that he labours under an error. We dislike all comparisons, and between two such artists as Tamburini and Lablache it would appear particularly invidious; but, we cannot refrain from setting the critic to rights, regarding the original performance of the Duke Alfonso, in Lucrezia Borgia. When the opera was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre, Tamburini was the original Duke. After his secession, Lablache undertook the character, but, being a basso, was compelled to transpose the music. It was Tamburini, and not Lablache, who identified himself with Duke Alfonso. The impression Grisi left upon our minds in her performance of Lucrezia Borgia, on Saturday night, it will take a long time to efface. We never witnessed, on the boards of any stage, a grander representation of the tragic passions. It would take more room than we could well spare to enumerate half the excellencies of her singing and acting. Signs there were, occasionally, in her singing, that Grisi, as well as Mario, was labouring under the effects of influenza; but, who would condescend to name the spots in the sun, when describing that glorious luminary? As lofty and haughty as her Semiramide, or Norma; as thrilling as her Donna Anna; as pathetic as her Anna Bolena; Grisi's Lucrezia rises far above them all in sustained intensity and vigour. Her first song, "Come é bello," was hardly given with the finish and precision we have heard it on other occasions. The effects of her illness were perceivable; but, throughout the scene, with Gennaro, she was all herself again, and sang with unusual effect. In this scene her acting was exquisitely truthful and beautiful. In the next scene, with the revellers, when they all taunt her with her crimes, she came out with such power and fire as to electrify the house. The curtain fell amidst a storm of applause. The scene with the Duke was so magnificent, involving so many different shades of feeling and passion, depicted so truthfully, as to leave it a difficult task to look for anything in modern tragic acting to surpass it, or even to parallel with it. Her rage, when she demands the Duke to punish the traitor, who has dared to defame her name, the vengeful joy she exhibits when told her calumniator is in the Duke's hands, her horror at beholding in her calumniator, Gennaro, her own son; her agonised endeavour to save his life, without betraying who he is; her pathetic pleadings to the Duke, and her despair when forced to decide whether Gennaro shall die by poison, or by the sword, were all evidences of the very loftiest art. The subsequent scene with Gennaro, where she entreats him to take the antidote, after he has drunk the poison, was tremendously grand. Her last scene with Gennaro, where his death occurs, was grander than all. We have no terms capable of conveying the absolute sublimity of her performance here. Siddons herself, as she wailed over the death of Arthur, was never more affecting, or more real. The aria, "Era desso il figlio mio," unfortunately the weakest morceau in the opera, was given like the notes of the dying swan, and her last words, as she falls on the body of her son, were uttered as if they came from a heart on the verge of breaking. After such a performance what are re-calls, bravos, plaudits, enthusiasm, and furor? Compliments, certainly, as indicating the feeling of the audience, but absolutely nothing commensurate with the merits of the artist. In such a case is not the silenced tongue, and the mute hands, evidencing the throbbing heart, fitter eulogy, than roars and thunder, and useless summonings? So felt we—when the curtain fell, our lips were sealed: when Grisi came on our hands were not uplifted.

After the opera, the divertissement, La Bouquetière de Venise, was performed, in which Mademoiselle Fanny Elssler introduced the Cachucha for the second time, and gained immense applause. The opera of Lucrezia Borgia was repeated on Tuesday, with increased effect; after which, a new ballet was produced, entitled, La Salamandrine. We propose reviewing this ballet, next week, at some length, and introducing in our notice an original poem founded on the Salamandrine, written by a celebrated author, and shall therefore reserve our remarks till our next number. On Thursday, an extra-night, the Lucrezia was performed for the third time, with the last act of Italiana and La Salamandrine. This evening, the Barbiere is played with an unexpected cast of characters; and Don Giovanni is announced for next Thursday. D. R.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE

(To the Editor of "The Musical World.")

SIR,—In answer to the letter of Phil-Hymnos, in your last, I send you the order of service for next Sunday evening. The writer cannot surely be aware that the object of the Society is to have the music of the church sung properly in the church by persons who have been educated in the science. The profession have been brought up in the church, and ought, in my opinion, to be found employment and properly remunerated. The anthems were written for the use of the church, and not for the concert-room. The service that we sing on Sunday evenings is written by the organist of Rochester Cathedral, and is a very clever composition; and we have many that could and would write for the church, if there was even a chance of their writings being heard. Trinity Church has no means of supporting a choir but by annual subscriptions and voluntary contributions, while the Mother Church, I have been informed, has an income of £1,500 a year to repair the outside of it, arising from the Haines Inn estate. Mr. Surman has been applied to by the clergyman and churchwardens of the church to undertake the superintendence of the choir, and the means that are made use of to support it are in accordance with their directions. I am happy to say that the congregation is increasing, and applications are being made from other churches to provide them with educated choristers. If any of the clergy were to go there in the evening, they would hear the same music sung as at St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the Chapel Royal, where best sung, I must leave them to judge for themselves.—Yours, truly,

A CHORISTER OF TRINITY CHURCH.

MR. HOLM, THE PHRENOLOGIST,

DEAR MR. EDITOR.—Knowing the earnest interest that so many of your subscribers attach to the important science of Phrenology, I cannot resist to beg of you a corner for a few lines, to direct their attention to a most exquisite portrait of the worthy philosopher and phrenologist, Holm, Esq. (the friend of the great Spurzheim), which is at the present Royal exhibition—to use a familiar phrase, it speaks from the canvass. It is decidedly the best and most intellectual likeness I ever saw, and painted with that masterly perfection and decision that at once proclaims the first-rate artist. Mr. Hervien enjoys the greatest reputation on the Continent, and is the best pupil of Girodet. I saw his illustrations of a popular work, and sketches of American manners, which are worthy of the highest praise, giving proofs of the most luxuriant artistic imagination and the highest finish.

(To the Editor of "The Musical World.")

SIR,—In the double number of your excellent work of the 2nd of May, 1846, there appeared an advertisement, stating, that a gold medal would be awarded, in the following July, for the best Anthem; it went on to state the conditions to be observed and where it might be sent to. As one of the candidates I should feel much obliged if you could inform me whether any award has yet been made, I know that none was made in July as the advertisement stated it would be. I have no doubt but that among your numerous subscribers there are some, who, like myself, sent in their MS. so that if you cannot inform me perhaps some of them can. I remain, sir, your obedient servant,
A. B.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—On Monday evening, the new comedy, Temper, was produced at this house, with the most complete success. The comedy kept attention alive, if it did not create surprise or emotion. The plot of Temper is trivial to a degree, and old as Mount Athos. A young lady is a rich heiress, wayward and passionate. She is beloved by a young gentleman, who is not rich, but is equally wayward and passionate as the young lady. A quarrel ensues, because the lover is not exact in his appointment to sign the marriage settlements; a breach follows, and then a reconciliation. The comedy of Temper is neatly written and natural. The characters of the play are sufficiently contrasted, and drawn with some force. Mr. Webster, who played his part extremely well, had to support a calculating fortune-hunter, a character amusing enough, but which may be found in nine novels out of ten. Mr. Farren, in an old bachelor, who is entirely good-natured and has lost his memory, was excellent and appeared to greater advantage than we have seen him for a long time in a new part. Mrs. Glover had a part well suited to her. This great artist played a bustling, perpetually-talking widow, with all her usual power, and excited immense laughter whenever she appeared. The sketches of two country demoiselles admirably supported by Miss P. Horton and Mrs. Humby, were, perhaps, the most meritorious efforts of the author of Temper. Miss Fortescue, as the wayward heiress, performed with grace and spirit. She was deserving of much praise in her reconciliation scene in the last act with her lover. The manager has gone to very great expense in producing the comedy. The dresses and scenery were as fine and appropriate as they possibly could be. Temper will take its place beside those works produced at the Haymarket Theatre, which, by a long run, will reimburse the manager for a heavy outlay. The Hungarian Instrumental Vocalists have appeared every evening, during the week, and continue to prove very attractive at second price. Their performances are novel and highly amusing.

PRINCESS'S.—Mrs. Butler closed her engagement last evening with the performance of Juliet, in "Romeo and Juliet." Macready and Mrs. Warner are engaged, and appear on Monday, in "Hamlet." A choregraphic troupe, called the Hungarian dancers, made their appearance on Thursday evening, and performed several national pas, which were received with much applause.

FRENCH PLAYS.—Un Coup de Lansquenot is neither a very new, nor a very brilliant idea. A man who pays his court to a married woman, and hesitates at marrying a young and beautiful girl with a large fortune, he himself being over-head and ears in debt—such is the subject matter. The moral is doubtful, and the wit, to say the least of it, stale and second-hand. The usual jokes at the blindness of husbands, more particularly diplomatic ones, the beauty of being dunned by creditors, the excitement of spending other people's money, with an uncle in the back-ground to make all right at the finish; such are the materials worked up into two acts by M. Léon Laya. There is but one good character, that of Desrousseaux, played by Monsieur Regnier; he is a man who would give anything to come out strong, but it won't do; in vain he attempts the roué; he cannot be anything but a simple, easy, bashful, country gentleman. M. Regnier was, as usual, excellent: he is so full of mercury, that he keeps himself and every one else continually on the move. His part is the least item in his acting—his bye play is sufficient to carry the house by storm—he gesticulates with his legs, arms, head, hands, hat—in short, he is perpetual motion impersonated. The scene in which he persuades his friend to marry the girl and not to marry her, and his dealing the cards to decide which letter shall be sent, was most amusing. Mademoiselle Denain, as the Marchioness, had a most difficult part to make anything of—a compound of easy morality and forced repentance, without even the merit of voluntarily discarding her would-be lover. This charming actress, nevertheless, supplied by the polished style and graceful sensibility of her performance, all the interest in which the character she had to portray was wanting. She looked, as she always does, handsome and elegant, and lady-like. Mlle. Vallée looked and acted to perfection the part of the young maiden. "Oscar," or Un Mari qui trompe sa femme, is worthy of the reputation of M. Scribe in every respect. Oscar Bonnavet has married young, and loves his wife to adoration. Unfortunately he has taken to reading the novels of the romantic school, and he finds everything insipid when compared to the burning passion and harrowing crimes depicted by our modern writers of fiction. His brain turned, by poring over these compositions, he resolves to commit a crime himself, just to judge how he will feel after it, and with this intention, chooses what he calls the most agreeable of all, that of deceiving his wife. Full of this idea, he writes a letter to his niece, and proposes a meeting. She answers, "Oscar, je t'attends;" but his wife gets possession of the epistle, and sends her servant instead. Oscar does not discover his mistake until some time after, and then he is frightened to death that his wife may find him out, he doubles Manette's wages, who, by the bye, is prudently kept in the dark by her mistress, and buys her silence by giving her a large sum of money. The tables are now turned or awhile; Oscar laughs at his own fears, but his wife regains her empire by relating to him the whole affair in which she had duped him during upwards of six months. Matters are finally brought to a successful termination, and Manette's power is brought to an end. M. Regnier was admirable. His terror of his wife, his fear of discovery, his horror of being betrayed by his servant, his confession to his wife, were all models of comic acting, and kept the house in convulsions. Mademoiselle Denain was admirable as the wife, and made every point tell with exquisite art. M. Cartigny as the uncle, who never loses sight of the main chance, added materially to the success of the piece. Mdle. Duverger looked even more pretty than usual, and threw a proper measure of pertness into the part of the soubrette.

CONCERTS.

MADAME PUZZI'S CONCERT.—The Annual Morning Entertainment of this esteemed professor is usually the herald of the monster-concerts for the season. On the present occasion the locale was, as usual, the great music-room of Her Majesty's Theatre. The programme was on the scale of variety and excellence to which Madame Puzzi has, for many years, accustomed her patrons and the public. The following vocalists took part in the proceedings:—Mesdames Montenegro, F. Lablache, Castellan, and Toulmin; Mdles. De Mendi, Georgette Brocard, and Dolby; Signori Gardoni, Fraschini, Lablache, F. Lablache, Coletti, Superchi, and Staudigl. Signor Marras was announced, but did not make his appearance. The vocal selection was generally admirable, some few pieces especially so. Among these were conspicuous two capital songs from the Bohemian Girl and the Castle of Aymon, by Balfe, delivered by Staudigl, with a characteristic energy of style in which the great German basso has very few competitors. The neat and graceful execution of Mdle. de Mendi, a young and pretty Spanish vocalist, nearly related to poor Malibran, in the well-known air varié, by Rode, excited general approval. Mdle. Georgette Brocard, a debutante, produced a favourable sensation in an air from Pacini's Saffo, although the air itself is devoid of merit. Another noticeable item was the air, "Il Sogno," from one of Mercadante's operas, cleverly sung by Signor Coletti, and expressively accompanied by Signor Puzzi, on the horn obligato. Madame Montenegro's "Una voce," was a sensible if not a highly finished performance. A trio from Ricci's Scaramuccia, rendered with infinite spirit by Signori Fraschini, Superchi, and Coletti; Signor Gardoni's intelligent and graceful delivery of the air, "Alla mia mente estatica," from one of Balfe's best operas, Falstaff; and Linley's pretty ballad, "Constance," expressively sung by Miss Dolby, were also to be reckoned among the best features of the concert. Nor must Madame Castellan's "Qual prece," (Mercadante), Signor Coletti's "Se la vita," (Tadolini), and the lively duet, "Les Muletiers," sung by Madame and Signor F. Lablache, be passed over without praise. To avert disappointment, arising from the absence of Signor Marras, a duet was liberally volunteered by Madame Castellan and Signor Lablache, which was warmly appreciated by the audience. The instrumental part of the concert contained several features worthy notice; and, one especially, as much from its novelty as from its merit, we mean the performance of a pianoforte fantasia, on Bohemian airs, by Herr Schuloff, a pianist from Prague, who displayed such musicianly taste and such neat and brilliant mechanism as to force an encore, which is a rare occurrence at these fashionable morning concerts, where the preponderance of ladies among the audience obviates the possibility of any energetic demonstrations of approval. The compliment was, therefore, the greater to Herr Schuloff's admirable talent. Instrumental music seemed decidedly to bear the bell at Madame Puzzi's concert—since another encore was awarded to Signor Cesare Ciardi, (first flute to the Grand Duke of Tuscany), who exhibited extraordinary facility and marvellous rapidity of utterance in a solo on the flute. Signor Ciardi, though new to this country, has, it would seem, found quick appreciation, since, we understand, that he is in treaty with one of our great musical establishments. M. Lavigne's solo on the oboe and Signor Piatti's solo on the violoncello were equally masterly in their way, and produced the most unequivocal marks of approbation. These artists are respectively first oboe, and first violoncello in the orchestra at Her Majesty's Theatre, of the quality of which they are brilliant examples. The horn performance of Signor Puzzi, exhibited all the usual excellencies and peculiarities of that artist's very individual talent, and was foremost among the morning's attractions. The conductors at the piano were Messrs. Balfe, Pilotti, and Benedict, who effected their devoir in that style of excellence that might have been anticipated from their talents and experience. The room was crowded, and no one complained of anything in the concert but its excessive length—the invariable fault of such entertainments.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The third Concert took place on Wednesday, May 5. The selection being under the superintendence of H. R. H. Prince Albert, comprised, as usual, a great number of novelties, and these, combined with the immense attraction of the artists employed to interpret it, ensured the fullest attendance in the Hanover Square Rooms that has hitherto distinguished the ancient performances. This is a distinction that never fails to wait upon the concerts which Prince Albert directs. That illustrious personage is evidently an innovator and is never satisfied with the common places of every day occurrence; from which it results, that even if all his selections be not happy, they never fail to interest as matters of speculation.

Out of the seventeen pieces eleven were novelties, and out of the eleven novelties half a dozen, at least, were worth a hearing. The Gregorian chaunt was harmonized in a style by no means Gregorian—we know not by what musician. The Mottetto of Marcello is a clever but not an exciting composition; still it merited a hearing. The finale to Il Flauto Magico was a treat, although it might have been more carefully executed. The overture, Fugato, of Mozart, is a masterly effort, and the introduction of this alone entitles Prince Albert to the thanks of the subscribers. Stradella's air was expressively sung by Gardoni, and Rousseau's simple ballad admirably expressed by Mario. Of course the organ performance of Dr. Mendelssohn, vile as is the organ of the Hanover Square Rooms, was the most interesting point in the programme. It was at the special request of H. R. H. Prince Albert that the greatest of organists, pianists, and composers, appeared in public on this occasion, for the last time, previous to his departure for the continent. He selected the Fugue of Sebastian Bach, (well known to his admirers), constructed on the notes which answers to the letters of his name; B (B flat) A-C-H (B natural) according to German notation. This he prefaced by a prelude to the same composer, selected from another work, but agreeable in character and key to what was to follow. It was a masterly and splendid performance and got more applause than we ever heard recorded at the Ancient Concerts. Mendelssohn's almost the only player in the world who can accommodate himself to the peculiarities of a defective instrument, or make his hearers forget the imperfections of the medium through which he interprets himself—and this was shown to admiration on the infamous organ that has so long disgraced the Hanover Square Rooms. With a word for Mademoiselle Alboni's "Che farò," which was excellent, and for Staudigl's general singing all through the concert we must conclude the notice of this—the most interesting ancient performance of the season.

The Fourth took place on Wednesday evening, under the direction of his Grace the Archbishop of York. The programme was as follows.—

FINALE to the Second Act of Fidelio—Solos, Madame Caradori, Miss Rainforth, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Peck, Mr. Whitworth, and Herr Staudigl.....Beethoven.

The above programme was entirely destitute of any interest derivable from the novelty of its materials. The only two new points—Catal's overture to Semiramis, and Jannequin's Chant Français, were both failures. The best singing of the evening was Miss Rainforth's "Song of the Quail," Madame Caradori's "Invano alcun desir," (Gluck), which was repeated, and the two songs of Herr Staudigl. The room was not nearly full. Prince Albert was present.

HERR KUHE'S CONCERT.—The concert giver is a pianist of considerable pretensions, and his programme attracted a full audience to the Hanover Square Rooms, among whom was no less distinguished a personage than Mlle Jenny Lutzer. Herr Kuhe played two fantasias, one by Emile Prudent, the other by himself, the musical merits of which are about on a par. He has a rapid and distinct finger, and great power, plays octave and scale passages with great facility and neatness, and does not exaggerate by a double administration of what is called sentiment by pianists of the modern school. On the whole his playing, if not of the most astonishing, is highly agreeable and effective. Herr Kuhe also performed two duets; one with Herr Joseph Helmesberger, for piano and violin, (composed by Wolf and Vieuxtemps in conjunction), the other with Mad. Dulcken for two pianos, both of which were deservedly well received. The latter is a brilliant and clever arrangement of airs from Donizetti's "La Fille du Regiment," and is highly creditable to Herr Kuhe's reputation as a composer for the piano of the modern school. Besides his own performances, Herr Kuhe had provided a good substantial selection of vocalities and instrumentalities for his patrons. Among the most notable things were the duet of the young violinists, Joseph and George Helmesberger, of which we have elsewhere spoken; a violoncello solo, capably executed by Mr. Hausmann; a fantasia on the flute by Sig. Cesare Ciardi, first flute to the grand Duke of Tuscany, one of the most extraordinary displays of finished and elaborate execution we ever listened to, and a guitar solo by M. Leonard Schulz, in which the artist evinced a command over the instrument, and brought out a tone and effect from its poor resources that except to those who have heard this accomplished performer would appear incredible. The vocal music provided by Herr Kuhe was sustained by the talents of Misses Dolby, Pyne, and L. Pyne, (Sir George Smart's clever pupils, who have just returned from a successful professional trip to Paris), Mad. Knispel, Mad. Jenny Lutzer, Signors Marras and Galli, Herr Hoelzel, and Mr. Gregg (a promising pupil of Herr Staudigl). The gems were Miss Dolby's "Quando Almiro," the Misses Pyne's bolero from the sparkling "Diamans de la Couronne," of Auber; an air from Mozart's "Figaro," by Mad. Knispel; another from Donizetti's "Linda" by Mad. Jenny Lutzer; a graceful cavatina from the "Diamans de la Couronne," by Miss L. Pyne; an air "Bella adorata," (Mordcadante) by Sig. Marras; two pretty German lieder by Herr Hoelzel; and Linley's simple ballad "Constance," by Miss Dolby. Altogether the selection was exceedingly interesting, and honorable to the taste and judgment of the clever concert-giver, Herr Kuhe.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF FEMALE MUSICIANS gave a grand concert for the benefit of the Institution on Friday evening, May 7, at the Hanover Square Rooms. Misses Bassano, Birch, Cubitt, Dolby, Duval, Lincoln, Sabilla Novello, Poole, Rainforth, Steele, Mrs. W. H. Seguin, and Mad. Jenny Lutzer, Messrs. Braham Lockey, Manvers, Machin, and W. H. Seguin. Mrs. Anderson, Mr. Benedict, Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett, and Herr Joseph, and George Helmesberger were the instrumental performers. The band played the overture to "Oberon." Bach's trio, for three pianofortes, was played splendidly by Mrs. Anderson, Mr. Benedict and Mr. Sterndale Bennett. The rooms were very full. Mr. Benedict and Mr. Sterndale Bennett conducted. The Society of Female Musicians is deserving of the support of musicians, and those who have the interest of music at heart. The object of this Institution is for the benefit of such of its distressed members, as by relationship or other ties, have no claim on the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians. It has been established eight years, but its design is not yet widely-enough known to have gained that public patronage which it merits, and no doubt will ultimately obtain.

MR. J. COHAN's pianoforte recital took place on Wednesday evening at the Hanover Square Rooms. Why it was called pianoforte recital we are at a loss to guess, seeing that Miss Birch sang, and Miss Dolby also; and Mr. Hart likewise; and Miss Ransford too; and Mr. John Parry moreover; and in addition Mr. Blagrove played a solo on the violin, and also performed in a sonata of Beethoven's. We think, begging Mr. J. Cohan's pardon, the name was a misnomer. The concert was a capital one. Miss Birch and Miss Dolby opened the ball with a duet, and Mr. Cohan followed with a brilliant fantasia of his own composing, an air from Frey-schutz; and then Miss Birch gave an aria, and Mr. Cohan performed another fantasia "See the conquering hero comes," where-upon Miss Birch saying "Tell me, my heart," (Bishop's) and was vehemently encored; and Mr. Cohan played a tremendous martial fantasia, entitled "The Greek Revolution," which was uproariously applauded; and Albert Smith's song of "Young England" was sung by John Parry, and, of course, encored, and so ended the first part of the piano-forte recital. Part second was in the same spirit, therefore we need not enumerate. The best thing in the second part was Beethoven's sonata for violin and piano, excellently played by Blagrove and Cohan. But it is in his own works that the very peculiar genius of this pianist is shown. Mr. Cohan has an immense finger, and his execution is extraordinary. He was applauded tremendously in every piece, and excited a species of furor among the audience. We are glad to see the rooms crowded to excess, for Mr. J. Cohan is in every way worthy of the support of his admirers.

"HERR AND FRAULEIN HELENE STÖPEL's grand morning concert was held on Thursday, under the immediate patronage of the Duchesses of Sutherland, and the Marchioness of Londonderry. Mlle. Helen Stöpel is pianist to her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland. The programme of the concert was excellent; the instrumental being happily varied with the vocal performances. Among the former may be reckoned M. Stevenier's on the violin, Sig. Piatti on the violoncello, Madlle. Stöpel on the piano, and M. Herr Stöpel on the xilocordeon. In addition to these, twenty pianists, mostly pupils of Herr Stöpel, performed several morceaux on ten pianos, with great effect. Mlle. Stöpel's principal performance was the Lucrezia Borgia fantasia of Leopold De Meyer, which she gave in such a manner as to elicit the most enthusiastic applause from the whole house. This charming young artist made a most favourable impression by the way she played this, one of Meyer's most difficult pieces. Mdlle. Stöpel has a very brilliant finger, reminding us sometimes of Madame Pleyel. We have been rarely so much pleased with a fair pianist as we were on Thursday evening with Mdlle. Helene Stöpel. Herr Stöpel's method of teaching the piano, judging from the effect produced by his pupils, is admirable. Among the vocal performances, by the way, there was one worthy of note, both on account of its novelty and its merit. This was a scena "Per basso l'esule," from an opera by Verdi, which was sung by Signor Montelli, an Italian barytone, new to our concert-rooms. Signor Montelli's voice is powerful, and of a very agreeable quality. He sings with taste and energy, and only requires a little more experience to make him a very pleasing and useful addition to our concert-rooms. He was somewhat nervous on this occasion; but time will cure this defect inevitable in a beginner.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—The attraction of the last meeting was Henri Vieuxtemps, the great and justly-celebrated violinist. His performance in the C quartet of Mozart, and the E flat (No. 10) of Beethoven, was transcendent. Finer specimens of quartet-playing were never listened to. Vieuxtemps outshone even himself upon this occasion, a feat not to be accomplished by any other violinist. His playing was colossal. Nothing grander, more impressive, or more perfect, could be desired by the most experienced and punctilious connoisseur. The quartet was admirably filled up, in both instances, by M. Deloffre, Mr. Hill, and Signor Piatti. The ensemble was irreproachable. The rest of the performance consisted of two solos. Vieuxtemps played a charming morceau de salon, of his own composition, in which he was accompanied on the piano-forte by Madame Vieuxtemps, with singular elegance and facility,—one instrument following the other so closely, that it was difficult to fancy that two performers were engaged. The other solo was a bolero, composed by Franchomme, and played to perfection by Signor Piatti, on the violoncello, accompanied by Mr. Vincent Wallace, on the piano, with musicianly skill. We can pardon Mr. Ella the anomaly of solos at classical quartet meetings, when the solos in question are such unexceptionable specimens of taste and skill as these. The room (Willis's) was crowded with rank and fashion.

Miss WHEATLEY's third soiree musicale took place at the Kensington Assembly Rooms on Wednesday evening. The vocalists were Miss Cubitt, Miss Ellen Lyon, Mr. W. H. Seguin, and Mr. Williams. Miss Cubitt was encored in Miss Camidge's ballad, "Did I not love thee," and in the Scotch ballad, "I dinna care to tell." Miss Ellen Lyon was also encored in Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark." Mr. Wells, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Clinton, played the flute accompaniment to this song excellently. Of Miss Wheatley's performance of Hummel's rondo for the piano-forte, with accompaniments, and, in conjunction with Mr. H. Wheatley, her interpretation of Herz and Lafont's duet for piano and violin, from "L'Enfant du regiment," we must speak in high terms. Miss Wheatley also played with effect a solo of Eliason's for the violin. Mr. H. Wheatley is a very able conductor.

Miss P. A. ROBINSON's first concert took place at Crossby Hall on Monday. The beneficiaire secured the support of the Misses Williams, Miss Cubitt, Miss Lanza, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Weiks, Mr. Turner, Mr. C. E. Stevens, Mr. Edney, and Mr. A. Sedgwick. Miss P. A. Robinson sung several songs, and met with considerable applause, and the concert went off with great spirit.

HERR WILLMERS.—This gentleman's private matinée musicale, on Monday, at Willis's rooms, was attended by a numerous and intelligent audience of amateurs, artists, and critics. Herr Willmers performed the following selection of pieces, with one exception all his own compositions:—

Fantasia Romantique.—"Un jour d'été en Norvège," M. WILLMERS, Willmers. Scherzo, Piano-forte.—"La Sirène," M. WILLMERS, Willmers. Sextour Final, Piano-forte.—"Lucia di Lammermoor," (Transcrit), M. WILLMERS, Willmers. Sonata Quasi Fantasia, Piano-forte, (Op. 27), M. WILLMERS, Beethoven. Chant du Nord, Piano-forte.—"Flieg' vogel flieg'!" M. WILLMERS, Willmers. Serenata Erotica, Piano-forte.—"Pour la main gauche," M. WILLMERS, Willmers. Etude de Concert, Piano-forte.—"La Pompa di festo," M. WILLMERS, Willmers.

All we premised in our last of the extraordinary mechanical excellence of Herr Willmers was justified by his performance. No living pianist has a more vigorous grasp of the instrument, a more powerful and sonorous tone, a more wonderful command of the most perplexing difficulties. We have not space to specialize his achievements on the present occasion, but we must single out as the most amazing effort of the morning, the "serenata erotica," in which the pianist accomplished, with his left hand alone, as much as could be reasonably expected of two ordinary players, with the full use of their double pair of hands! When will these marvels of digital force and suppleness reach their apex, and tumble down into common-place sensibility? Notwithstanding the continual astonishment to which we were subjected by the unheard-of difficulties compassed by the fingers of this trinity-of-pianists-in-one-person, we must own that we were more pleased with his execution of Beethoven's lovely sonata than with any thing else he effected. Allowing for the slight excess to which he carried the tempo rubato in the presto, Herr Willmers interpreted this sonata in a style that may truly be styled classical. The execution was faultless, and the expression quite in the true Beethoven feeling. We must leave Herr Willmers for the present, but trust to have another opportunity of treating more elaborately of the peculiarities of his singular talent.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. W. VINCENT WALLACE took a benefit at Drury Lane, on Monday evening. The entertainments embraced the performance of Maritana, followed by a Monster Concert, and concluded with a ballet divertissement. The two great features of the evening were the first appearance of a new English tenor, Mr. J. S. Reeves, and the pianoforte performance of Herr Jules Schulhoff. Mr. Reeves produced a great impression. His voice is powerful and full toned, and his singing is characterised by sweet expression and taste. He gave an aria of Verdi with great energy, and was tumultuously applauded. Herr Jules Schulhoff performed a composition of his own, and exhibited very extraordinary powers on the piano. In rapidity of fingering, brilliancy of execution, and delicacy of touch, he reminds us more of Leopold de Meyer than any pianist we have heard of late. His performance was rapturously applauded. Mr. Wallace conducted the opera, and Signor Schira accompanied all the vocal music. We were sorry not to see the house better attended. The name of Vincent Wallace is a tower of strength, and we expected to have seen more universal homage paid to the elegant composer of Maritana and Matilda.

M. GODEFROID.—We have already announced the arrival of this admirable harpist, who will remain with us during the season. M. Godefroid's last performance in Paris was at the Conservatoire, which rarely opens its classical portals to a harpist. M. Godefroid performed three pieces of his own composition, La Melancolie, La Rêve, and La Danse des Sylphes, two of which were encored with enthusiasm, an unusual occurrence at these classical concerts. This was a worthy climax to M. Godefroid's almost unprecedented Parisian successes.

MADAME CELESTE, has announced her benefit for Wednesday next at the Adelphi, on which occasion the Flowers of the Forest will be performed, with a new comedy, called Flying Colours; or, Crossing the Frontiers, in which Mr. Webster of the Haymarket, will appear. The fair Manageress is worthy of every support from the Public, and is entitled to a bumper-royal.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—At the Sixth Concert, on Monday evening, Spohr's Wiehe der Töne and Mozart's E flat, will be the symphonies. The overtures are to be Egmont and an overture in C, both by Beethoven. The concerto will be a violin one composed and played by Vieuxtemps. If the vocal music be as good the concert can hardly fail of pleasing.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. MUHLENFELDT'S Concert—the last paper on "Elijah," and other articles, unavoidably postponed till next week.

The large number of Manuscripts, Musical and Literary, that are sent to us for publication, lays us under the necessity of requesting that those who desire to favour "The Musical World" with their contributions will be careful to keep copies of whatever they may be pleased to offer us for consideration, as we cannot possibly undertake to return them, if they be rejected.

The lines for music, "I would I was a fairy," are politely declined.

We are unable to answer the question of our correspondent, T. P.

C. R. (Lymington)—The most likely place to meet with Sonatas of Handel (which, we regret to say, we never saw), is Coventry and Hollier's, Dean St., Soho. Of the glee we never heard, but there are large collections of old glees in the catalogues of D'Almaine & Co., Soho Sq.; and of Chappell, in Bond Street.

H. L. C. (Belfast)—We think the information required, will be found by our Correspondent in our Opera-articles. We shall have much pleasure in reviewing the flute-piece.

IGNORANCE—"If ignorance be bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." As we imagine, from the jocose style of his epistle, that "Ignorance" exults blissfully in the attribute that has suggested his self-applied sobriquet, we shall not run the risk of making him unhappy, by enlightening him on the points about which he questions us.

THE DISPATCH

During the Month of June next,

WILL BE PRESENTED WITH A FINELY ENGRAVED

PORTRAIT OF ELIZA COOK.

"The poems of Miss Cook are national property. There is hardly a homestead in the land where her name and her contributions to the DISPATCH are not familiar as household words. Apart from the powerful and brilliant talent with which the DISPATCH is conducted, this handsome and acceptable present to its fifty or sixty thousand readers, cannot fail to be appreciated."—Liverpool Chronicle, May 8, 1847.

The likeness of this Poetic Genius, by Trantschold, is most striking, and the Engraving is by ADLARD, in the first style of the art.

An Edition of the DISPATCH is published at Five o'clock every Saturday morning, for transmission by the First Trains and Morning Mails, so that persons residing in towns 250 miles from London may receive it the same evening.

This Edition contains the London Markets of the week, including those held on Friday; also the spirited Letters of PUBLICOLA, CAUSTIC, and CENSORIUS; and frequently original Poems by Miss ELIZA COOK.

Persons desirous of being supplied with the WEEKLY DISPATCH, may give their orders and pay their subscriptions to any News Agent; or to Mr. RICHARD WOOD, at the DISPATCH OFFICE, 139, FLEET-STREET, LONDON, who, by a remittance of 2s., or Postage Stamps to that amount, will supply the DISPATCH throughout June next.

M. JULLIEN'S

Annual Musical Presentation and Circulating Library combined.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to submit to the Musical Public of Great Britain and Ireland, an entirely NEW SYSTEM for supplying their Musical requirements.

It has long been a subject of just complaint in the Profession, as well as amongst Amateurs, that in order to become possessed of a moderate proportion of the Musical Novelties of the day, it is necessary to purchase, at a very considerable, and in many cases, at an inconvenient cost, a quantity of Music, which, if it do not prove utterly worthless, is very frequently found on trial, to be unsuited to, or unwished for by, the purchaser, who thus becomes burdened with a considerable expense, while the object he has been seeking remains unattained.

A Musical Circulating Library

would appear in a great measure to obviate these inconveniences; yet there are many who object, and naturally so, to pay a considerable sum annually for the mere loan of Music, not having the power to retain as their own property any one piece which they may wish to possess, without making further payments in addition to their annual subscription.

To meet both these difficulties, M. JULLIEN brings forward this New System, which, supported as it will be by the great resources of his extensive London establishment, as well as by his numerous Continental connections, will, he hopes, afford advantages and facilities to his subscribers, to which no other plan hitherto brought forward has ever laid claim.

M. JULLIEN has formed a complete Circulating Library, and intends every year to establish

in which every subscriber will become interested to the full amount of their Annual Subscription—that is to say, M. JULLIEN will present GRATIS to each subscriber Music to the FULL AMOUNT OF HIS OR HER Subscription to the Library—such Music to be chosen by the subscribers themselves, and to become their sole property—so that, in other words, any person purchasing Music to the amount of £3 3s. (the amount of the Annual Subscription) will be further entitled, during the whole year, to the loan of any Music he may choose to select from the entire library, and this, WITHOUT CHARGE, being also entitled to change such Music as often as he may please.

For Three Guineas, therefore, a subscriber will be supplied, ON LOAN, with any Music he may wish for, and at the end of the year will be PRESENTED with THREE GUINEAS' WORTH, to become his own exclusive property.

In order to facilitate the Subscribers' Selection, M. JULLIEN will furnish a list of the most fashionable and popular Pieces, with the prices attached. This list having been marked and sent into the library, the Subscriber will immediately receive the pieces chosen.

In bringing forward this system, (new to this country,) M. JULLIEN has the satisfaction to reflect that on the continent, where it has been some years in operation, it has had the effect of advancing the interest of the Musical Art in the highest degree.

M. JULLIEN's Library which is the most extensive to be found in England at the present time, possesses the COMPLETE known WORKS of the English, German, Italian, and French Authors, all of which will be at the disposal of the Subscribers.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

- 1.—The Subscription to be always paid at the time of subscribing and at the renewal of every subsequent term.
- 2.—Subscribers resident in London, to be entitled to Six Pieces of Music and one Score at a time; Country Subscribers to Twelve Pieces and Two Scores at a time.
- 3.—To each Subscriber will be presented gratis, at a time of subscribing a Portfolio, for the protection of the Library Music; and at no time, on any consideration, will Music be received, or sent back, unless enclosed in the Portfolio.
- 4.—Should any Music be retained beyond the time subscribed for, the Subscription will continue open, and must be paid for until such Music is returned.
- 5.—All expenses attending Carriage, Postage, &c., to be defrayed by the Subscribers.

JENNY LIND AND HER INFLUENCE.

OUR worthy progenitors may prate about Henry Betty and Miss O'Neil as they will, we have got something in our time to match them. Those bubbles swelled into the dimensions of a pumpkin before they burst—but this bubble is already as big as one of Mr. Green's balloons, and yet there is no sign of its melting into air. It gets bigger and bigger every day; but it looks so smooth and glitters with such diaphanous brightness in the sun that one has not the heart to throw a stone and smash it. In these, depressed and apathetic times it is pleasant to get hold of an excitement, come whence it may; and we shall not quarrel with the charming Jenny because she has in three weeks set the Thames on fire. Welcome then, thou most delightful epidemic, that hast poured into the ear of old London such precious distillations as have ravished it beyond a cure! Welcome, thou melodious plague, from whose infection none escapes—no, not even the doctors who walk the hospitals and presume to administer medicine to thy victims, for they are as intoxicated with thy honeyed poison as their patients. The doctors (critics) who first cried "Pshaw!" and prescribed brandy and salt, are now, sick in their turn, at a loss to invent a nostrum for themselves. Madder than their patients, they run about and rave. But no wonder—for Jenny Lind is irresistible! She has smiled upon the patricians, the people, and the press, and has vanquished them to a man. The Queen throws a bouquet at her; the barons and dames of rank flourish their silken scented kerchiefs, and weigh down the atmosphere with indefinite and countless smells; the people shout and roar; the press look on, with affected unconcern—as who should say, "Poor infatuated devils!"—and straightway hie them to their garrets, and emulate the mobbish drunkenness on paper. For one stroke of art they write down ten; for one burst of nature twenty; for one loud cheer fifty! And yet withal there is in the reality enough of truth to mock hyperbole. But no wonder—Jenny Lind is irresistible! See how "The Thunderer" nightly rocks himself on the waves of her sweet singing, and how next morning he flings incense before her altar, exulting in his odiferous employ. The lion will not devour the spotless virgin, and "The Thunderer" crouches before the Swedish maid. She looks at him, and his eyelids close; she pats him on the mane, and he slumbers; she caresses him, and he has dreams of elysium; she gently wakes him, and he carries her on his sinewy back to glory and to triumph! Oh, cunning maid, that Io-like, hast learned to sooth "The Thunderer!" But none escapes—even Punch himself, the downy-feathered, spear-tongued railer, whose glance is sharp steel, whose smile is bitter myrrh, has been discovered blubbing; he has shed a tear, and owns it in half a sonnet. Peruse his solemn verse:—

"Not oft I give a sentimental squeak,
Nor deal in homage; but thou hast,
Fair maid, drawn wooden tears down Punch's cheek,
And that is an achievement vast.
Thus, therefore, doth he bare his crown,
And throw him at thy footstool down,
Hoping that thou wilt smile at him this week."

Thus you see there is no outlet from her influence. Jenny Lind has put salt upon the public tail and has fairly caught the public. Here, we suspect, is her secret. She is the people's own. She looks at the mob, as the beauty at the beast, and moved by the tears that run silently down its rough ungainly cheeks, yearns towards it as towards an honest ugly friend. Jenny Lind has wedded the multitude, and from the union has sprung her universal popularity. The crowd regards her with the eye of a protector. The feeling is unanimous. Every man when he goes to hear Jenny Lind goes with a large stick, and the intention of knocking any one down who says she is not the greatest of singers, the greatest of actresses, the simplest and loveliest of maidens. A few miserable heretics, in whose bosoms scepticism sourly reigns, have dared to say, "But———" But no further could they get in their argument:—the faithful to whom it was addressed have turned away in scorn, and left the infidels to munch the bitter cud of their reflections. We know of a son, who was turned out of doors by his father, because he was rash enough to suggest that Jenny Lind's middle notes were not so good as those of her upper register. A husband beat his wife because she affirmed that in the encore of the final air in Sonnambula, Jenny Lind made the same ornaments and cadences twice over. "There was not one note the same," said the husband, who knew nothing about music. "Every note was alike both times," insisted the wife, who was an excellent amateur. "You are a fool, my dear," rejoined the husband. "You know nothing of the matter," retorted the wife. And so when they got home, the dispute recommenced over the supper-table, and the husband thrashed his wife. Oh! could the simple "Jenny" have known this or the other circumstance, how would her pretty eyes have opened, and her pretty lips have pouted with dismay! "And this,"—would she have said,—"and this is to be beautiful and great! There is discord in all things that transcend the level. Good begets evil; evil, good. It were better to be cloaked in mediocrity!"

It would appear that the French critics are jealous of our possession of the fair Jenny. In the Sidèle of last Saturday, the feuilletoniste, Eugene Guinot, a right worthy scribbler, pays himself and his brethren of the Gallic press the following compliment, to our disadvantage, which is the more beautiful from its being (as who will deny?) so thoroughly appropriate:—

"The Prussian singer (Jenny Lind) would willingly give up all the pecuniary advantages of her connection with Her Majesty's Theatre, for a genuine triumph at the Academie Royale (of Paris), for the applause of the Parisian journals, in which artists are spoken of according to their merit, and whose critics praise, without being paid. After the baptism of Parisian success, fortune would follow rapidly. . . . The English give money, not glory."

And the French give glory and not money—is not that it, Monsieur de Guinot? It is as well, however, that we have something to give which is sufficiently attractive to lure the Swedish nightingale to our shores. The French "glory," has been rejected by her with singular contempt. Meyerbeer himself has been unable to make her swallow it. The reason is that it cannot be placed in the funds, bearing interest; and the Swedish clergyman to whom Jenny Lind is said to be betrothed, would doubtless prefer the bank-notes, as more available for the purposes of domestic comfort.

And after all we are not so cold to Jenny; and after all it is not every foreign artist that can achieve a triumph on our stage. We have heard it even whispered that until London has given its verdict a singer's fame is incomplete. Of course this must be a mistake; but we put it to Monsieur de Guinot's candour to explain. We are very modest about these matters, and are ever anxious to be set right.

Our task is drawing to an end. To describe the numberless impressions received from this great work would take more of our time and space than we are able to afford. It would, nevertheless, be a grateful task, and were there not so many other things that absolutely command our attentive consideration at this eventful period of the musical season we would attempt it, fortified by conviction of the truth of all we should have to say, and mentally assured of the unsurpassable magnificence and beauty of this, the last of Mendelssohn's great efforts. But as matters stand we must hasten to conclude.

After the lovely chorus of comfort and encouragement to Elijah, of which we have spoken in terms of such unmeasured praise, the music assumes a graver and more solemn tone. The end of the prophet's labours is at hand; he has fulfilled his mission. Something more, however, yet remains for him to do. An angel tells him to arise and go to Horeb, the Mount of God, a journey of forty days and forty nights. Elijah, still complaining, declares that he has toiled in vain, and entreats the Lord to manifest his power by his presence. An angel answers him by an exhortation to patience and a promise that his heart's desire shall be fulfilled. A choir of angels sings the promise of redemption to those who shall endure to the end without repining. Elijah at length accomplishes his journey. Night falls around him, and his soul thirsts for the presence of God, as the parched earth for rain. An angel commands him to rise and go up to the mount and there he shall behold the glory of the Lord. Elijah covers his face and anticipates, with eager longing, the divine presence. God passes by and a mighty wind rends the mountain—but the Lord is not in the tempest. God passes by, and the sea is upheaved and an earthquake shakes the land—but the Lord is not in the earthquake. After the earthquake comes a fire—but the Lord is not in the fire. After the fire "a still small voice"—and in that still voice, onward comes the Lord." Above him are the seraphim who sing his praises.

Mendelssohn has comprised the whole of the above in another magnificent picture. First a contralto recitative, "Arise Elijah"—then a bass recitative, in which the prophet makes his complaints and his desires manifest—and then an air for contralto, "O rest in the Lord." If religion can be made lovelier than itself by musical expression, here is a triumphant example of its powers. The melody is purity itself—the accompaniments calm and devotional. One of the most exquisite points is the reprise of the subject in the original key, C major, from the transition into E minor which accompanies the second part of the air. Nothing can be more artlessly beautiful, while, at the same time, it is a fine stroke of art—one of those master-touches with which Mendelssohn so frequently raises an unassuming thought into a high ideal beauty. Who that has heard this delicious melody falling from the lips of the charming Miss Dolby, as soft water from a gentle eminence, and can forget it, must have a heart of lead. The chorus that follows, "He that shall endure to the end," is quite ecclesiastical in character. The theme is composed of long sustained notes, and is worked throughout with great profundity, without the introduction of any extraneous subject. A recitative for Elijah, "Night falleth round me," and another for the angel, "Arise, now get thee without," leads to a chorus in E minor, "Behold! God the Lord passed by." In descriptive magnificence this chorus is surpassed by nothing in the whole oratorio, and equalled by nothing, except the final chorus to the first part, "Thanks be to God." The high voices, sustained by the organ, give out a fine unison passage on the first words, "Behold! God the Lord passed by," and then, a theme of singular originality, developed by the double choir, with close imitations of every phrase, leads by a gradual crescendo into the description of the tempest, which afterwards by degrees subsides, and at last dies away into silence, when the chorus sings a characteristic phrase, in full harmony, on the words, "But the Lord was not in the tempest," of which the effect is quite thrilling. The second verse (for this chorus may be said to be in verses) is conducted on nearly the same plan:—the unison passage, the crescendo to the earthquake, and the decreasing to the same passage in full harmony on the words, "But the Lord was not in the earthquake." The third verse is more developed. The description of the fire is terrific, the trumpets and trombones beginning pianissimo and gradually swelling out into a fortissimo to the climax, produce an effect that is positively awful. (The trombones in the last scene of Don Giovanni may have suggested this). The phrase on the words, "And yet the Lord was not in the fire," is developed and elaborated with amazing grandeur. The fury of the orchestra and chorus, however, gradually subsides, and the words, "And after the fire there came a still small voice," are introduced by a transition into E major, developing a melody of heavenly beauty, which, with the graceful character of the accompaniments, the violins undulating, like soft breezes, is ravishing to the senses and brings comfort to the heart. We have heard nothing in music to surpass it. After this fine effort of genius, a recitative, "Above Him stood the Seraphim," leads to a very noble quartet and chorus, "Holy, holy, holy, is God the Lord," in which the corale form is assumed, and the organ and brass instruments are used with surprising grandeur. Thus ends the gorgeous musical picture we have attempted to describe, but of which no words can even faintly convey the infinite depth and beauty to those who have not been so lucky as to hear it.

We now approach the climax of this mighty work, which illustrates with tremendous power the sublime passage of scripture involved in the words, "And Elijah walked with God." Angels comfort Elijah with the assurance that his labours have not been vain, for there are yet seven thousand in Israel "who have not bowed down to Baal." Elijah is consoled and glorifies God in thanksgiving. The people praise Elijah for his prophecies and his denunciations, and the awful crisis arrives—Elijah is snatched away to Heaven in a chariot of fire drawn by horses of fire: "And Elijah was not, for God took him!" This is illustrated by a choral recitative in unison, "Go return upon thy way," which is highly grand and impressive—a recitative for Elijah, "I go on my way in the strength of the Lord," followed by an air, "For the mountains depart," a quiet melody in C major, 6-4 measure accompanied exclusively by the stringed instruments and the oboe, to which latter instrument is allotted an obligato part, which dialogues exquisitely with the voice. This scene is completed by another magnificent chorus, "Then did Elijah the prophet break forth like a fire," in two parts. The first part is distributed in full harmony for the choir, while the whole strength of the basses is employed in the development of a passage of great energy and character. The second part of the chorus occurs on the words, "And when the Lord would take him away to Heaven, lo! there came a fiery chariot with fiery horses, and he went by a whirlwind to Heaven." These words are expressed with graphic power, and the chorus exhibits from first to last the hand of a master and the invention of a genius.

The remainder of the oratorio is didactic, consisting of comments on the past, glorifications of the Almighty, consolation to the faithful, prophetic allusions, and exhortations to the people to continue in the right faith. The character of the music in this part assumes a staid loftiness and solemn majesty that quite reaches the sublime. The tenor air, "Then shall the righteous shine forth," in A flat, is of a devotional character, streaming with melody as exquisite as might be supposed to issue from the throat of an angel. The harmony and instrumentation are so lovely in their simplicity that it would be a despair for any extent of elaboration to approach their indefinable beauty. A recitative, "Behold, God hath sent Elijah the prophet," leads to a chorus, "But the Lord from the north has raised one," beginning in D minor, in a strain of gloomy grandeur, (the low tones of the oboes again making expression thrice expressive) and ending with a brilliant movement in D major, on the words, "Behold my servant and mine elect," which is quite Handelian in its sublimity. A finely developed passage on the words, "On him the Spirit of God shall rest," recalls a striking feature in the great chorus in E minor from the Israel of Handel; but Mendelssohn is so sparing of these reminiscences that when they do occur you welcome them as pleasant examples of his veneration for the great masters and his profound acquaintance with their works.* The unison passage, beginning on the words, "The spirit of wisdom and understanding," is a wonderful combination of character and sublimity, and the whole chorus is finely worked out. Next follows a quartet, in B flat, "O come every one that thirsteth," for the principal singers. This might almost be pronounced the offspring of the double quartet in the first part, "For he shall give his angels," since it has the same Morzartean flow of melody, the same smooth and unoffending (albeit cunningly artistic) arrangement of the vocal parts, and the same transparent smoothness of the orchestration, which—shines and glitters with perpetual but imperceptible motion. It is, however, a most lovely quartet, and has a touch of Heaven in it that will go home to the heart of every enthusiast for the beautiful. The last chorus "And then shall your light break forth," is in two parts:—the first, a majestic prelude, in D minor, the last on the words, "Lord, our Creator," a splendidly worked fugue, the only example of the severely scholastic style of writing which the entire oratorio presents. The development of this fugue is magnificent—the pedale preceding the end, in which the subject is treated with close imitation, preparing the mind admirably for the climax to one of the most transcendent efforts of the human mind.

We shall, in our next, conclude this brief analysis, with some general remarks, in which we shall endeavour to convey our impressions of Elijah as a work of art, our opinion of the position it must occupy among the masterpieces of all time, and of the influence it cannot fail to have in giving an entirely new tone to the loftiest branch of musical composition—the ecclesiastical, as developed in its highest phase—the oratorio.

MUSIC AT BERMUDA.

(From the Bermuda Royal Gazette, April, 1947.)

MR. OLIVER'S CONCERT.—Circumstances prevented our being present at Mr. Oliver's Concert at the Town Hall yesterday; we were much pleased to learn that there was a full attendance. We are promised a critical account of the exhibition for our next publication. We, however, can now say, as the opinion of the best authority in the room, that the performances gave the greatest satisfaction. That Miss Oliver's début was most successful, but that the piano did not do her justice, not being of sufficient power. The whole was performed with great precision and admirable taste. His Excellency the Governor and Mrs. Elliot kindly patronised the concert. The following is the programme of the music performed:—

Quartet in F, No. 82	-	-	Haydn.
Quartet in E Flat, No. 2	-	-	Mozart.
Quartet in B Flat, No. 6	-	-	Beethoven.
Quartet, "God save the Emperor"	-	-	Haydn.
Quartet in G, No. 2	-	-	Beethoven.

The quartets were for two violins, tenor and violoncello.

PART II.—CHAPTER XVI.

WHEN Mittler had come to talk over the matter with Edward, he found him alone, with his head leaning on his right hand, and his arm resting on the table. He seemed to suffer much. "Does your head-ache again trouble you?" asked Mittler. "It does," replied Edward, "and yet I cannot hate it, for it reminds me of Ottilia. Perhaps she herself is also suffering, I think, leaning upon her left arm, and is suffering more than I. And why should I not endure it as she does? These pains to me are wholesome—I may almost say, desirable: for with greater power does the image of her patience, accompanied by all her other qualities, float before my soul ; it is only in suffering that we perfectly feel all the great qualities, which are necessary to support it."

* In the heavenly chorus, "He watching over Israel," we omitted to note a similar reminiscence from the same chorus of Handel, which makes a striking feature in that of Mendelssohn.

When Mittler found his friend so resigned, he was not backward with his mission, which he stated, step by step, in historical order, saying how the thought had arisen with the ladies, and how it had gradually been matured to a plan. Edward scarcely uttered an objection. From the little which he said, might, it seemed, be collected, that he left every thing to the others : his present pain seemed to have rendered him indifferent to everything.

Scarcely, however, was he alone, than he arose, and walked up and down the room. He felt his pain no longer ; he was occupied quite out of himself. Even during Mittler's narrative, the imagination of the lover had been warily excited. He saw Ottilia, but as good as alone, on a well-known path, in a familiar inn, the rooms of which he had often paced. He thought, he considered, or rather, he did not think and consider ; he only wished—willed. He must see her—speak to her. Why ? Wherefore ? What could come of it ? Of this there would be no question. He did not resist—he must.

The valet was taken into his confidence, and at once learned the day and night when Ottilia was to set off. The morning dawned ; Edward did not delay to go unaccompanied, on horseback, to the place where Ottilia was to pass the night. He reached it too early ; the astonished hostess received him with joy ; she was indebted to him for much of her domestic happiness. He had obtained a mark of honour for her son, who had shewn himself a brave soldier, by zealously representing to the general the man's act, at which he alone had been present, and thus overcoming the obstacles set up by some ill-wishers. She did not know how to do enough to please him. As quickly as possible, she put to rights her best room, which was, indeed, her wardrobe and store-room at the same time ; but he announced to her the arrival of a lady who was to take possession of this apartment, and had a back room, which opened upon the passage, scantily got ready for himself. To the hostess the affair seemed mysterious, and she was pleased to oblige her patron, who appeared very interested and active in this matter. And he—with what feelings did he pass the long time before evening ! He looked round the room in which he was to see her ; with all its homely singularity, it appeared to him a heavenly abode. What plans did he not devise ! Should he surprise Ottilia, or should he prepare her. The latter opinion at last prevailed ; he sat down and wrote. She was to receive the following epistle.

EDWARD TO OTTILIA.

"Whilst thou readest this letter, my best beloved, I am near thee. Thou must not be alarmed—must not terrify thyself ; thou hast nothing to fear from me. I will not intrude upon thee. Thou shalt not see me till thou thyself permittest it.

"First consider thine own situation and mine. How much do I thank thee, that thou intendest to take no decisive step ; but still this one is important enough : do not take it. Here, on a sort of cross-road, consider once more. Canst thou be mine ? wilt thou be mine ? Oh ! thou wilt confer on all of us a great blessing—on me an inestimable one.

"Let me see thee again—see thee again with joy. Let me ask thee the beautiful question with my lips, and do thou answer it with thy lovely self. Come to my bosom, Ottilia, here, where thou hast often reposed, and to which thou ever belongest."

Whilst he was writing, he was seized with the feeling that that which he most desired was approaching, and would soon be in his presence. "At that door she will enter—this letter she will read—she, for whose appearance I have so often longed, will actually stand before me as formerly. Will she still be the same ? Has her form—have her feelings changed ?" He still held the pen in his hand, he wished to write as he thought, but the carriage rattled into the court-yard. With rapid pen he added the words, "I hear thee coming. For a moment, fare thee well."

He folded the letter, and directed it ; there was no time to seal it. He sprang into the room, by which he could afterwards reach the passage, and at the instant it struck him that he had left his watch and seals upon the table. She ought not to see them first. He darted back, and succeeded in taking them away. From the ante-room he already heard the hostess, who approached the apartment to shew it to her guest. He hastened towards the room-door, but it was closed. On hurrying in, he had shaken down the key, which lay inside ; the lock had snapped, and he was held fast. He pressed violently against the door, but it did not yield. Oh, how did he wish to slip like a spirit through the crevices ! In vain. He concealed his face against the door-post. Ottilia entered,—the hostess, as she observed him, withdrew. Even from Ottilia he could not remain concealed for a moment. He turned towards her, and thus once more were the lovers face to face in the most singular manner. She looked at him calmly and seriously, without advancing or retiring ; and when he made a movement to approach her, she went some steps back, as far as the table. He also again receded. "Ottilia," he cried, "let me break this fearful silence ! Are we only shadows that stand facing each other ? But, above all, hear me. It is a chance that thou now findest me here. By thee lies a letter, which should have prepared thee. Read it, I entreat thee,—read it, and then resolve as thou canst."

She looked down upon the letter, and after some hesitation, took it up, opened it, and read it. Without any alteration of manner, she read it through, put it softly down, and then pressed together the palms of her hands, which she had lifted up, brought them towards her heart, while she bent slightly forward,* and looked on the urgent, importunate lover with such a glance, that he felt compelled to desist from everything that he could wish or desire. This movement rent his very heart. He could not support the sight, the attitude of Ottilia. It seemed completely as though she would fall on her knees, if he persisted. He rushed out at the door in despair, and sent the hostess to the lovely girl.

He walked up and down in the anteroom ; night had set in, and all was quiet in the chamber. At last the hostess came out, bringing with her the key. The good woman was afflicted—overpowered—she did not know what to do. At last, as she was going she offered the key to Edward, who refused it. She left the light, and withdrew.

Edward, in a deep torpor, threw himself on the threshold of Ottilia's door, which he watered with his tears. Never, perhaps, did a pair of lovers, so near each other, pass a night in greater wretchedness.

Day broke ; the coachman drove up ; the hostess opened the door, and entered the chamber. She found Ottilia sleeping, but not undressed ; she went back and beckoned to Edward with a sympathising smile. Both approached the sleeping one ; but this sight also Edward was unable to support. The hostess did not venture to awaken the reposing girl, but seated herself opposite. At last, Ottilia opened her beautiful eyes, and stood upright. She refuses breakfast, and now Edward appears before her. He earnestly entreats her to speak only one word,—to declare her will ; he swears that her will is his own—but she is silent. Again he asks her lovingly and urgently, whether she will be his ? How charmingly, with downcast eyes, does she motion her head to a soft "No !" He asks whether she will go to the school ? She signifies the negative with indifference. But when he asks her whether he may take her back to Charlotte ? she answers in the affirmative with an inclination of the head, expressive of consolation. He hastens to the window to give orders to the coachman, but Ottilia, from behind him, has dashed like lightning out of the room, down the stairs, and into the carriage. The coachman takes the way back towards the castle ; Edmund, at some distance follows on horseback.

PART II.—CHAPTER XVII.

How astonished was Charlotte when she saw Ottilia coming first, and Edmund springing immediately after her into the court-yard of the castle. She hastened to the door. Ottilia alights, and approaches with Edward. With fervour and force she takes the hands of the married pair, presses them together, and hurries to her room. Edward throws his arms round Charlotte's neck, and is dissolved in tears. He cannot explain himself ; he begs her to have patience with him—to assist—to help Ottilia. Charlotte hastens to Ottilia's room, and shudders as she enters it. It was completely cleared out, and only the bare walls remained. It appeared as spacious as it was melancholy. Everything had been taken away, except the chest, which, as no one had resolved where to put it, had been left in the room. Ottilia lay upon the ground, with her head and arms extended over the chest. Charlotte busied herself about her, asks what has happened, and obtains no answer.

She leaves the servant, who brings restoratives, with Ottilia, and hastens to Edward. She finds him in the drawing-room, but he also gives her no information. He throws himself at her feet, bathes her hand in tears, flies to his room, and as she is about to follow him, she is met by the valet, who enlightens her to the best of his power. The rest she imagines, and then, with resolution, thinks what is required for the immediate moment. Ottilia's room is put to rights again as speedily as possible. Edward has found all his things, even to the last sheet of paper, just as he left them.

The three seem once more to be reconciled to each other, but Ottilia continues to be silent, and Edward can do nothing but entreat his wife to have patience, though he seems without it himself. Charlotte sends messengers to Mittler and to the Major. The former was not to be found—the latter arrives. To him Edward pours forth his heart; to him he confides the smallest circumstance; and thus Charlotte learns what has happened,—what has so strangely changed the position, and excited the feelings of the parties.

She talks most affectionately to her husband. She can make no other request, except that the girl may not be disturbed at present. Edward feels the worth, the love, the reason of his wife, but he is solely governed by his inclination. Charlotte gives him hopes; promises to consent to a separation. He does not believe her; he is so heart-sick, that hope and belief leave him by turns; he urges Charlotte to promise her hand to the Major; a sort of mad gloom has taken possession of him. Charlotte, to appease him, to entertain him, does what he requires. She promises her hand to the Major, in the event of Ottilia consenting to an union with Edward, but, under the express condition, that for the present time, the two men shall take a journey together. The Major has a foreign mission for his Court, and Edward promises to accompany him. Preparations are made, and new calmness is produced, for, at least, something is going on.

In the meanwhile, it can be observed that Ottilia rarely takes anything to eat or drink, while she constantly maintains her silence. If she is spoken to she seems pained, and therefore the attempt is abandoned. For we have not generally the weakness of wishing to torment persons, even for their own good. Charlotte thought over every means, till at last she hit upon the notion of letting the assistant come from the school. He had much influence over Ottilia, and had expressed himself very kindly on the subject of her unexpected non-appearance; but he had received no answer.

Not to surprise Ottilia, they mention this plan in her presence. She seems not to consent; she reflects; at last, a resolution seems to be matured in her; she hastens to her room, and, before the evening, sent the following address to the assembled party:—

"OTTLIA TO THE FRIENDS.

"Why, my dear friends, should I expressly say, what of itself is obvious? I have stepped out of my path, and I am not to return into it. A hostile demon, which has gained power over me, seems to hinder me from without, even if I had returned to unity within myself.

"Quite firm was my resolution to renounce Edward, and withdraw myself from him. I hoped not to meet him again. It has proved otherwise; he stood before me, even against his own will. My promise not to enter into conversation with him, I have perhaps taken and interpreted too literally. According to the feeling and conscience of the moment, I was silent. I was dumb before my friend, and now I have nothing more to say. By a strict vow, which perhaps is painful to those who make it deliberately, I have bound myself, being accidentally urged by my feelings. Let me adhere to it as long as my heart commands me. Call in no middle person. Do not press me to speak, or to take more nourishment than I strictly require. By indulgence and patience, help me through this time. I am young, and youth revives unexpectedly. Suffer me in your presence, cheer me with your love, instruct me with your conversation, but leave my inmost feelings to myself."

The long-prepared journey of the men did not take place, on account of the delay in the Major's foreign business. And how desirable was this for Edward! Being excited anew by Ottilia's letter, being again encouraged and justified in resolute perseverance by her hope-inspiring words, he declared at once that he would not quit the place. "How foolish it would be," he exclaimed, "deliberately and prematurely to cast away that which is most necessary and indispensable, that which perhaps might be retained, even if the loss of it were threatened. And for what? Only that a person may seem to be able to will and choose. Thus have I, overcome by this silly conceit, often torn myself away from my friends hours, nay, days, too early, in order not to be decisively forced by the last inevitable term. But this time I will remain. Why should I remove myself? Is she not already removed from me? I have no notion of clasping her hand—of pressing her to my heart; I dare not even think of it; it inspires me with horror. She has not taken herself away from me, but has elevated herself above me."

And so he remained—as he wished—as he was obliged. But nothing could equal the pleasure he felt, when he found himself in her company. And the same feeling remained with her, and she could not withdraw herself from this happy necessity. Now, as before, they exercised one upon another an indescribable, almost magical power of attraction. They lived under the same roof, and even without exactly thinking of each other, busied with other matters, and drawn in different directions of society, they mutually approximated. If they found themselves in one room, it was not long before they were standing or sitting close together. Only the nearest proximity could satisfy them, and that completely—proximity was enough. There was no necessity for a look, a word, a gesture, a touch,—but the mere being together sufficed. Then they were not two persons, but only one single person, in unconscious perfect felicity, contented with himself and the world. Nay, if one of the two had been kept fast at one end of the building, the other, of his own accord, without design, would gradually have moved in that direction. Life was to them a riddle, the solution of which they only found with each other.

Ottilia was perfectly cheerful and composed, so that one might be perfectly easy on her account. She withdrew but little from the company, though she gained the point of taking her meals alone. No one but Nanny waited upon her.

What ordinarily happens to every man, is repeated oftener than is believed, because his nature immediately determines it. Character, individuality, inclination, direction, locality, surrounding objects, and habits, form together a whole, in which every man floats as in an element,—an atmosphere, in which alone he feels comfortable and at his ease. And thus, after many years, we are astonished to find men, about whose changeableness so many complaints are made, still unchanged and unchangeable, in spite of infinite incitements both within and without.

Thus also in the daily intercourse of our friends did nearly every thing again move in the old track. Still did Ottilia, by many a kind action, express her obliging disposition; and thus was it with every one, according to his peculiarity. In this manner, the domestic circle appeared as a phantom of its former life, and the fancy that all was still as it used to be, was excusable.

The autumn days, like the spring days in length, called the party at the same hour from the open air into the house. The adornments of fruit and flowers, which are peculiar to this time, occasioned the belief that this was the autumn of that first spring—the intervening time had fallen into oblivion. For now flowers were blooming of the kind that had been sown on those first days; now fruits ripened on the trees, which had then been seen in blossom.

The Major came and went at intervals; Mittler, too, was more often to be seen. The evening sittings were generally regular. Edward usually read; and with more animation, more feeling, better, nay, more cheerfully, if you will, than ever. It was as if he wished both by joyousness and feeling to give new life to the torpor of Ottilia—to dissolve her silence. As before, he sat so that she could look into his book, nay, he was uneasy, distracted, if she did not look into it, if he was not certain that she followed his words with her eyes.

Every unpleasant, unhappy feeling of the intervening time was extinguished. No one grudged anything to another; every kind of bitterness had vanished. The Major accompanied on the violin Charlotte's playing on the piano, while Edward's flute, again, as before, accorded with Ottillia's treatment of the keyed instrument. Thus did Edward's birthday approach, which they had failed to solemnize in the preceding year. On this occasion it was to be celebrated, without festivity, by quiet friendly enjoyment. Thus, half tacitly, half expressly, had all come again to an understanding. But the nearer this epoch approached, the more was increased the solemnity in Ottillia's nature, which had hitherto been more felt than observed. She seemed often to review the flowers in the garden; she had signified to the gardener that he was to spare the summer-plants of all kinds, and particularly insisted on the chinas-ters, which bloomed this year in unusual abundance.

SONNET.

No. XXXVI.

If there be any mourning for the soul,
Let that of blackest hue round mine be twin'd,
And let it so enwrap both heart and mind,
That I may stand apart from the great whole.
Let ev'ry hour and minute o'er me roll,
Leaving no trace of joy or grief behind;
Let me, within mine own dark sphere confin'd,
Rest undisturb'd—free from the world's control.
Rest, do I call it?—Oh! can that be rest,
When its own core the soul unceasing gnaws,
By mem'ry's lamp, as a sepulchral light?—
Aye, be it so, till, by its pain oppress'd,
My soul its narrow confines closer draws,
And then forgets itself in endless night.—N. D.

MADemoiselle DENAIN.

Our excellent contributor, J. de C., who supplies us with notices of the French plays, has frequently bestowed warm encomiums on the talent of this charming actress, who, now that she is on the point of leaving us, to return to her duties at the Comedie Francaise, demands a word or two of special notice. Mdlle. Denain belongs to that class of dramatic art which perhaps is the most difficult to sustain with credit—genteel comedy. Nature has gifted her with a face and figure that singularly fit her for the line she has chosen. Her features are delicate though well marked, and full of a certain quiet expression which enables her to indicate by a look or a word more than the most energetic gestures could possibly convey. She is exceedingly handsome; and when she smiles, her whole countenance beams with an intelligence that is almost seraphic. Her figure is slight but well proportioned. Her deportment is lady-like and dignified. Jules Janin, the celebrated dramatic critic, in a letter addressed to us privately, pronounces her the worthy successor of Mdlle. Mars, whose great parts she is destined to preserve upon the stage. Since her arrival here, Mdlle. Denain has had few parts to play which are precisely in her peculiar walk, the advent of the popular and admirable comedian, Regnier, having necessitated the representation of a number of petite comedies in which he is so inimitable. But Mdlle. Denain, with the ease that only belongs to perfect art, has made herself quite at home in these pieces, and we doubt whether the excellent Regnier was ever supported with more decided efficiency. Nevertheless, Mdlle. Denain found occasion, at her benefit on Wednesday, to introduce to the public a three-act drama, in which she sustains a role that may be regarded as one of her triumphs. The drama is La Marquise de Senneterre, by MM. Melesville and Ch. Duverger, in which Mdlle. Denain personates the character of Henriette, the heroine. Her acting in this part is one of the most finished and elegant histrionic efforts we have witnessed at the French plays. In the first scenes, where, as the simple confiding country-wife, she comes to the celebrated courtesan, Marion Delorme, to consult her as to the best means of reestablishing the tottering affections of her truant husband, her voice, manner, and gestures are consummately natural. Nothing can be more thoroughly delicious than the naiveté with which she puts the question to Marion, and the childish astonishment with which she listens to her expositions of the world's vanity and heartlessness. You behold her gradually imbibing the lessons of the arch-coquette, who tells her that there is no such thing as heart in the world; that a husband's neglect must be answered by a wife's disdain; that les femmes s'embrassent et s'enlèvent leurs amans; and a hundred such moral axioms. When at last, an accomplished scholar, she practises the lessons of her instructress, and, as the brilliant and pleasure-courting woman of the world, she outshines the notorious Marion herself, beats her on her own territory, and robs her of both her lovers, her acting was worthy of a Jordan, a Duncan, or a Plessy. Her bye play is admirable, full of point, and sustained with undiminished brilliancy. The dashing, fascinating, spiritual, and heartless creature of fashion is pourtrayed to the life. With eyes flashing intelligence, voice thrilling with animation, and frame throbbing with the mere delight of being—of living—she walks across the scene like one of those joyous queens of comedy, who, of yore, delighted our fathers in the witty masterpieces of Congreve. Every word had its point; every gesture, its signification. Who could wonder that she turned the heads of all the courtiers? Who could wonder that she vanquished the egotism of Cinq Mars himself, the very emperor of coxcombs? Who could wonder that she brought her faithless husband to her feet, and made him forget Marion Delorme, and everything else in the world, except the wife whom he had neglected and misunderstood? But this was not all. The pathos of those moments, when alone, trembling at the precipice on which she stood; doubtful of the success of her assumed character; doating on her husband, while affecting to disdain him; irritably jealous of every woman that spoke to him; were as full of pathos and womanly tenderness, as the other situations were dazzling and impressive. In short, we have seldom been more delighted by a comediennes of the French school, than by Mdlle. Denain, in Henriette Marquise de Senneterre.

In taking leave of Mdlle. Denain, whose absence will be regretted by all lovers of legitimate comedy, it is our duty and our pleasure to thank Mr. Mitchell, the indefatigable lessee of the St. James's Theatre, for having introduced us to so charming a specimen of the school of our near neighbours, pleasant friends, and ancient enemies, the French. Let us hope that next season Mdlle. Denain's visit will be longer, and that we shall have more frequent occasion to criticise her in her best parts. On Tuesday, unhappily, she quits the white shores of Albion for her native France. The director of the Comedie Francaise will not trust her to us any longer—jealous, no doubt, of our possessing one of the brightest stars of his great company.

Meanwhile, we pledge a cup to her health, prosperity, and speedy return to England. Having once seen her, the habitués of Mr. Mitchell's elegant theatre will look for Mdlle. Denain as regularly and as anxiously as for the month of May, when the still modest sun loves most to shine upon the lovely face of woman. Come back, then, quiet, beautiful Denain! The arms of merry England will remain outstretched, to welcome you next spring.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

MAY 25. 1847.—Madame Anna Bishop is still creating the greatest sensation here. She is such an universal favourite that it will be hard for any prima donna to please after her in this "land of song." By her extraordinary talent, Madame Bishop has kept our theatre open at a period when public and theatrical affairs wore a most gloomy aspect. She sang four times last week at the spacious Music Hall, just erected by Mr. Drewett. No less than two thousand people congregated in one evening to listen to the warbling of the English Nightingale, who is the sole attraction of the performances, which are simply varied by some songs by Mr. P. Corri, and an occasional pianoforte fantasia by the talented accompanist, Mr. Willy. This week Anna Bishop sings three times more at the Hall. She is engaged also for a Grand Concert at the Rotunda, which takes place, Thursday, the 27th instant. On the 28th she performs at our theatre for a benefit, and Saturday, 29th, she starts for Cork and Limerick. She will then, probably, return, for a few days, to Dublin, in the middle of June. Several concert directors and managers are already on the qui vive to engage her before she returns to London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Two events of importance have occurred since our last:—the rentrée of Carlotta Grisi, and the appearance of Jenny Lind in another of her great parts—that of Maria in Donizetti's La Figlia del Regimento.

On Saturday the performances began with Lucia di Lammermoor, with the same cast as usual. En passant, we may say that Castellan, in Lucia, sang extremely well and acted with grace and sensibility, and that Fraschini, in Edgardo, made a greater impression on the audience than hitherto, confirming us in the notion we have already advanced, that a chronic lethargy of temperament is the only barrier to the young tenor's exertions. This, except when broken down by rare moments of enthusiasm, deprives him of the command of one half of his natural resources. Fraschini, it is fair to presume, lacks energy of character. In no other way can we account for the cramp—so to express it—that sometimes robs his powers of development, and encloses him, as it were, in an iron cage of mediocrity, in which his artistic talent can neither stand erect, nor lie horizontally, nor sit composedly, nor run at leisure—a sort of spiritualization of the state of Cardinal Balue, who, in the time of Louis XI. of France, invented a cage, with the conditions above specified, as a new method of torment, and was confined in it himself by the crafty, cruel, superstitious, and bigoted monarch, for the space of twelve years. Fraschini is Cardinal Balue—his lethargy the iron cage of his own fashioning. Who is the Louis XI. that puts him into it we have not decided, as time presses, space pushes, and we are not at leisure to complete the simile. Suffice it that Fraschini occasionally gets out of the cage—as on Saturday night—and is then a wholly different man from his ordinary self. Why does he not summon up strength to emancipate himself in perpetuity? Where there is a will there is surely a way.

But the great solemnity (as the French critics term it,) of this Saturday evening was the rentrée of CARLOTTA GRISI in her famous part of Esmeralda, which, through her absence from Her Majesty's Theatre, during the whole of last season, has been a dead letter to the public since 1845. The charming danseuse was never more charming. The hearty burst of welcome that greeted her from all parts of the house, as she came tripping on the stage, light as a feather, seemed at first to astonish her. Did Carlotta think that the habitués of Her Majesty's Theatre had forgotten her? Did she imagine them so fickle—so ungrateful? That graceful form that bends and undulates, like tender trees beneath the kisses of the southern wind; those twinkling feet that radiate in imperceptible evolutions; that gentle spirit which plays upon them both, as the wind upon the harp of Æolus, making them discourse a music that ravishes the eye as the melody of Mozart enchants the ear; that sloping neck, fair as the swan's, soft as the dove's; those long white arms outstretched, which seem like paths that lead to happiness; those beamy-bending eyes to which the soul's desires rush as impetuously as comets to the sun:—were they to be forgotten in twelve fleeting months? Not by those, at least, in whose bosoms reign the sympathies that yearn for all the lovely truths which poesy can tell! And they were not forgotten. The cheers that acknowledged the presence of Carlotta, in whose being they are cumulated, as the infinitesimal parts that make one gracious whole, proved that the audience of Saturday night was of one mind—and that was all for her, the peerless Esmeralda. These were redoubled, over and over again, as she threaded the coquettish mazes of the Truandaise, followed by little wing-footed Perrot, whose vain attempts to catch her were as the heart's pursuit of an unbodied joy—a joy that once dwelt somewhere but is now homeless, and fits about, happy and content, as a butterfly that has emerged from the chrysalis, its "antenatal tomb." The Truandaise was re-demanded with acclamations, and repeated with new graces, new combinations of arch-coquetry and innocent simplicity, at once the most refined and the most natural. In the same scene Carlotta's playful manner and light frolicsome step, when she dances with childish exultation at the possession of the scarf of Phœbus, was received with loud expressions of delight. The scene with Gringoire, in the second tableau (Esmeralda's home!) where the innocent Bohemian teaches the egotistical poet the secrets of that art by which she gains her living, was another enchanting display of natural grace and perfect art. The applause was incessant, never flagging from the beginning to the end of the scene. The third tableau (the palace of Fleur de Lys) offers the only occasion for Carlotta to display those marvels of Terpsichorean agility for which some of her competitors, despairing to equal her in those unaffected beauties that spring like wild-flowers from her fertile being, have won deserved celebrity. But here, once more, Carlotta proved herself the accomplished mistress of her art. The ease with which she achieved the complex elaborations of this elegant step—the Pas de la Esmeralda—made them seem like the simplest matters possible. Carlotta performs incredible difficulties with such an utter absence of effort, that any one looking on would fancy herself capable of doing the like, until—as in the classic instance of Phæton, who rashly thought to guide the horses of Apollo, in the absence of their driver—the failure would follow in the track of the attempt, as swiftly as the rolling thunder the unseen steps of the lightning, and the daring intruder tumble from the chariot of presumption into the empty space of incompetency. In execution Carlotta combines the Ellslerian rapidity of step with the Taglionian grace of gesture. Nothing is too difficult for her, and yet she never seems to be wrestling with a difficulty. The Pas de la Esmeralda was followed by acclamations of applause. It was a triumph of legitimate art worthy of ranking with the loftiest achievements of choregraphy.

But it is not only as a dancer that Carlotta shines. As an actress (or mimist, to speak in dialect-Terpsichorean) she equally excels. Her Esmeralda is a great dramatic effort. The lovely creation of the poet Hugo is there before you, and every attribute with which he has endowed it. No accompaniment of music or of poetry could render it more eloquently true. Carlotta looks the Esmeralda to perfection. Her small and well-formed head; her fine and quaintly-expressive features, that glow with the baby-look of unconscious innocence; her exquisitely-proportioned form, and the grace and infinite meaning of her every movement and gesture, are precisely what Victor Hugo has portrayed in his magnificent romance. She is the child of nature, that walks among guilty men and guilty things without being defiled; the inborn goodness of her heart, the native gracefulness of her mind, making her incapable of comprehending, much less of sympathising with aught but what is beautiful and true. Her's is the aspiring soul that flies to unknown Heaven; her's is the gushing-heart that melts at the appeal of sorrow. A thing to dream of when the soft-white hands of happiness are pressed upon your eyes and you are lost in the heaven of calm and reposeful slumber; a green spot to remember in your voyage through life's long and dreary desert; an ideal creature, whereof the image will remain with you until you receive your last summons, preserving for ever in some silent corner of the memory—

"The tender grace of a day that is dead."

Such is the Esmeralda of romance, and such is Carlotta Grisi, the Esmeralda of the ballet. Look at her, as she moves about the scene, mingling ever and anon among the motley throng, "as a swan trooping with crows;" or in the happy solitude of her own bright presence, sitting here and there like a bit of sunshine that will keep getting in your eyes. Look at her face, beaming with goodness and purity, when she, the beautiful Esmeralda, accepts the graceless Gringoire in marriage, to save him from untimely death; or when she administers the cooling draught to the goaded and excited Quasimodo, her eyes bending with pity, and mercy playing a sweet and silent melody upon her half-open lips; or when grateful and loving she gazes with ecstasy on the unconscious Phœbus, whose iron soul comprehends her not—as the poor idolator worships the image of brass or wood, that is insensible to his homage; or when, under her own humble roof, she repels the advances of the astonished Gringoire, treating him with kindness all the while; or when fleeing from the dark monk Frollo, as a sun-beam from the presence of a cloud; or when bent down with sorrow, crushed with persecution as the innocent flower by the pitiless storm, she yields to the pressure of adverse circumstance, and gently and womanly resigns herself to fate. Look at her in all these positions of the drama and say if Carlotta Grisi be not a great actress as well as a great dancer. It was evident that the audience thought so for we never recollect a ballet performance accompanied by such unanimous and incessant demonstrations of enthusiasm. There seemed to be but one feeling of delight at Carlotta's return, the only event which was wanting to consummate the absolute perfection of Mr. Lumley's ballet-troupe. The Gringoire of Perrot was an inimitable piece of pantomime, worthy of association with the highest efforts of comedy. If Perrot had not been the greatest of dancers, and the most inventive and graceful of ballet-masters, he would have been a Lemaître or a Perlet. Perrot is a genius, and nothing less. He has given us a grotesque view of Victor Hugo's houseless poet, but one overflowing with wit, drollery, and unctuous humour. It was quite a feast to witness the acting of the two—of Perrot and Carlotta—in la nuit des noces. It was eloquence itself; every gesture and movement being full of unmistakeable meaning. Perrot's dancing was, as usual, inimitable. He affects no wonders now—but he makes the beholders wonder at the ease and grace with which he accomplishes them, with such apparent unconsciousness.

His Truandaise and Pas de la Esmeralda (both with Carlotta) were the perfection of choregraphic art. Perrot was received with that warmth which is due to his great merits, and his acting excited constant laughter and applause. Jenny Lind was present, and was one of the most zealous applauders of Carlotta's grace, and one of the keenest relishers of Perrot's mercurial humour. The ballet was presented in a complete and satisfactory condition. The charming music of Pugnî (the most attractive that has proceeded from his pen) was excellently played by the orchestra, under Nadaud's direction, and the characteristic incidental dances were all executed most satisfactorily. We must not pass over, without praise, M. Gosselin's admirable impersonation of the monk Frollo, quite a piece of acting in its way, nor St. Leon's manly bearing, exhibited in the character of Phœbus. At the end of the ballet Carlotta Grisi was re-called upon the stage, and was led on by Perrot. The audience seemed never tired of manifesting the satisfaction they felt at once more beholding the charming and incomparable Esmeralda.

On Tuesday Jenny Lind triumphed anew in La Sonnambula, and Carlotta Grisi again delighted us in Esmeralda. In the opera we remarked that Mdlle. Lind introduced several new and charming cadences and fioriture. The house was literally crammed to suffocation. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present.

On Thursday, Donizetti's Figlia de la Reggimento was produced, with Mdlle. Lind as Maria. As we were present at the Royal Italian Opera, (Don Giovanni being performed, of which our collaborateur, D. R., has elsewhere rendered account), we must defer our notice of this new essay of Mdlle. Lind until next week. We understand the house was densely crowded, and that the National Anthem was sung after the opera, Mdlle. Lind taking part in it. The Queen and Prince Albert, and all the stars of the drawing-room were present. D.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday the Barbiere was announced, but was postponed in consequence of the illness of Madame Persiani. Puritani was substituted. There was some novelty in the performance, inasmuch as Marini played Georgio, the role he was originally cast for, and Tamburini assumed his own part of Riccardo. The opera was completely done. Marini achieved a great success. He came out in the old Puritan with more force than on any previous occasion, and proved himself one of the finest bassi profondi who have been heard in this country for a long while. The duet in the second act between him and Tamburini obtained an encore and a recall. Mario and Grisi were both in fine voice, and sang splendidly. What we have said of the performance as a whole in a former number will apply here. The greatest care has been bestowed on the getting up of the Puritani, the scenery and dresses being extremely splendid. We cannot refrain from highly commending the attention paid to the minutest scenic details at the Royal Italian Opera. In the first scene of the Puritani, during the symphony or introductory music, the sun is seen to rise; the light breaks slowly over the sea, and reveals a distant view of the French coast—the various shades of light are managed with great effect—the guard is relieved, and soldiers pass across the stage, the whole giving a reality to the scene which we have rarely witnessed on any stage. This is certainly making the most of situation. After the opera, the new ballet La Salamandrine was performed, to which we now hasten to devote a few lines, according to promises laid down in our last week's number; first giving the argument of the story, as taken from the affiche of the Royal Italian Opera.

Giulio (M. Petipa), a young Sicilian peasant, returns from hunting, to the cottage where resides Nina (Mlle. Fanny Elsler), to whom he is betrothed. She reproaches him with his ill-success in the chase, and so ridicules his mal-adresse, that he returns to the mountain. Still his ill-fortune pursues him, until, wearied with his march, he determines to enter into the crater of Etna, and cull a bouquet of certain flowers which grow in its sulphurous soil. These flowers, according to an old Sicilian superstition, are under the protection of the Salamandrines—spirits of fire, who are supposed to inhabit the burning mountain. With this fatal gift, he returns to Nina. She is alarmed; at first refuses the present; but at last accepts it. Immediately she is overcome by a heavy sleep, and sinks senseless upon a bank. She dreams that she climbs the mountain to restore the flowers, that a storm arises, and she shelters herself beneath a tree. The tree is struck by lightning; she is killed; while Hecla (Mlle. Dumilatre) appears in the midst of the burning tree. Nina continues to dream that she is transformed into a Salamandrine, and seeks Giulio while he sleeps beside a fire under a shed, where he is passing the night. The Spirits of Fire interpose and drag her away, and, at the very instant they are descending with her into the volcano, she awakes, and finds that she has dreamed.

The story as above told is certainly not carried clearly out in the ballet. The first scene is exceedingly beautiful, and the daybreak on Mount Etna and the surrounding country is managed with unusual effect. The first scene exhibits the mime powers of Fanny Elsler to admiration. No artist in the world, terpsichorean, histrionic, or operatic, can surpass the captivating Fanny in personifying the airs and graces of a coquetish maiden. The dances belonging to this portion of the ballet are not very striking, if we except one pas by Fanny Elsler, given with all the power of the great artist. During the first tableaux her performance and gestures might well form studies for the actor and the sculptor. Every attitude had an express meaning, and was instinct with grace; whilst every motion was as easy and natural, as though it were a spontaneous effort exercitated by no art. In the second tableau, the interior of Etna, the effect of the scene was entirely spoiled by giving too much light from the chandelier, thereby nullifying the red and mysterious glare that at first signified the abode of the Salamanders. This was a great mistake. The dancing of Fanny Elsler and Dumilatre in this scene was admirable; but the groupings of the choreographic corps discovered nothing new, and the dances themselves were not super-excellent. Elsler, Dumilatre and M. Petipa were loudly applauded in a pas de trois of some merit, and the Mesdemoiselles Neodot, Bretin and O'Bryan were received with much favour in a subsequent pas. The third tableau presented nothing very striking or effective. M. Petipa and Mlle. Fanny Elsler, performed a pas de deux in which they were loudly applauded. The pedal fioriture (we don't like the expression) of the gracious Fanny, brought down thunders of applause. We did not observe the interposition of the spirits of fire, and their dragging away Nina, as so impressively mentioned in the affiche. The sum of all our criticism amounts to thus much, that the Salamandrine is a very splendid ballet in some respects, but that it is on the whole inefficient, or ineffective: that some of the scenery is beautiful; that the music is horribly boisterous, loud enough to kill deafness itself; that the story is not well conceived and indifferently followed out on the stage; that the dancing of Fanny Elsler and Dumilatre is exquisite, and that of Petipa very good; that all the ladies of the corps are capital individually, but so—so collectively—in fine, that there is much to be lauded and something to be found fault with. So much for the new ballet La Salamandrine.

On Tuesday the Lucrezia Borgia was given for the fourth time. The performance was magnificent—nay, almost faultless. The chorus in the first scene was encored, as was also the grand trio in the second act, most exquisitely given by Grisai, Mario, and Tamburini. As a matter of course, Alboni was encored twice in "Il segreto per esser;" the house cheering most vociferously at the end of the second repeat. The Salamandrine followed, which calls for no particular notice. We must now hasten to a task more in consonance with our sympathies than any thing that has devolved on us in our critical duties since we commenced reviewing the performances of the Royal Italian Opera. It is indeed a labour of love to write about Mozart's Don Giovanni, one of the world's chef-d'œuvres.

The announcement of Don Giovanni by the Royal Italian Opera company, raised the greatest expectations in the public mind. The style of splendour and completeness in which the Semiramide, Puritani, and the Lucrezia Borgia were produced, led to the anticipation that Mozart's immortal work, involving so great a cast of characters and so much magnificence in the scenic details, while it demanded the highest capabilities of the band, would surpass all that had gone before. Great as these expectations were, they were not lowered a jot in the minds of all those who witnessed the Don Giovanni, at the Royal Italian Opera, on Thursday evening. An immense concourse of people had assembled to do homage to the mightiest lyrical production of all times, and long before Signor Costa appeared in the orchestra, the house was filled in every part. Before proceeding to speak of the performance, we shall give a list of the parts personified.

Donna Anna	MADAME GRISI.
Zerlina	MADAME PERSIANI.
Elvira	MADLIE CORBARI.
Don Ottavio	SIGNOR MARIO.
Il Commendatore	SIGNOR TAGLIAFICO.
Mazetto	SIGNOR P. LEY.
Leporello	SIGNOR ROVERE.
Don Giovanni	SIGNOR TAMBURINI.

The overture displayed the powers of the band to perfection. It was played in a manner we have rarely, if ever heard, and the nuances were given with the greatest care by Signor Costa. We have only one word to chronicle of the conductor on Thursday evening, viz., praise—nay, let it be two words, exceeding praise, and the compliment will be more befitting the merits of Signor Costa. We never heard Don Giovanni before interpreted throughout in so masterly and complete a manner; and certainly much of this, if not all, is due to the untiring efforts of the Chef. The band was faultless, and the chorus surpassing all eulogy. The finale to the first part was given with a power, and certainty we had never previously heard. The effect was quite electrical, and obtained a loud encore from all parts of the house, to which the chorus, very properly, did not respond. With this general comment on the band and singers, we hasten to notice the principal artists. The part of Leporello would, a priori, seem almost fatal to a singer who should attempt it in this country after Lablache; but Signor Rovere played and sung the part so well as entirely to do away with any ungenerous comparisons. His Leporello was acted with great spirit, and his humour did not for one moment border on the farcical. In the statue scene he was capital, and though highly comic, did not injure the effect of the scene with any display of extravagant fun. Altogether, Signor Rovere pleased us much in Leporello. We shall recur to his performance in a second notice. Mademoiselle Corbari was the best Elvira we have seen since Mademoiselle Sophie Loewe performed the part some years ago at Her Majesty's Theatre. She gave the

"Ah! che mi dici mai," very beautifully, and sang her share in the trio and terzetto in the second act, with great effect. This lady bide fair, before very long, to occupy no inferior position in the Operatic world. The improvement she has made since last year is remarkable. Madame Persiani's Zerlina is well known as an exceeding graceful and elegant performance. Her singing the music of the part is beautiful, but hardly Mozartean. She was encored with Tamburini in "La ci darem," and in the "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino." Signor Ley cannot hope to attain any particular fame by his performance of Mazetto. His voice is powerful, but the quality is not remarkable for expression. His acting was better than his singing. Signor Tagliafico was the best Commendatore we ever heard. He was positively great in the magnificent scene in the last act. The tremendous duet between him and Tamburini was given with most thrilling effect. Grisi's Donna Anna was superlatively grand. It is perhaps her greatest part. Her first scena over her father's dead body was beautiful in the extreme. The scene where she discovers Don Giovanni to be her betrayer called forth all her highest tragic powers. The scena, "Or sai che l'indegno," was as magnificent an instance of acting and singing as ever we witnessed. Grisi was retailed after this splendid artistic display. We were delighted with the introduction of the "Non mi dir," which should never be omitted from the performance of Don Giovanni. Grisi sang it exquisitely, and did not wander for one instant from the integrity of the text. All praise to the gifted child of Italia for her heartfelt reverence of the divine German musician. Tamburini's Don Giovanni is one of the most complete and splendid performances ever seen on the stage. Whether we behold him in the first scene killing a man in a duel, and making sport of the catastrophe; or in the scene with Elvira, when he disguises his feelings, and feigns a continuance of his old passion; or with Zerlina, when he pours forth a melody of love in such a manner, as would endanger the heart of old Saturn's wife herself; or with Donna Anna and Ottavio, when the accomplished cavalier is transparent in every attitude and motion; or in the ball-scene, where he plays the host with unsurpassed grace and dignity; or when, detected by the guests in his attempt on Zerlina, and they threaten him with their vengeance, he looks at them with a calmness perfectly in unison with the fearlessness of his character, till, stung by their threats, he turns on them like a stag at bay; or in the scene in the churchyard, where he treats with levity the warning of the statue, and invites it to supper; or, in fine, in the last scene, when he stands before the ghost undaunted, unmoved, viewing him like one that dared to look upon the devil himself and winced not, until a sudden thrill of agony and despair passed through his frame, when he gives his hand to the statue, and feels the supernatural influence—we feel that Tamburini is an artist of the most singular power, high conception, and lofty endowments. His last scene may rank among the greatest performances of past and present times. The singing of the great artist was equal to his best days. He obtained an encore with Persiani in "La ci darem." He was also called on to repeat, "Fin chan dal vino," which he gave with immense spirit, and narrowly escaped an encore in the serenade, "Deh vieni alla finestra," which he sang with the greatest purity and expression. We owe our gratitude to Signor Tamburini for the restoration to the score of the aria, "Meta di voi," which he gave with great taste. In the ball-scene, a novel effect was produced by having the minuet danced, according to the intention of the composer, by two dancers, after the mode of the period. Mlle. Fanny Elssler and Dumilatre, the former assuming the gentleman, danced the minuet so captivatingly, that they elicited a rapturous encore. The dancing of the two charming artists was graceful in the extreme. It is impossible to call to mind all the encores and all the recalls. We remember all the artists appearing after the first act, Grisi being recalled after "Or che sai," and Tamburini coming on at the end amid a hurricane of applause. There was but one feeling in the house regarding the performance, and that was one of intense delight. The National Anthem was given at the end of the opera, it being the Queen's birth-day, Grisi and Persiani taking the solos. The evening concluded with the ballet of La Salamandrine.—D.R.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

ADELPHI.—Madame Celeste took her benefit on Wednesday evening, and had, as she so well deserved, a bumper house. Mr. Webster, on the occasion, came expressly to play for her in a new piece entitled Flying Colours; or, Crossing the Frontier. The piece is evidently a translation from the French, and the version is excellently well done. The plot rests entirely on the shoulders of Celeste, Webster, and Miss Woolgar, and famously these artists carried it through. The situations are excellent, and the author has shown much stage tact and good judgment in his construction of the piece. The acting of Madame Celeste was charming in the extreme, and elicited rapturous applause. We have seldom seen the fair artist in a part more befitting the graces, naïveté, and piquancy of her style. Mr. Webster had a capital character to sustain, and performed it with all his usual artistic skill. Miss Woolgar was admirable likewise. Flying Colours; or, Crossing the Frontier, will certainly have a long run at the Adelphi. The dresses, decorations, and scenery were on the usual scale of splendour for which this theatre has long been celebrated. The principal artists were called on at the end amid great enthusiasm.

FRENCH PLAYS.—L'Enfant trouvé is an amusing comédiette of Picard's, the only fault of which is its being spun out into three acts, when two at most would have amply sufficed for the matter contained therein. Without being hypercritical, we expect something more than a mere charge in three acts.—We enter upon the field of pure comedy, and we are consequently disposed to be more serious, and not entirely sacrifice our sense to our risible faculties. Laying aside the extravagance of the plot, the piece is neatly worded, and artistically put together, without betraying any symptoms of dullness or patchiness. The orphan is a M. Saint Jules, and is about to be married to a certain Henriette, whose relations, although professing the utmost liberality as regards family and connexions, insist upon knowing something of the family of the young man. This sets Delbar's wits to work to manufacture him a father and mother; and he consequently pitches upon Castleville, an old bachelor, to enact the part of the father, and upon Mademoiselle Dubrosserac to play that of the mother. He works alternately upon their imagination, their feelings, and their cupidity, and eventually persuades them that they are the real father and mother. They themselves get married, and the young man obtains his bride. M. Regnier was the soul of the piece, and, as usual carried the house by storm. The scenes in which he persuades the old bachelor and the old maid that they are the young man's real parents—mixing up truth and invention in such manner as to make them dubious as to whether the thing might not be, after all, as he states—were highly humorous, and, although rather eccentric, irresistibly amusing: that, also, in which he persuades the two to marry, kept the house in convulsions. M. Regnier was as mercurial as ever. M. Cartigny was admirable as the old bachelor, and drew largely upon the laughter of his audience. Madame Grassau deserves praise for her execution of the old maid; and Madlle. Vallée was, as usual, charming in the small part of Henriette. Molière's farce of Les Précieuses Ridicules has also been played several times this week, but not with that degree of success which the great name and reputation of the author would seem to command. Although M. Regnier is the best representative of the Scapins, the Sganarelles, and the Mascarilles now on the French stage, there is a certain heaviness in the action, a tediousness in the language, which no art can dispel. We are inclined to think, that the fault lies more in the author than the actor; for the same reflections have often been forced upon us, even when Monrose was at the apogée of his fame, than whom a better Scapin or Crispin never trod the boards of any theatre. We must not be supposed to refer to the more serious works of the great dramatist—they are imperishable—but merely to his lighter productions. The ridicules of Molière's time have undergone a total change:—an attack upon medicine and doctors, on blue-stockings and pretentious damsels, the fine language of the fops of the seventeenth century, find no echo in our times; even the expressions are antiquated, the exclamations out of date; the manners, habits, customs essentially different; the use of the cudgel is now no longer tolerated—in short, the dresses themselves contribute a great deal to dispel the illusion, and make the actors seem to be uttering sentiments in which they do not participate, or at any rate for which we have no sympathy. Mademoiselle Denain took her benefit on Wednesday—we believe that M. Regnier's takes place next Wednesday—so that we may soon expect another change of actors. M. Bouffé is announced, and we hail his arrival with pleasure.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WE REGRET to learn that Mr. Jones Whitworth, of whose successful career the Italian journals have, from time to time, given such favourable accounts, has been prevented, by illness, from accepting the engagements offered him at the Philharmonic and at the Ancient Concerts on the nights of the Archbishop of York and Earl Howe.

THE ATLAS.—In complaining of the length of Rossini's Semiramide, the musical critic of this paper observes:—"Some castigation of the composer is absolutely necessary in the performance of this opera." Does he mean that Rossini should be thrashed on the stage every night Semiramide is performed? Or does he intend to insinuate that the "Swan of Pesaro" merits a whacking for having written so long and dull an opera. If the latter be his meaning what would this severe writer award to "Young Verdi," for the composition of Nine and Ernani? We should say, the cat-o'-nine-tails, at the very least.

HEER FISCHER has returned from Stuttgart in Bavaria where he went to wait upon the Emperor of Russia, who was there for a short period.

DR. SPOHR.—The arrival of Dr. Spohr, in London, to fulfil his engagement with the Sacred Harmonic Society, is expected during the first week in July. We are not aware what works of this great master's will be performed, but, believe that the Crucifixion and the Fall of Babylon will be amongst the number. We anticipate a more satisfactory performance of these works than we have hitherto had the opportunity of hearing, from the circumstance of the band and chorus having lately had such good drilling from Mendelssohn, during the getting up and performance of the Elijah. We hope, and believe, that a new spirit has been infused into this band of amateurs, from the exertion of that great artist, and it will be the fault of those in office if this spirit is allowed to retrograde.

MR. FRENCH FLOWERS.—By a letter, from Berlin, we hear that the Earl of Westmoreland has expressed his entire approval of this professor's treatise on fugue.

MISS GRANT.—This vocalist has returned to town after an absence of some time in the Provinces, where she has been singing with great success in many places. We hope to hear her at some of the London Concerts this season, so that we may judge of her progress.

SIGNOR SCHIRA has been appointed Professor of Singing at the Royal Academy of Music.

MR. JOHN BALSIR CHATTERTON.—We are happy to inform our readers that this amiable and excellent professor has been appointed, by royal command, harpist to Her Majesty the Queen.

LEICESTER SQUARE.—The project of erecting a new theatre in this locale has been abandoned. The ground, which had been fixed upon, is now let for other purposes.

BIRMINGHAM.—(Extract from a Letter.) Mendelssohn's Elijah was, as you know, performed in Birmingham some time ago, and immense posters were stuck on the walls to that effect; since which equally large bills have been issued by the Odd Fellows, for a Whitsun Trip by Rail, to Worcester, Gloucester, and Bristol, and back next day: these have been pasted on the Elijah bills, but not covering the lower part of them; it reads thus:—"The Odd Fellows of Birmingham will make an extraordinary Trip to Worcester, Gloucester, and Bristol, returning next day. Leader:—MR. WILLY: Conductor:—DR. MENDELSSOHN."

NEW MUSIC HALL, DUBLIN.—A spacious Music Hall has just been built in Dublin. The proprietor, Mr. Drewet, is determined to give concerts on a grand scale. He has already prevailed on Madame Bishop to retard her departure from Dublin, and has engaged her for six concerts. This engagement, and visits to Cork and Limerick, will delay the arrival of Madame Bishop in London, for some weeks.

MR. HENRY PHILLIPS, has been giving his entertainment with great success, at Hull, Driffield, Birmingham, and Chester, at each place he had crowded audiences, and was received with the greatest favour.

THE MISSES KENNETH.—These young and rising vocalists are rapidly making themselves a name in the provinces. At Manchester they have been singing with the greatest success at the Athæneum concert, and at the concert of the Philharmonic Institution. The Misses Kenneth have also been playing at the Theatre Royal, in Weber's opera of Oberon, in which their performances have obtained the warm approval of the Manchester press. The Manchester Examiner, which we have before us, speaks in the highest terms of the talent of both these young ladies, whom we trust, ere long to have an opportunity of criticising ourselves—at the concerts or theatres of the metropolis.

CURIOUS LAW OF SOUND.—The effect of two or more reciprocating bodies upon a sound is curious. An experiment occurs to us which showed it forcibly. When one of two ordinary drinking glasses (each of which emitted the note C when a tuning-fork was applied to them) was held horizontally and the other perpendicularly with the lips of each in contact, and a tuning-fork was placed at the intersection, THE SOUND CEASED, and when they were held perpendicularly to the tuning-fork (mouth over mouth), the sound was doubled. This may involve the reason why some cross-churches are very bad for hearing in.—The Builder.

M. VIEUXTEMPS, the great violinist, has departed from London being engaged on a continental tour.

MR. ROBERT SIDNEY PRATTEN, the flautist, has arrived from Prague. The German Journals speak very loudly in praise of his powers on the flute.

CHEAP PIANOFORTE.—Cheapness is extending, like a new sunrise, over all the branches of the arts and sciences. We paid a visit, last week, to Warren's Pianoforte Manufactory, Leadenhall Street, and were much surprised to find a capital new instrument, purchasable at twenty guineas. We also saw some Piccolos, very superiorly made, at eighteen guineas. This is cheapness with a vengeance, and must ensure an extraordinary sale. We should like to know whence Mr. Warren's profits can come. Pianofortes new, and really good, at the above prices, is a type of the present antimonopolizing times, when men will sacrifice themselves to outdo their neighbours. We hope Mr. Warren does make a profit.

STANDARD LYRIC DRAMA.—A Prospectus and Specimen Pages of an intended new, cheap, and important musical publication professing to give a more perfect, correct, and elegant edition of the great dramatic works of the great composers, than has been hitherto published has reached us. Each opera will be given with the vocal score in its integrity, and the pianoforte adaptation arranged from the orchestral score. The size of this work will be small quarto, and the specimen sent us, exhibits an intention of bestowing great care in the getting up. The projectors have appealed to the public to support them in their undertaking, and are only waiting for an adequate number of subscribers to commence with the first publication. The speculation is one entirely worthy the consideration of all amateurs and musicians, and we therefore heartily recommend such to give it a habitation in their thoughts.

NEW DIATONIC FLUTE.—In a recent number we offered a few remarks on the Theory of the New Patent Diatonic Flute, by Mr. Siccama, the inventor of that instrument. We could, at that time, only record our testimony of the ability and the scientific knowledge evinced in the work. A correspondent, who is well-known and regarded as a flute-player, and as a composer for the instrument, writes to us in the following words:—"The improvements proposed by Mr. Siccama's invention, embraces the two points, tone and tune, upon which all melodic effects depend. That these two points are obtained, and in a degree far beyond any flute hitherto produced, is incontestable: while, at the same time, the fingering remains the same as upon the ordinary flute; only with the advantage of copious resources for new fingerings which facilitate passages in the high notes that are complicated and difficult on other flutes. The harmonies are perfectly in tune with the open or natural notes. The feeble and imperfect E and A of the lower octave are rendered full, and equal with the other notes. The medium and upper octaves are clear and round. The flute is in perfect tune, and does not need those mutations of the performer's embouchure which even an approach to correct intonation has hitherto demanded. Every flute-player, whether in the orchestra the concert-room, or in chamber music, must appreciate the value of an instrument upon which reliance can be placed in point of intonation; and, I am of opinion, that Mr. Siccama's Diatonic Flute only requires a trial to have its excellence acknowledged in this most important feature, as well as its claims to superiority of tone." Consistently with the course, we have found it expedient and necessary to pursue in such matters, we must decline entering, controversially, into the question, or offering any opinion on the merits of the diversity of new flutes, which their zealous inventors are blowing into the ear of musical Europe, like a tube filled by a tornado, each of which can be proved to be vastly superior in tone, tune, and every other requisite to all its competitors.

THE MELODIST'S CLUB.—There was a brilliant meeting of this association at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday; the gallant Lord Saltoun in the chair, supported by Sir Andrew Barnard. Several foreigners were present, among whom was M. Fiorentino, of Le Constitutionnel. They appeared much pleased with the performance of "Non nobis Domine," and other vocal compositions in parts, which were sung in the course of the evening. Signor Marras sang "Come Gentil," and another song, excellently. M. Godefroid performed a Studio, followed by the Danses des Sylphes, on the harp, in a masterly style, eliciting several rounds of applause.

M. Godefroid justifies all the praise of M. Fiorentino and his Parisian friends. Mr. Richardson played "O dolce concerto," with new variations, on the flute, in a brilliant manner, and was accompanied on the piano-forte, by Mr. Lindsay Sloper, who subsequently performed a solo, which was received, as it deserved, with the highest favor. Mr. Parry, the honorary Secretary, announced that he expected the Earl of Westmoreland would arrive in London in time to preside at the last meeting of the club, on the 29th June, when ladies will be introduced to hear musical performances.

CONCERTS.

MR. FREDERICK CHATTERTON'S CONCERT took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday morning before a full and fashionable audience. Among the artists who assisted we most noticed Mdle. Jenny Lutzer, whose singing of "Der Erl Konig," was excellent; the Misses Williams, whose beautiful voices blended as usual most harmoniously; Miss Bassano, who gave proof of the good effects of her Italian campaign; Miss Sabilla Novello, always welcome in a concert-room, and Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Seguin, and Signor and Madame F. Lablache, all right good artists. Among the instrumentalists, Mr. Carte deserves especial mention for the excellent and artistic style in which he performed his flute solo, and Miss Kate Loder and Miss Day's brilliant performance of Wallace's clever and effective duet, for two pianofortes, from L'Eclair, deserved all the applause so liberally bestowed upon them. Three juvenile pupils of Mr. F. Chatterton, the eldest apparently not having numbered five years, created a great deal of interest from the manner in which they got through their "grand march for three gothic harps". Mr. F. Chatterton's harp performances are too well-known and appreciated to need comment now; we must, however, mention, that he played in his usual brilliant and effective style and received his customary tribute of applause.

MR. MÜHLENFELDT'S.—Press of matter has hitherto prevented us from attending to the concert of this deserving and excellent musician. Mr. Mühlendorf exhibited his accustomed taste for classical music in the disposition of his programme. His best effort was in Beethoven's trio in E flat, where, accompanied by MM. Sainton and Rousselot, he sustained the pianoforte part with brilliant effect. Mr. Mühlendorf also displayed his execution and taste as a pianist to great advantage in a clever andante di bravura of his own composition, and in a duet for harp and piano, with the intelligent Madame D'Eichthal, both performers were entitled to the highest approbation. M. Sainton played an air varié (Pischek's popular "Standard bearer") on the violin in first-rate style. The composition is his own, and is creditable to his taste and acquirements. Madame D'Eichthal was also greatly successful in a solo on the harp. This lady is harpist to the Empress of Austria and the Queen of the Belgians, and honourably supports the distinction. The vocalists were Misses S. Novello and E. Nelson, Madame Jenny Lutzer, Madame Santa Croce, and Madame Macfarren, Herr Brandt, and Signor Salli. We have no space for detail, but must mention a very nice song, "Rastlose liebe," sung by Herr Brandt, and a German song, most expressively interpreted by Madame Macfarren, the composition of her husband, Mr. G. A. Macfarren, and quite a bit of genius. We specialise these, as they were novelties. With a word for Mr. Lockey's graceful reading of a rondo from Spohr's Jessonda, we must conclude—adding that Mr. Mühlendorf played other pieces, both in conjunction with his clever instrumental co-operators, Sainton and Rousselot, and by himself. Mr. C. Horsley conducted with his usual ability. The concert, though intolerably long, gave entire satisfaction to a very full audience, who testified their pleasure by the warm and repeated applause with which they honoured Mr. Mühlendorf and his brother and sister artists.

NOTICE.

IN consequence of press of matter we are compelled to defer, till our next, Reviews of the Concerts of Signor Brizzi, and others. A notice of Mr. Horn's Daniel's Prophecy; a review of Schulhoff's Pianoforte Works; Macready at the Princess's; Mr. Webster's Analysis of the Human Voice; and other matters, must also stand over. These are all in type, but as we are not as big as The Times, our readers must kindly bear with the occasional disappointment which is necessitated by the constrained compass in which we are confined.

J. KOHLER'S NEW PATENT LEVER INSTRUMENTS.

J. KOHLER having brought to perfection and obtained Her Majesty's Letters Patent for the above invention, which he has applied to the CORNOPEAN, TRUMPET, CORNETTO, TROMBONES, and FRENCH HORNS, he can now with great confidence, after an experience of Five years in bringing the action to its present state of perfection, recommend them to Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and all Professors and Amateurs. The advantages that this Patent gives to these Instruments are:—

1. All the Tones and Semitones produced by the Patent Lever are quite as perfect as the Natural Notes on the Instrument.
2. The intervals on the DIATONIC and CHROMATIC Scales are perfect, the compass greater, and the most rapid and difficult passages may be performed with a precision, freedom, and fulness of tone, and comparative ease to the performer.
3. Combinations in harmony, which never before could be performed at all by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease, and Ten or Twelve Instruments on this principle can produce a more rich and sonorous effect than Twenty Four could do on the old principles. The harshness of tone in the former Brass Instruments is entirely done away with, and a set of these Instruments heard together, produces Military and harmonious effects never before heard.

M. JULLIEN'S Annual Musical Presentation

AND CIRCULATING LIBRARY

COMBINED.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to submit to the Musical Public of Great Britain and Ireland, an entirely NEW SYSTEM for supplying their Musical requirements.

It has long been a subject of just complaint in the Profession, as well as amongst Amateurs, that in order to become possessed of a moderate proportion of the Musical Novelties of the day, it is necessary to purchase, at a very considerable, and in many cases, at an inconvenient cost, a quantity of Music, which, if it do not prove utterly worthless, is very frequently found on trial, to be unsuited to, or unwished for by, the purchaser, who thus becomes burdened with a considerable expense, while the object he has been seeking remains unattained.

A Musical Circulating Library

would appear in a great measure to obviate these inconveniences; yet there are many who object, and naturally so, to pay a considerable sum annually for the mere loan of Music, not having the power to retain as their own property any one piece which they may wish to possess, without making further payments in addition to their annual subscription.

To meet both these difficulties, M. JULLIEN brings forward this New System, which, supported as it will be by the great resources of his extensive London establishment, as well as by his numerous Continental connections, will, he hopes, afford advantages and facilities to his subscribers, to which no other plan hitherto brought forward has ever laid claim.

M. JULLIEN has formed a complete Circulating Library, and intends every year to establish

in which every subscriber will become interested to the full amount of their Annual Subscription—that is to say, M. JULLIEN will present GRATIS to each subscriber Music to the FULL AMOUNT OF HIS OR HER SUBSCRIPTION to the Library—such Music to be chosen by the subscribers themselves, and to become their sole property.

For Three Guineas, therefore, a subscriber will be supplied, ON LOAN, with any Music he may wish for, and at the end of the year will be PRESENTED with THREE GUINEAS' WORTH, to become his own exclusive property.

In order to facilitate the Subscribers' Selection, M. JULLIEN will furnish a list of the most fashionable and popular Pieces, with the prices attached. This list having been marked and sent into the library, the Subscriber will immediately receive the pieces chosen.

In bringing forward this system, (new to this country,) M. JULLIEN has the satisfaction to reflect that on the continent, where it has been some years in operation, it has had the effect of advancing the interest of the Musical Art in the highest degree.

M. JULLIEN's Library, which is the most extensive to be found in England at the present time, possesses the COMPLETE known WORKS of the English, German, Italian, and French Authors, all of which will be at the disposal of the Subscribers.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

- 1.—The Subscription to be always paid at the time of subscribing and at the renewal of every subsequent term.
- 2.—Subscribers resident in London, to be entitled to Six Pieces of Music and one Score at a time; Country Subscribers to Twelve Pieces and Two Scores at a time.
- 3.—To each Subscriber will be presented gratis, at the time of subscribing, a Portfolio, for the protection of the Library Music; and at no time, on any consideration, will Music be received, or sent back, unless enclosed in the Portfolio.
- 4.—Should any Music be retained beyond the time subscribed for, the Subscription will continue open, and must be paid for until such Music is returned.
- 5.—All expenses attending Carriage, Postage, &c., to be defrayed by the Subscribers.

JENNY LIND AND HER INFLUENCE.

(Harmonia. Chap. III.)

WHAT will be the end of all this excitement? When the Lind fever subsides, what will be the state of the patient—the public? What stimulus will be required to restore the patient to a strong and healthy condition, with the pulse not above 74°?

There surely never was such a fuss about any one individual in the world of art. The Catalani fever was nothing to it—the Sontag fever nothing to it—the Malibran fever nothing to it—even the Paganini fever was a fool to it. So great is the turmoil, so terrible the confusion, so furious the whirlwind, so plentiful the dust, that not a critic but is blind as the public, and gropes about in the dark chamber of sophism, dealing buffets right and left, sometimes hitting upon the wall of truth, but as often stumbling against the chairs and tables of chicanery. We own that, like our brethren of the goose-quill, we have been strangely bothered. Something has given our judgment a sprain, and it is, for the nonce, incapable of exercising its functions. And so we have fallen in with the crowd; but, for the life of us, we cannot undertake to swear whether we be in the right, or whether we be in the wrong. We have made tail at the Opera with the mob that waits at the doors, in eager expectation of an excitement which it often fails to get. We have made tail with the mob, and have fancied we shared its curiosity. But the doors once open, ourselves once carried to our standing-places in the pit, and the excitement has given way to astonishment at our own folly. It was not to hear an orator—it was not to see a warrior—it was not to admire a statesman—it was not to converse with a poet, that we went thus eagerly, at the risk of broken bones. It was to hear a little maiden sing—and to sing what?—to sing music that never greatly moved us, even in our youngest days, when the world was full of green boughs and opening buds.

The curtain went up, the opera began, the cheers resounded, deep silence followed, and the cause of all excitement was before us. It opened its lips, and emitted sounds. The sounds it emitted were right pleasant, honey-sweet, and silver-toned. With this there was, besides, a quietude that we had not marked before, and a something that hovered about the object, as an unseen grace that was attiring it in a veil of innocence, transparent as the thin surface of a bubble, disclosing all, and making its own presence rather felt than seen. We looked and caught the infection; we were charmed like the rest; we were Lind-bitten. We went home, and took a strong restorative, and the next morning awoke free from fever. Reason once more assumed its sway.

But again we were attracted to the theatre, and again we caught the fever. The same remedy applied at night found us whole in the morning as before.

Fevers, plagues, epidemics wear themselves out. Time deals them scurvy buffets, till at length they have no longer force to drag themselves along. This is a fact established in philosophy, and has taken its place among the truths that, springing from observation of the nature of things, are eternal. There be some, who—like Professor Porson, when he came home drunk, and tumbled against the various pieces of furniture that adorned his bed-room—exclaim, "Confound the nature of things,"—since the nature of things is such as to consort ill with their own projects, or only to serve them for a time, and then give them a shove the reverse way: for they walk with their eyes bandaged, and are drunk with egotism. These accept the doctrine of necessity, and yield to the despotism of circumstance, d rebrousse poil. Standing upright in the sea of human events, if they behold an impetuous wave travelling towards them on the speed of unseen feet, instead of holding firm and allowing it to break upon them harmlessly, they duck, and let it pass over their heads, blind to its future course, unconscious how they may be injured or benefited by its influence. The fine line of the poet, is lost upon them. Closing their eyes, they are blind to the prophetic shadow, and so see not the circumstance on the horizon, which, when it arrives, crushes them, and leaves them helpless. Whom the cap fits let him wear it. "Harmonia" speaks the words of truth, and, as the oracle, is deaf to argument and persuasion.

"Coming events cast their shadows before,"

Seven times have we had the fever—seven times have we been Lind-bitten. After the first we were rabid, after the second we were enthusiastic, after the third eloquent, after the fourth melancholy, after the fifth demonstrative, after the sixth logical, after the seventh indifferent. But still we were undecided. Meyerbeer had bothered us, Mendelssohn had puzzled us, Germany had sophisticated us. Was Jenny Lind the phoenix of phoenixes—or was she an ordinary person? We could not say. The fever was one thing, which had subsided; the sprained judgment was another, which rested uncured. It remained to apply leeches, bandages, and lotions, so that at the end reason might get upon its feet again, and walk straight forward.

En attendant this much to-be-wished-for result, let us chat a bit with the reader; for in conversation we gain facts, and the music of a voice, the queendom of a brow, the grandeur of a form, and the brightness of an intellect, that have no where a parallel on earth, shall have ceased to make your very heart quake with emotion.

It is not for us to criticise the Camille of Rachel; that is done elsewhere by an abler hand than ours. And, indeed, were we critics, the pen would fail us in the attempt to analyse so transcendent a performance. In all our memory of dramatic events we can find nothing, absolutely nothing, that is in any way comparable to it. It is not acting—it is inspiration; it is not Rachel, the actress, but the soul of Corneille, the poet, which makes her the oracle of its thoughts. In the hands of Rachel, the part of Camille is a growth from an opening bud of innocence to a full-blown flower of passion. Who, in the quiet pensive maiden, remarkable only for the deep-meaning eye and the eloquent grace of gesture and motion, would suspect the impetuous nature that erupts at the end, with the fierceness and fury of an Ætna? Who in that soft voice would dream of the terrible discord of hate and rage and scorn, the offspring of a broken love, that afterwards assails the ear and wrings the heart?

But enough; when we have said that Rachel is once more amongst us, we have announced the presence of the greatest dramatic genius in the world. No worshipper of one of the noblest, most intellectual, and most refined of arts will lose this opportunity—which, for aught we know may be the last—of witnessing her performances and paying homage at the shrine of her incomparable talent. LEIGH HUNT.

Prologue.

FAIR reader, have we not chosen a charming subject for the season of the year? Will not you—

"Who lose the deep'ning twilight of the spring
In ball-rooms and hot theatres."

cordially thank you for quieting your gentle consciences for such treason against Nature, by providing you with a kind of literary "rus in urbe?" It has occurred to us that the language and true significance of flowers have never yet been really comprehended. Arbitrary senses have been attributed to different blossoms; each one has been regarded as a word, whereby a pretty, fanciful phraseology has been constructed, for the use of lukewarm love-makers; but the significance which we propose to develop is not arbitrary and fanciful, but real and philosophical. It is now an established fact with metaphysicians, that the material world is, in its whole and in all its parts, strictly analogous to, and symbolical of, the spiritual universe. Every low degree of life, say the metaphysicians, shadows forth the next degree above it. We purpose, in the succeeding sketches, to show how accurately this proposition applies to flowers as symbolizing feminine beauty. Every one who has studied the subject of female loveliness—and who has not done so?—must have remarked that there are certain distinct classes of beauty. The world of beauty is divided into various orders, among the members of each of which there prevails a marked family likeness. Now we propose to show that each order of beauty has its manifest prototype in some one species of flower; and in order to the attainment of this object, we shall select some half dozen, or so, of the commonest favourites, with plain names, and draw the parallel between them and the orders of beauty they symbolize. How much more attractive must this spiritual botany prove, than the miserable material science which delights in tearing blossoms to bits, to find out how they are made! How much more in harmony with this season of sweet promise,

"When proud-pied April, dress'd in all his trim, Hath put a spirit of youth in every thing!"

I.—The Violet.

We are to describe the human parallel to the violet. Our task has been partially anticipated by the poets, who, from time immemorial, have flattered this little flower above all others. Hear what the sprightly poet of "Rimini" declareth of these blue-eyed pets:—

"We are the violets blue,
For our sweetness found
Careless in the mossy shades,
Looking on the ground."

Perdita pratteth of—

"Violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath;"

and a dozen others have unconsciously attempted, with regard to the violet, the task which we propose to ourselves, of indicating the analogies of flowers and fair faces. These, then, are the human violet:—Her modesty is much, and yet unconscious; she is thoughtful and self-centred, but quite unselfish; she is careless of, and indeed, seems scarcely to comprehend laudation when she is the object of it; her love is great, and she has few words to tell it in; but what of that? her eye discourses more eloquent language than that of "lovers' tongues by night." Her beauty is not striking, but its presence makes you happy, and its absence is grief. You love the world more for loving her—perhaps because you feel that she will love you more for loving the world. You dare sit in her presence and say nothing, and you long to call her by her Christian name the first time you see her. Her manners and her voice are very simple, feminine, and quiet, and utterly distance all spoken applause; if you wish to praise her to your friend, you will mention her name, look in his eyes, and keep silence. If you value your peace, beware of loving her too much, for, although she knows not her own worth, she will never give herself to one who is not worthy of her. If you think that you are worthy of her, you will surely fail, for your thought proves plainly that you are not so. You cannot quarrel with her. If you do ill, or are harsh to her, she will make no reply, but will weep tears that seem sharper to your heart than the strokes of daggers. If you do well, she will reward you with smiles that make you forget any other heaven.

PISCATORY MUSIC.

AQUATIC animals are generally supposed to be destitute of the means of making themselves heard; and if they communicate with each other, it is usually supposed that it must be otherwise than by sound. The seal has, it is believed, a peculiar and distinct cry; and the grampus snorts as it attains the surface. Frogs and other amphibious animals croak long and loud enough, but in all these cases the sounds are emitted, not under, but above the water, and by creatures rarely more than half aquatic. The cetaceous races have warm blood, and suckle their young; and fishes, properly so called, are considered, as we shall presently show, erroneously, a silent race. The long-eared Balaamite is justly reckoned the strangest ass mentioned in history, and a scaly creature emitting sounds may truly be reckoned a very odd fish indeed. A party lately crossing from the promontory in Salsette, called the Neat's Tongue, to near Sewree, were, about sunset, struck by distinct sounds, like the protracted booming of a distant bell, the dying cadence of an Æolian harp, the note of a pitchpipe or pitchfork, or any other long-drawn-out musical note. It was at first supposed to be music from Parell, floating at intervals on the breeze; then it was perceived to come from all directions almost in equal strength, and to arise from the surface of the water all around the vessel. The boatmen at once intimated that the sounds were produced by fish abounding in the muddy creeks and shoals around Bombay and Salsette; they were perfectly well known, and very often heard. Accordingly, on inclining the ear towards the surface of the water—or, better still, by placing it close to the planks of the vessel—the notes appeared loud and distinct, and followed each other in constant succession. The boatmen next day produced specimens of the fish—a creature closely resembling in size and shape the fresh-water perch of the north of Europe, and spoke of them as plentiful, and perfectly well known. It is hoped that they may be procured alive, and the means afforded of determining how the musical sounds are produced and emitted, with other particulars of interest supposed now in ichthyology. We shall be glad to receive from our readers any information they can give us in regard to a phenomenon which does not appear to have been hitherto noticed, and which cannot fail to attract the attention of the naturalist. Of the perfect accuracy with which the singular facts above related have been given, no doubt will be entertained when it is mentioned that the writer was one of a party of five intelligent persons, by all of whom they were most carefully observed, and the impressions of all of whom in regard to them were uniform. It is supposed that the fish are confined to particular localities—shallows, estuaries, and muddy creeks, rarely visited by Europeans; and that this is the reason why hitherto no mention, so far as we know, has been made of the peculiarity in any work on natural history.

A Treatise on the "Affinities" of Goethe, IN ITS WORLD-HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE,

DEVELOPED ACCORDING TO ITS MORAL AND ARTISTICAL VALUE,
Translated from the German of Dr. Heinrich Theodor Röscher,
Professor at the Royal Gymnasium at Bromberg.

THE IDEA OF THE "AFFINITIES" IN ITS ORGANIZATION.

BUT even in the form last described, we must not overlook an internal distinction. The common feature certainly rests, as we have shown, on the moral idea triumphing over the downfall of the individual; but within this common result (so to call it) is opened a perfectly different development of the struggle, by which the true concrete vitality of this relation is first produced.

The foundation of this internal distinction, we discern in the opposition of the male and female natures. The first has, with self-consciousness, to elevate itself to its destination, and, both thinking and acting, to engage in the struggle with itself and the world, that it may work itself out into a moral character. Woman, on the other hand, lives essentially in the feelings, and attains her highest destination in marriage, when the empire of the feelings preserves its highest acknowledgment and purest value. But man, by his very nature, stands farther from the feelings; the affinity with nature is, in him, weaker than in woman. He cannot obtain his existence and his position without a struggle. But on this very account, we require from him a battle with the stubborn opposition of passion and reality. If we find ourselves deceived in this—if he is consigned to the natural force of the feelings—if he is no more able to free himself from their abyss, we designate it weakness and impotence, and we turn from it, as from a missed destination, with a sense of pity and depression, without being again elevated by a counterpoise. If we further consider that this victory of the passion over the moral idea, has been fought for on a soil, which is not extended over the whole domain of the masculine mind; that much more the consciousness of his distinction of the problem he should solve, carries man far beyond the circle of marriage, which only moves in the feelings; his succumbing appears as a frightful evidence of an internal want of firmness. It is no tragical fate, in the highest sense, which seizes him, and the individual has, for the poetry of the moral spirit of marriage, profited the right of occupying the centre, since a mere weakling is unable to gain from us the absorbing painful interest of a deeply shaken soul.

This interest we retain alone for a truly tragic history. If, on the other hand, a female being, living quite in the feelings, as incapable of struggle as a plant, consuming the elements of her own existence, announces herself as a rich heart (Gemüth), by her mysterious affinity with the macrocosm, which extends even to the inmost nerves,—if such a being, we say, is seized by a feeling, which fills her own existence, and to which she involuntarily resigns herself, as if compelled, then do we behold the shattering energy of a natural force, to which we behold the tender creature irrevocably bound. Being magically touched by a feeling, which no more changes, but increases with gigantic growth, she falls, and must certainly fall into guilt, not being able to tranquillize her trembling heart for him, who, as the husband of another, ought only to inspire her with passionless sympathy. If, now, a woman, who certainly manifests the deepest nature of her sex,—if this being is entangled in an unhappy feeling, which rules her as a natural force, and with every movement, unconsciously makes the bonds firmer and more indissoluble,—if this being, we say, cannot make her heart the grave of her heart, then we are not seized, as in the case of the man's fall, with the feeling that the problem of life has been missed, through weakness and want of firmness on the part of the individual, but an infinite pain, as at an unalterable, unconquerable existence, overwhelms us. Here is first produced the genuine tragic tone. But this tone has not reached its highest intensity and purity, until it rests, not only upon the painful sense of an involuntary resignation to the feelings, and on that mysterious affinity, which determines the whole nature of the individual, but also morally steels itself by that consciousness of guilt, which rises upon the loving creature like a star which lights her night and her destiny. This consciousness of wrong has, in a deeply-feeling creature, who represents, quite unadulterated, the feminine nature, the same infinite certainty as her love. Thus do both sides stand opposed to each other, in their whole unbroken strength of absolute certainty. The act of the moral consciousness is renunciation, an unalterable resolution, which also appears as a revelation exalted above all reflection, from which, moreover, nothing can be extorted; the act of the natural force of the feelings, is the destruction of the earthly vessel, which was too weak for what was planted in it, and was burst by the developed power of the growth. There is not a more tragical pain than that which is produced out of such elements of absolute opposition. But even here—and this first completely justifies the predicate—the victory of the moral substance breaks forth, in the power of which over the consciousness of the individual, death first had its absolute power and truth.

From the region in which the opposites move, it necessarily follows that a woman must be the heroine of our work of art, and that in her, both the tragedy of a great, nay, monstrous fate, and the victory of the moral idea, is manifested in the highest poetical fulness and purity.*

In the three moments, which we have thus pointed out, independently of the work of art, is organically completed the circle of the positions and conflicts of which this substance is capable. One either stands on the step of the dissolving† understanding, and, therefore, external to, or rather beneath all collision, in this region; or one regains peace within the struggle, by means of moral freedom, and thus seeks to secure oneself from the guilt which is already comprised in the very struggle; or, lastly, one is ruined by this contradiction to the natural force of feeling, because one can neither throw off the power of the moral idea, nor render oneself independent of one's feelings. The Count and the Baroness, the Captain and Charlotte, Edward and Ottilia,‡ are the bearers of these completely developed elements.

It is obvious, from what has been said, that those figures which are not placed in such relations and conflicts, with respect to the moral idea of marriage, important as their individuality may otherwise be, can only occupy the second rank in the work of art. But, independent as they may at first sight appear of this kernel of the whole, we must not look upon them as only an external ornament, or as a mere lever for the development, but they must be attracted by the substance of the kernel itself, and kept in tension by its power. They must, therefore, through their individuality, awaken an intuition (or view), which unveils a moral relation to the idea of the work. We will endeavour to find this.

It will not be denied, that our mind, when it has once taken a determined direction, when it has once lived itself into a particular region, brings everything into a relation, into some private connection with that region. Thus, with respect to a work of art, which conjures us into the circle of marriage, and its collisions, we ask involuntarily, what sort of keeping (haltering) would these forms, which stand externally to these positions, develope, if placed in them?—what solution should we have to expect from them? More closely considered, the question might change itself into this:—"Why are these forms brought by the poet into no position, in which their strength or their weakness—in short, their whole individuality might be manifested? Does it not lie in their very nature not to be so placed, because, as they are organized, this species of collision is and must remain to them a foreign element?"

* Solger, too, in his remarks of the "Affinities," recognizes Ottilia as the chief person of the whole, by saying, "She is, at the same time, the true child, and the sacrifice of nature. With these two words is expressed everything good and great that can be said of woman. And how infinite and inexhaustible is this! A woman must necessarily be the chief person." To ground the necessity of this claim did not lie in Solger's plan.—Dr. Röscher's Note.

† That is to say, dissolving the tie recognized as absolute by the moral consciousness.

‡ This classification of the three pairs, so as to make them represent the three possible collisions of marriage, is a masterly display of acuteness. The first pair, though they are comparatively minor personages in the romance, are important personages of a contented state of immorality, while Charlotte and the Captain represent the triumph of morality over passion, and Ottilia and Edward, the destruction of the individuals in the struggle between the two.—Translator.

But what individualities will represent to us a nature standing external to such collisions? Since the woman's element is feeling, so on the depth of feeling, of which she is capable, will also depend the importance and force of the collision into which she can fall. The more her essential being is directed to mere outward show, the more she is charmed by momentary gratification, by the brilliancy of variety; the more she is cast into a varying worldly course, so much the less will be the capability of depth. Whoever appears to us engaged in a pursuit so worldly, so calculated for the attainment of transient triumphs, so rioting in an abundance of vain homages, such a person may display many a brilliant trait of goodness of heart, perform many noble deeds in the excitement of the moment; but we shall scarcely believe that a deep feeling and inclination will permanently take possession of the whole heart, and plunge it for a length of time into sorrow and joy—into pain and delight. In this luxurious flower-growth, which, on its level ground, is so pleasing to the eye, no precipices and volcanic eruptions are opened. A female individuality, like the one described, therefore, just as decidedly rejects the representation of a state of mind shattered by struggling feelings, as, from its very nature, it presents itself as the (opposite) pole to a pure internal personality, visited by the force of a tragic fate.†

A man creates for himself a sphere of activity which lies beyond the feelings. The more cultivated he is, the more he is satisfied with an exalted calling, which fills his inmost nature, so much the further is he removed beyond the natural force of the feelings, so much the more decidedly does he give us the picture of an individuality, which is sound, and through its own self-conscious activity, at harmony with itself, and in which nature and spirit (or mind) have placed themselves in beautiful equilibrium. Such an individuality is eminently a plastic one, which, free from the billows of passionate feeling and heart-storms, rather, by a happy organization, transforms the impressions from men and things into advancing elements of life.

But here, also, in spite of the common foundation, a distinction can arise. The individual, namely, with a moral earnestness, with a thoroughly cultivated aptitude for his calling, with a circumspect understanding,—qualities which give him a worthy tone, and secure his heart from the natural force of feelings, and their collisions with moral power,—with all this, we say, he can lack that mild fire which first gives an ideal life to all these sides, he can be far removed from that grace of the heart, by which is first dissolved any appearance of a certain prosaic insipidity and pedantic stiffness, from which (grace), in a word, beautiful plastic individuality is first produced. Much, therefore, as such a form offers to us the spectacle of a personality exalted above the collisions between the feelings and morality, it nevertheless, from the want of ideality, does not elevate us into the region of contented existence in which there is not a breath of prosaic or insipid sense.

In the truly plastic form, on the other hand, the moral mode of thought, the animation for a noble calling has come to beautiful equilibrium with the warmth of feeling, so that at the sight of it, we feel just as much satisfied, and carried away beyond the storms of passion, as we also feel at the same time streamed through by a mild fire, which gives us the beneficial certainty, that on this ground of the heart also, the feelings can deeply cast their anchor. Here dwells that security which the moral cultivation preserves, united to the secret satisfaction at the internal fire, which, according to its integrity, can strike out at every moment, but is controlled by another invisible force, without being held down with exertion.

† Let us anticipate Dr. Röscher's statement that this paragraph refers to Charlotte's daughter, Luciana.

For in the amiable individuality this very union of senses and mind has become, as it were, an immediate natural determination, in which man moves with equal freedom and grace. But certainly no calling, no activity will be more favourable to the cultivation we have sketched than that of the artist; for in it lies especially the uninterrupted elevation and transfiguration of the natural and the sensual, which now even in the individual is, as it were, called to become the virtuosity of the character,—a plastic individuality.

Here also a trilogy of forms has presented itself, the common union of which we recognised in that view produced by them, that, by their organisation, they are beyond the developed conflict; either from want of depth, and because the soul has quite lost itself in the surface beneath it, or by its moral weight and grace has raised itself above it. The bearers of these thoughts are Luciana, the school-assistant, and the architect. In observing this trilogy, it lies near our purpose also to recognise their corresponding relation to the groups already developed by us. Luciana corresponds to the first sphere of the Count and Baron, who are removed from the collision through the stand-point of the frivolous and decomposing understanding; the assistant to the second group, Charlotte and the captain, who, through their moral freedom free themselves from the guilt to recover themselves again—finally, the architect to the tragic group, Edward and Ottilia. The prosaic element in the individuality of the assistant naturally places him in this comparison, on the side of less poetical depth and fullness; and of that more prosaic solution which is presented in the fate of Charlotte and the captain; while the plastic and poetical figure of the architect finds its necessary counterpart in the third group, and more especially in that of Ottilia, who falls a victim to the violent force of her own beautiful individuality.*

We have, by our own statement, recognised, and brought to consciousness, the members of a perfect life. Scarcely could another new chord be struck in this sphere, the tones of which would lack harmony. But completely as all the positions and thought-relations of this moral substance are manifested, the thinking mind might still look round for an element which, in these collisions and oppositions of feeling, should enter pacifying and mediating. The individualities at last revealed indeed free the sight, and deliver the soul from the pain, which the destiny of the individuality forces upon it, but it does not lie in their nature to penetrate into the mysteries of this heart-world, and there to wish to settle themselves. The more ideal the personality, the more removed is it from the design of wishing to make that good or level, which man can perform only in himself and through himself. It is therefore obvious, that such an attempt to stalk along, and pacify by a mediating word, does not settle the conflict. The deeper the seat of the malady, so much the more inaccessible is it to an external cure. The word never overcomes the strife of a wounded heart—this is a region into which it does not penetrate, from which, on the contrary, it dully reverberates. The passions unfold themselves, as it were deriding the appeasing word, which ventures down these precipices. Only the storm of destiny plucks out the roots, while the light and mild breezes of speeches rustle round the tree, without penetrating into its birth-place. But the word, which ventures on the attempt to soothe matters, because it would honestly effect a reconciliation everywhere, has really no thorough knowledge of the enemy with whom it has to deal. Hence it always experiences anew the impotence of its weapons. If these weapons were all to help—if, in general, the sensible, well-meant word of another, were all to afford assistance to the torture of heart, it would not indeed stand in need of this foreign ally; the workshop for this armoury, the man, has just as much in himself as he has also experienced the inequality of this contest. But the importance of the advice increases with the depth of the heart and the intensity of the feeling. Both stand in an inverse ratio to each other—the growth of the last conditions, at the same time the ineffectiveness of the first. The busy attempt of the man to press into the most private paths of human feeling, to disentangle the tenderest knots which has formed themselves unobserved in the moral relation of marriage, ends for us with the certainty that a vain endeavour is made that the cure is only to be left to the heart itself, and that the day of fate can thereby be neither pushed back nor hastened.

* Solger also suspected something of the sort with respect to the significance of the architect, since he says of him:—"I cannot help internally laughing, when it is said of him, how would he shew himself if he came into this or that situation? But he does not come into it, and that properly belongs to him. Therefore, this quiet internal greatness of a youthful hero, is something very bright, even through the fact that it is not tested by circumstances. Only he does not elude the test by voluntary limitation, but by his nature." In this, indeed, there is recognised neither his true relation to the whole, nor his position with respect to the others. —Dr. Röscher's Note.

In a work which descends into the depth of a heart-world, and describes the contest which is kindled from the opposition of the immediate and moral feelings, the manifestation of the insufficiency of the eloquent and sensible word cannot be wanting. The incongruity of these elements must exhibit itself as an opposition of two organs entirely different from each other.

But the word and the advice address themselves to the thinking consciousness. They therefore presuppose an insight into the essence of the positions and of the substance in which they move themselves for the purpose of soothing. Only to this figure therefore belongs the expression of the absolute significance of the moral worth of marriage, in which it lifts itself up, like the antique chorus, to the intuition of the total idea, but is also like it in this, that it is just as little able to keep off the pathos of the individuals in its crushing power. Therefore in Mittler the idea of the whole first gains its internal completion; this word, which still belongs to the prosaic kingdom of reflection, becomes flesh through the creative genius in its artistical self-development, and thus first gains the highest truth, for by it the word first produces its energetic reality—the mind forms for itself its transparent organic body.

The words of Mittler: "marriage is the beginning and summit of all civilization. It makes the savage gentle, and the most cultivated man has no better means for the display of his gentleness. It must be indissoluble; for it brings so much happiness that no single case of unhappiness must be allowed to weigh against it. For separation there can be no sufficient reason. The position of man, both in joy and sorrow, is so high, that it is impossible to calculate what a married pair owe to each other. It is an infinite debt which can only be discharged by eternity." These words are the gospel of marriage; the work of art is the world of actuality, which has fougued and proved this by its truth and depth.

The first part of our problem is solved. The choice of the subject-matter, its relation to reality, its world-historical importance, are brought into consciousness—the idea of which is comprehended in the element of the thought, its moments are unveiled. But the life organized in the bosom of the unsensual eternal thought must also detach itself from its base, and gain external existence, and by this the evidence of its life. The logos of the world of thought has therefore—so to speak—to transform itself into nature and concrete life. The living intuition of the hitherto only abstractly designated characters, the comprehension of their concrete individuality and the understanding of the composition of the whole are the movements in which the knowledge of the work is first completed as it were, returns into its beginning.

SONNET.

No. XLI.

The One that searcheth hearts!—only that One,
Who knows my sufferings, intense and long,—
Who knows how cares have press'd me in a throng,—
Can rightly judge the act which I have done.
I can stand up before the judgment-throne
Of God—and though all men may deem me wrong—
Can dare affirm, with resolution strong,
My course was right—aye, and that course alone.
Sweetest! for thee these words no meaning have;
The thing which they express thou knowest not.
Enough!—I have done all to set thee free
From ev'ry foe—e'en from myself—to save
Enquire not how;—but be it ne'er forgot,
That all which I have done, was done for thee.—N. D.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ON Saturday, La Sonnambula was repeated, in presence of Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the usual crowd. Madlle. Lind received, at the end of both acts, the stereotyped "ovations" to which, no doubt, by this time she must have become pretty well blasée. However, she was in excellent voice, and deserved it all, and twice over. Cerito being indisposed, Les Elemens was postponed, and a tableau from La Esmeralda was danced by Carlotta Grisi and Perrot, with some selections from Thea, by Rosati, Petit Stephan, and D'Or.

On Tuesday, Verdi's I Lombardi was produced, with an important alteration from the cast of 1846. Castellani and Gardoni replaced Grisi and Mario, while Coletti assumed the part originally played by Fornasari. As a matter of history, it may be as well to give the story of this opera, which lies before us in the pages of the authorised programme, nightly distributed in the pit and boxes.

"Two gentlemen of Milan, brothers, named Pagano and Arvino, are attached to the fair Viciinda, but her heart is Arvino's, whom she espouses. Maddened by jealousy, Pagano stabs his brother in the cathedral of Ambroise, but only wounds him. He then flies his country, and becomes a chief of a band of robbers. A long period has elapsed; Giselda, the child of Arvino and Viciinda, has grown up, and Pagano returns to his country, to solicit from his brother a pardon, which is granted him in that very cathedral in which he formerly stabbed him. The evil passions of Pagano are aroused, and by the aid of Pirro, a bandit chief, he makes an unsuccessful attempt to carry off Viciinda, and assassinate his brother. But, in the confusion occasioned by a conflagration kindled by his own hand, he kills his father, and, after this fresh crime, disappears. A great crusade is preparing to redeem the Holy Land from the infidels. Arvino sets forth at the head of the Knights of Lombardy, followed by his daughter, Giselda, whose mother is dead. She is carried off by a band of Saracens, and conducted to the palace of the king, Accianus, at Antioch. The king's son, Oronte, falls in love with her, and she returns his affection. The city is governed by Pirro, who has become a renegade, but, stung by remorse, he seeks a Christian hermit, and confesses his crimes and repentance. The hermit promises him absolution, on condition that he introduces the Crusaders into the city. To this he consents; Antioch is taken, Accianus slain, and Oronte wounded, and Arvino finds his daughter lamenting the loss of her lover. But Oronte is not dead; he flies to Jerusalem, and is concealed in a cavern. The Crusaders, led by the hermit, appear to besiege the city, whilst Giselda discovers her lover, and is about to fly with him, when Arvino arrives. Oronte is mortally wounded, and dies in his mother's arms, after abjuring his faith. Giselda mourns over him, but is consoled by a divine vision, representing Oronte in Paradise surrounded by angels and saints. Jerusalem is captured. The hermit, who has performed prodigies of valour, and saved the life of Arvino, is himself mortally hurt. This hermit is Pagano, who, before he expires, obtains forgiveness from his brother."

There is very little interest in the plot, and the manner in which it is conducted by the poet has not helped to throw light on its obscurity. In respect to the music, with every wish to be lenient to Signor Verdi, whom we have been frequently taxed with underrating, we positively can discover nothing in it worthy of criticism. There is a pretty air for the tenor, "Ah! mia letizia," which Gardoni, who was in fine voice, sang with exquisite taste, receiving an encore; but even this is spoiled by the vulgarity of the cabaletta. A great fuss is made about the "Eastern" character of some of the incidental melodramatic pieces in I Lombardi, to which we can only reply, that if such be the style that obtains in the Orient, it merits even a worse reputation in musical matters than it enjoys—and that is barely possible. But we are thoroughly satiated with Verdi, and are not disposed to waste more words upon him, until it shall be our duty to analyse his new opera, I Masnadieri, which is now in rehearsal at Her Majesty's Theatre, which duty we shall endeavour to fulfil as conscientiously as lies in the power of human fallibility. Those who desire to know more about the music of I Lom- burdi, we refer to The Daily News, which has recently come out rather strongly in re Verdi.

Much more agreeable is our task when we come to speak of the artists who endeavoured to instil something like vitality into this caput mortuum. To compare Castellan with Grisi would be unfair, and we are too entirely the well-wishers of the modest and amiable artist to serve her so unhandsomely. But Castellan has qualities of her own, which will serve her well enough without the aid of extravagant comparisons. She has a lovely voice, an earnest manner, a graceful delivery, and a large share of vocal art. With these she did all that lay in her power to lift the dull muse of Giuseppe Verdi out of the mire of mediocrity and that she failed to effect it must be laid to the heaviness of the muse, and not to want of zeal and talent on her part. What Grisi can do, with her wonderful power of electrifying masses by a single word or look, Castellan, with her gentle quiet bearing, has not the means of compassing. But the charming artist deserves praise for her perseverance, even in a cause so unworthy of it, and this we accord her avec empressement.

Gardoni was lucky in having music to sing something less unendurable, and consequently his success was greater. We have not heard this graceful artist sing with more judgment and effect since his first appearance in La Favorita, when he made so great a sensation. Gardoni is evidently not satisfied with his statu quo, favourable as that may be. To use a happy expression of the Chronicle, "he has hoisted the standard of progress,"—and to add a happier figure of our own, "he is determined to go-a-head." Moreover, as an actor, Gardoni makes daily and visible advance, and we have very little doubt that he will eventually turn out one of the most brilliant ornaments of the lyric stage.

Coletti, in the part of Pagano, was an immense improvement on Fornasari in the vocal requisites, although his acting may have lacked a shade of the energy which was the distinguishing characteristic of his predecessor's talent. For power and quality of voice this young baritone has no superior, and there is a certain earnest manliness in his deportment, which united to a great degree of sensibility in his acting, carries with it an irresistible charm. Coletti is certainly one of the most valuable of the recent acquisitions of the establishment. Bouché was excellent in the small part of Pirro, and the still smaller parts of Arvino and Viclinda were extremely well sustained by Signor Correlli and Mad. Solari. A word in praise of the invariable efficiency of Mad. Solari in whatever falls to her lot, may fairly be added here. Although of secondary importance, the careful artist in these subordinate departments of the lyric stage is highly essential.

Balfe is deserving of unqualified praise for the style in which he conducted the orchestra, which was spirited, intelligent, clear, and decided. The oftener we find occasion to reflect on the position of our gifted countryman in Her Majesty's Theatre, the more do we feel disposed to congratulate Mr. Lumley on the possession of so zealous and admirable an officer. Since the opening of the season Balfe's duties have been arduous and unremitting, but his determination to uphold the credit of the establishment to which he belongs, has helped him over all his difficulties, and he has come out from the ordeal with credit to himself and benefit to his employer. It is pretty nearly certain that without Balfe the artistic business of the theatre could not possibly have been carried on this season. Can we then, who wish well to the establishment, be too earnest or too frequent in praising him for what he has already done, and urging him to go on and still further prosper. The European name which Balfe has deservedly won by his numerous dramatic compositions confers lustre on any establishment with which he may be connected, while his industry and devotion to the cause which he has made his own, if they cannot add to his great musical reputation, double, nay quadruple his value in the honourable and distinguished post he has now so worthily filled for two long and perplexing seasons.

The performances concluded with Perrot's Les Elemens, which excited the usual furore. Rosati was encored in her pas, and Carlotta Grisi, who danced more exquisitely than we have known even her incomparable self to dance, created an enthusiasm almost unparalleled in the annals of this greatest of choregraphic establishments. The encore accorded to Carlotta, which she long hesitated to accept from a most worthy and comrade-like motive (which Rosati overlooked, and which will be explained immediately) but at last was forced to accede to, was something "Lindish," if not altogether unprecedented. Poor Cerito, who regardless of her yet uncured foot (which she hurt on the previous Thursday) danced with all her wonted spirit and grace, was also encored in her pas, and though her accident was very generally published, and the pain she suffered was evident to all observers, the brutal public, disregarding her imploring looks and supplicating gestures, insisted on its being repeated; the result of which was that she was compelled to retire before the end of the divertissement, leaving the resolution of the elemental problem to Fire, Water, and Earth—Carlotta, Rosati, and the four principal coryphées, Cassan, Thevenot, James, and Honoré. It was the knowledge of this that made the kindly Carlotta backward to accept the encore which Rosati responded to (perhaps involuntarily—we are too glad to find a verdict in favor of so charming an artist) so readily. Carlotta knew that Cerito could not, without pain, go through her difficult pas twice in succession, and, sister-like, she was loth to glorify herself at the expense of her suffering comrade. It is this amiable and unjealous disposition that adds three-fold lustre to the incomparable talent of Carlotta Grisi, and makes her personally liked as much as she is artistically worshipped.

Nothing remains to say, but that Roberto il Diavolo was repeated on Thursday, with Mdle. Lind as Alice, one of her best characters; that Les Elemens followed; and that the house was crowded to the ceiling.

Taglioni has arrived—Marie Taglioni, the great star, not Marie Taglioni, the little angel—and now Perrot will doubtless set his inventive genius to work upon a Pas de Cinq, for Taglioni, Carlotta, Cerito, Rosati, and Grahn, the like of which shall have never been seen, and will probably never be seen again. Va Perrot!—do your best—and if possible outshine yourself. D.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE managers of the Royal Italian Opera appear to us to have the same idea of prime donne, as regards the required number at a theatre, as Figaro, in the Barbier de Seville has of love; "En fait d'amour, trop, même n'est pas assez." and which they might justly paraphrase into; "Respecting prime donne, even too many are not sufficient for such a house as ours." In the same theatre with Grisi, Persiani, Alboni, Corbari, and Madame Ronconi, we were present last Saturday evening at the début of a new prima donna, in the person of Mademoiselle Steffanoni, who made her first appearance in this country, and was heralded by a great continental reputation. For what purpose the management engaged her with their present unprecedented strength of soprani we have not mental scope to fathom: it is certain she was engaged from the commencement of the season, and we suppose they had no opportunity to bring her forward before Saturday. This is feasible, in as much as the Royal Italian Opera programme numbered Mdle. Steffanoni's among its promised débutantes; and assured the directors, up to the present moment, have been rigidly adherent to the expectations held out. It was no small risk on the part of the new company, after Grisi's repeated triumphs and Alboni's immense success, to put forward another candidate for further approval, and expect another ovation. But the management felt they submitted themselves to no terrible ordeal by testing the new prima donna before their audience, and the result proved their judgment correct, for Mdle. Steffanoni achieved one of the most brilliant of their numerous successes of the season. Verdi's tragic opera of Ernani was produced especially for the début of the fair cantatrice, the part of Elvira being one in which she had won the highest repute in several continental theatres. Mdle. Steffanoni's voice is a pure soprano of the most brilliant quality, combining sweetness and power in the upper register, but like most voices of the class, possessing no extraordinary power in the lower tones. To this splendid organ the singer unites the most irreproachable taste and consummate art. Her method of vocalization is entirely original, her broderies exhibiting with a perfect mastery over the voice the most surprising difficulties. Her sustained trillo is quite astonishing, and might vie even with Grisi's, while her intonation is almost faultless. Before alluding further to the new prima donna we deem it necessary to say a few words concerning the production of Ernani at the Royal Italian Opera on Saturday. The cast of characters, as usual in all performances at this theatre, was as efficient as it could possibly be. It was as follows:—

Ernani,	•	•	•	SIGNOR SALVI.
Don Carlos,	•	•	•	MADemoiselle ALBONI.
Don Ruy Gomez de Silva,	•	•	•	SIGNOR MARINI.
Don Riccardo,	•	•	•	SIGNOR PIACENTINI.
Jago,	•	•	•	SIGNOR POLONINI.
Elvira,	•	•	•	MDLE. STEFFANONI.
Giovanna,	•	•	•	MADAME BELLINI.

We were much surprised at perceiving Alboni cast for a barytone part, and could not refrain from surmising that the extraordinary capabilities of the great artiste would be somewhat unwisely tested by giving her a part written entirely for a man. But, however much there might have been lost in this curious transposition of parts, Alboni's exquisite singing, and her excellent acting, made the auditors feel too delighted to discern any difference, or find any fault in the substitution. The music of Ernani pleases us less than any opera we have heard from the pen of Verdi. None of the situations betray a glimpse of dramatic power. The finale to the first act requires but a little less musical depth, and a more thorough non-comprehension of orchestral effects, to render it quite contemptible. The unisons, are as lavishly made use of as usual in the composer's score and Verdi's poverty is as conspicuous in the music of Ernani, as in any opera of his we have heard. The same mawkishness, the same ultra-sentimentality, the same inanity of melody, or tune prevails throughout. We might, perhaps, allow some melodic merit to Elvira's scena, "Ernani, involami," which has a Pacinish flavour in it, but further concession we could not conscientiously make. The performance of the opera from beginning to end was magnificent, and created an absolute furor. The chorus, which appears to us to get better every night, was splendid in the opening Bacchanalian song, "Allegri! beviamo." Ernani's andante—

"Come rugiada al cespite," was beautifully vocalised by Signor Salvi; but the composition is unworthy the efforts of the great artist. After the first scene, Mademoiselle Steffanoni made her appearance, and was welcomed with repeated rounds of applause. The fair débutante is most prepossessing in looks and manners, and won the audience at the first glance. In form she inclines to the embonpoint. Her face, without being remarkably handsome, is exceedingly expressive, and her whole deportment is characterised by grace and ease. Her opening recitative—set the mind at once at rest as to her vocal capabilities. It was in reality a splendid display of artistic singing. Mdle. Steffanoni executed some cadenzas, which exhibited the brilliancy of her voice and the purity and novelty of her style in such a manner as to draw down a loud and long continued cheer. The cavatina was still more splendid and obtained for the cantatrice a unanimous re-call. The triumph of the singer was now complete. In the first finale she came out with great power, her voice being heard distinctly above the immense chorus. Her acting also was very expressive and good. In her scene with Don Carlos, when she snatches the dagger from his side and threatens to kill him, she displayed considerable energy, as she did also in the subsequent scene when Ernani enters, and deadly defiance passes between him and the king. She gave the passage commencing—with immense fire and abandonment. We are, however, compelled to admit that her want of power in the lower register of her voice is somewhat inimical to the interpretation of the strongest passion, and that, though she appears to have intellect equal to the highest efforts, this want must, to a certain extent, militate against her attempts in the loftiest school of tragic acting. We need not remind our readers that all the grand artistes in the tragic line were, or are, endowed with great power in the middle voice, such as Pasta, Malibran, Grisi, and Pauline Garcia; and, indeed, without this power it appears to us that the artistes, however otherwise splendidly favoured with the gifts of nature, are but performing the task of other Sisyphuses, when they essay the lordliest school of passion. Mdle. Steffanoni's voice is a soprano sfogato, the very nature of which precludes, in general, the embodiment of tragic power in its grandest aim. In a few instances, and a few only we must say, this deficiency warred against the efforts of the splendid artiste; but, with these few exceptions, which justice wrings from us, we are bound to aver, that Mdle. Steffanoni's performance and singing throughout were really splendid. We are inclined to think that other characters, which do not involve the interpretation of violent feelings, will be found to suit better the capabilities of the singer. But of this we shall have opportunities enough to judge anon. After the first act, a general call was made for Steffanoni, and all the artistes appeared, when bouquets were thrown on the stage in profusion, and after their departure the audience would not be satisfied till they had them on a second time. We cannot omit noticing the singing of Marjaj in this act. We had no idea before of the great vocal powers of this artist. His scene with Ernani and chorus was exceedingly fine, and he gave the scena— with immense fire and power, though his acting certainly lacked refinement. Salvi's acting and singing was admirable. Nor can we pass over the exquisite feeling and beauty Alboni infused into the aria andante—

"Forta è la notte, e Silva non retorna!"

"No, crudeli, d'amor non m'e pegno"

"Infelice! e tu credi!"

"Da quel dì che t'ho veduta," in which she obtained a rapturous encore.

Act the second opens with a simple and pretty chorus, excellently sung. We cannot specify all the morceaux of this act. The duet for Elvira and Ernani, involving much pathetic singing and some fine acting, was splendidly given by Salvi and Steffanoni. The ensemble—

"Ah! morri potess adesso!"

was exquisitely vocalised by the two artistes, albeit the composition itself belongs to the genus bombastic. The trio following—

"Invite invoco or io da te," was finely rendered by Salvi, Marini, and Steffanoni. There is much bustle and some good dramatic situations towards the end of this act, but the music is all moonshine behind a cloud, and the duo finale is worse than nonsense.

Act the third takes place in the Catacombs of Acquisgrana. The conspirators assemble and doom the King to death. The King is pre-advised of the treason and lays plans to receive the traitors. At a signal they are surrounded by the royal troops: Don Carlos enters and the conspirators await their doom. Elvira entreats for them, the King is moved to compassion, pardons his would-be-butchers, and hands over Elvira to Ernani. We remember little of the music of this act with gratification. Alboni has a second andante, which she gave far better than the composition merited, receiving another encore, and Mdle. Steffanoni, in the appeal to Don Carlos—exhibited the tenderness and expression of her style which won her more admirers than any previous effort of the evening. A noisy, but somewhat dramatic chorus concludes the act, the singers being again called for with enthusiasm. It might naturally be supposed that the opera would end here, all the persons of the drama being made happy by the gracious pardon of his majesty Charles the Fifth. But no—there is a strange and unlooked-for dénouement. Don Silva is a rare melo-dramatic personage. He is an odd compound of love, old age, hospitality, patriotism, and cruelty. He is enraged at Ernani, a proscribed bandit, aiming at the hand of Elvira, his intended bride, and still more enraged that Elvira should return the robber's love. He persuades Elvira that Ernani is dead and she consents to wed him. Ernani returns alive just as the nuptials are about to be celebrated. The King surrounds the castle of Don Silva at the same moment, having followed close on the heels of Ernani. Silva, though furious, is on hospitable thoughts intent, and will not betray Ernani. Ernani is concealed in a hiding-place and, on the departure of the King, he is released, but Don Silva will not be satisfied until Ernani fights a duel with him. Ernani refuses, stating that he cannot die easy until he joins Silva in his plots against the King's life, and has some hand in his death. He gives his horn to Silva and swears, when he blows upon it thrice, he will kill himself, no matter what may be the time, or place. Don Silva accepts the compromise. It is upon this strange bond that the tragedy of the opera depends. In the last act the scene opens with the bridal festivities of Ernani and Elvira. The wedded pair, just newly twin'd, are breathing their honey vows of affection; but, oh, and alas! the fiend demon is at hand. Ernani hears the fatal horn that dooms him to bid farewell to love and the world; Silva enters and sternly demands the fulfilment of his lethal bond; Elvira pleads, but tears silver-shedded, and lily cheeks and white hands uplifted, and melting tones that might move a forest, are alike unavailable. The fiend demands his prey—and Ernani, true to his oath, stabs himself and dies, Elvira fainting on his body. The act involves some dramatic situations, which afforded fine scope to display the powers of the artists. But the music is unequal to the situations, and were it not for the admirable acting of Salvi, Marini, and Steffanoni, would pass by us as the idle winds which we respect not. Steffanoni's appeal to Silva was extremely beautiful and her acting, throughout, designated by intensity and much feeling. Her bewilderment, when she finds that all hope is lost, was finely portrayed, and her agony, when she sees Ernani dying, was deliciously natural. Salvi's death was managed with consummate art, and the doggedness of Marini was finely contrasted with the despair of the unfortunate lovers. All the artistes were twice summoned, vociferously, at the fall of the curtain, and bouquets were again showered on the stage in honour of the fair debutante. Thus concluded another proud night for the management of the Royal Italian Opera: but the triumph of the night did not end with Steffanoni. Another debutante had yet to brave the critical inspection of the audience, in the person of the charming danseuse, Mdle. Plunkett, who made her first appearance in London for three seasons. But we must devote a separate paragraph to the fair daughter of Terpsichore.

Our readers must be aware that some few seasons since Mdle. Plunkett figured as a seconde danseuse at Her Majesty's Theatre. She was then very young, and had hardly completed her noviciate in the profession. Subsequently, a year later, we believe, Mdle. Plunkett appeared at Drury Lane as premiere danseuse, having, in the mean time, studied hard and made wonderful progress. She was in immense favour at Drury Lane. She was next engaged as premiere danseuse at the Academie Royale of Paris, where, for the last few years, she has been considered, after Carlotta Grisi, their best terpsichorean artiste. Mdle. Plunkett has, consequently, come to London a very different artiste from what she was when she was here last. The new divertissement, in which she appeared on Saturday evening, is little more than a succession of dances introduced into a brilliant bal masqué given in a grand saloon. The entrée of Mdle. Plunkett was the signal for a cheering burst of applause from the whole house; and we could not forbear from cogitating on the causes that led the visitors of the Royal Italian Opera to receive the fair danseuse with tenfold the enthusiasm they did Fanny Elssler on her first appearance. What a sphinx a theatrical audience is! In her first pas it was evident that Mdle. Plunkett was a close follower in the steps of Fanny Elssler and Carlotta Grisi. Some of her twinkling steps were really worthy the great originator herself, while her sylph-like bounds and graceful poses proved her the best disciple of the charming Carlotta. Mdle. Plunkett obtained immense applause in her preliminary essay. In the pas de deux with Mabile, her art was more completely exhibited, and her dancing was extremely brilliant and elegant. Her evolutions and tours de force were performed with a facility and accuracy that could not be surpassed, while her attitudes were highly graceful and striking. In this pas she reminded us forcibly of the inimitable Carlotta, in whose school, we were more assured than before, she had grounded her style. The applause consequent on this splendid effort, was most enthusiastic. In the L'Andalusia, a version of the cachoucha, she displayed her talents in the Elsslerian school, and danced with immense effect. In this pas, which exhibits to perfection the graces and attitudes of a danseuse, she was, perhaps, more striking than in any previous effort. Her poses were extremely beautiful and commanding, while the mechanism of her steps were the admiration of every beholder. The L'Andalusia was the great triumph of the night for Mdle. Plunkett. A more successful first appearance could not be witnessed, and the managers have to congratulate themselves in obtaining the services of a most elegant and accomplished artiste. It is not necessary to allude to the remaining dancers of the entertainment. We must not, however, omit mentioning our favourite Baderna, who performed two pas, La Bayonnaise, and La Viletta, in her customary neat and finishe! style.

The success of Mdle. Steffanoni caused the proprietors to announce Ernani for Tuesday evening; but Salvi being taken suddenly ill, the Barbiere was substituted, Mario taking the Count's part, and we lost the opportunity of hearing the fair debutante in her second essay. Mario's performance of Count Almaviva was as capital as ever and his singing beautiful exceedingly. He was welcomed back to his old part with enthusiasm. On Thursday Anna Bolena was produced (first time) for Grisi's benefit. The cast embraced, Tamburini in Henry the Eighth; Mario in Percy; Tagliafico in Rochfort; Alboni in Smeaton; Corbari in Jane Seymour; and Grisi in Anna. As we have not space in our columns this week to give the lengthened account we intend of the performance of Anna Bolena, we have extracted two notices from the morning journals, which coincide as closely as possible with our own opinions. The learned critic in the Daily News thus alludes to the performance:—

"Anna Bolena was performed at Covent Garden last evening, for the first time, at that theatre. The performance was for the benefit of Grisi, and the fair prima donna probably never achieved a grater triumph. The opera is certainly Donizetti's chef d'œuvre; and the English queen is one of the characters in which Grisi's genius shines with the greatest lustre. Familiar as her representation of it is to the public, the audience, last evening, seemed to regard it almost as a novelty; their bursts of vehement applause appearing to express surprise as well as pleasure at its splendour. It was, from beginning to end, a wonderful exhibition of vocal power, but its musical excellencies were made subservient to its truth, energy, and pathos, as a dramatic representation. In the great scene which closes the first act, her exclamation, 'Guidici!—ad Anna!' was worthy of a Siddons; and her dying accents, in the final air, 'Cielo, a miei lungi spasimi,' were inexpressibly sweet and mournful. Her reception throughout the evening was enthusiastic. When she first appeared she was loudly welcomed; she was called for at the end of the first act; and at the end of the opera, after she had appeared before the curtain along with the other principal performers, she was again called for, the audience not being satisfied till she had presented herself twice, to receive showers of bouquets and wreaths from the boxes, and cheers and acclamations from every part of the house. Madame Grisi well deserves such a reception, not only from her transcendent powers, but from her strenuous and never-failing exertions in the discharge of her duty to the public. Tamburini's performance of King Henry was not inferior to that of Lablache; in aspect, costume, and action, he was a perfect picture of the terrible monarch; and his fine voice and energy of expression gave immense effect to the music of his part. Mdle. Alboni was Smeaton, a part quite fitted for her, and which she performed beautifully. She looked the youthful page to admiration, and her singing was delicious. In the romance, which Smeaton sings by the queen's command, in the first scene, her charming contralto tones, and exquisitely smooth and graceful execution, had such an effect that the air was encored with acclamations, and almost encored a second time. Mdle. Corbari was the best representative of Jane Seymour that we have seen; her action was natural and intelligent, and she sang with elegance and sweetness. We cannot omit to notice the singular beauty of the scenery, and the richness and magnificence of the manner in which this opera has been put upon the stage. As much care was bestowed in this respect as if it had been the first production of a new opera. The theatre was crowded in every part."

We take leave respectfully to correct the critic in two instances. Grisi was called for twice after the first act; and three times at the end. The accomplished writer in the Morning Herald is no less enthusiastic in his remarks:—

"Last night, Grisi appeared in her famous part of Anna Bolena. This opera, one of the best of Donizetti's, was highly popular in the days of Pasta, who first gave it importance by the tragic grandeur of her acting. The celebrity of this great artiste in it has, however, been thrown into shadow by the genius of Grisi, whose execution of the heroine has long been one of her most remarkable chefs d'œuvre. It is, in short, a part in which, as in other cases, she is not likely to meet with rivalry, for no singer of the day equals her in the demonstrations of insulted pride and resentful passion, like those which here abound. She again gave vitality to many ineffaceable remembrances. Her collision with the King in the finale to the first act, when frenzied by his jealous imputations, she now beseeches his forbearance, and now impetuously proclaims her innocence, were the fine strokes of histrionic power they ever were. The scene, too, in which she learns from Jane Seymour the cruel intentions of the monarch, with its bursts of surprise, wounded feeling, and angry apostrophe, is another of the deeply-coloured pictures of womanly irritation, unrivalled in its developments of affronted bitterness, not unmingled with the graces of pity, which Grisi alone can paint. Nor is the whole of the dénouement less entitled to the admiration it meets with, although bereft of those exhausting expositions of indignation, to which the miseries of utter and overwhelming hopelessness present so strong a contrast. In all these situations, Grisi exhibited the force of olden times, and filled up the dramatic outline with a breadth surpassed upon no former occasion; while her singing was an unbroken flood of masterly and brilliant vocalism—the cavatina, 'Dolce guidami,' in the last scene, being, as usual, the most fascinating of her solos. She was called for twice after each act, and absorbed all the bouquets that were thrown upon the stage. Mdle. Alboni, being entrusted with the little part of Smeaton, gave it the interest it would naturally derive from so pure and winning a vocalist as herself. She sang all the music beautifully—obtaining a loud encore for her first air. Notwithstanding an apology was made for Mario on the plea of hoarseness, there seemed to be but little real necessity for it, that admirable artiste executing the character of Percy with his accustomed sweetness and finish. His 'Vivi tu,' Rubini's pet triumph, was given with the nicest taste, and would have been encored, had not the intimation of the apologist been remembered. Corbari, as Jane Seymour, got through her two duets—neither of them matters of insignificance—with further accumulations of credit; and Tamburini is second to no one as the personator of the relentless Henry. The opera was, in every respect, broadly and effectively represented, the chorus singers exhibiting the greatest precision and vigour, while the orchestra was literally superb. The dresses and decorations were also rich and costly; one of the scenes, the vestibule of the King's council room, with its vista of perforated arches, its lanterns, trophies, and royal yeomen, meriting a separate and special word of praise."

En attendant our own notice, the above articles on the Royal Italian Opera will convey some notion of the enthusiasm created by the whole performance in general, and of Grisi's in particular. D. R.

LEIGH HUNT.

We have read no notice in the public journals for a long while that gave us more real pleasure than the following announcement:—"Lord John Russell has intimated to Mr. Leigh Hunt, in the handsomest manner, that it has pleased Her Majesty to confer upon him a pension of two hundred a year!" The old saying, "better late than never," is here happily exemplified; but it is a matter of no small wonder, indeed, that the grace should have been so long deferred. Nothing could be more invidious, or more unworthy of any government than the withholding a pension from a person, in every respect entitled to it from the Literary Fund, on no other grounds than simply because he was their opponent in politics. The object of the Literary Fund, we take it, is to provide for the necessities of those who have advanced the literature of their country, and who, by their writings, have tended to humanize and elevate the social feelings, independent of all bias from party motives, or sectarian opinions. With this fact staring us in the face, it is amazing how any government could have overlooked the amiable and accomplished writer, whose name stands at the head of our article. Leigh Hunt was one of the most conscientious writers of his day, and whether his principles were right, or wrong, he laboured zealously and manfully in the cause of humanity. With a dignified sense of the cause in which he wrought; stooping to no power, nor ever, "crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee, where thrift might follow fawning;" devoting his mind and his pen to the advancement of morality and the best interests of man, he went forward unshrinking determined, and never swerved from the rigid line his conscience dictated. That he had many and powerful enemies was the natural consequence of his unflinching spirit, and his detestation of subserviency. The friend of Shelley—the apostle of good and the hardy regenerator of man—Leigh Hunt proved himself one, who, if he had power, would use it to render the world better and wiser. If his efforts failed, it must be attributed to the world that would not be ameliorated, not to the writer who expended his time and talents in showing vice in its true colours, and virtue in its own fair light. As a poet, if Leigh Hunt shine among the lesser luminaries of that brilliant constellation which dazzled Europe at the beginning of the present century, he acknowledges no borrowed radiance, and rejoices in a lustre more pure and unsullied than issues from many a more glorified orb. His writings are characterised by great simplicity and kindly feeling, are imbued with exceeding grace, and have a turn of natural sentiment quite captivating. His Rimini is a poem of sterling worth. His best work, in our opinion, is "Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries." In this work he defends himself most manfully from the aspersions of his enemies, and gives us a picture of his domestic feelings that makes the heart yearn towards him as a husband and a father. His critical notes of Shelley and Keats are inimitable specimens of analytic writing. Leigh Hunt has also wrought successfully as a dramatic poet. Previous to the bestowal of the pension, two dramatic performances were announced as about to take place at the Royal Italian Opera, Mr. Beale, the director, with his usual liberality, having granted the use of the theatre gratuitously. These performances were to be given by the Gentlemen Amateurs, who have figured on the boards of Miss Kelly's and the St. James's Theatres. An address was written by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, to be spoken at the first representation, and another by Sergeant Talfourd, to be delivered on the second evening. After the announcement of the pension it was thought advisable to forego the performances altogether; a mode of proceeding we consider questionable, as it hinders many admirers of Leigh Hunt from paying their homage to his worth and talents. We have little doubt that the friendly committee who projected the getting up of the performances, have been guided in their withdrawal by Mr. Leigh Hunt himself. It is, however, determined that a dramatic performance, by the same gentlemen, shall take place, in behalf of the poet, at Liverpool, to be followed by another at Manchester. It cannot be doubted, with such an object in view, that the entertainment will meet with hearty and universal support.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—Mrs. Glover's benefit took place on Friday week. We are glad to announce that the theatre was crowded on the occasion, and that the greatest homage was paid to the incomparable artist by a most critical audience. Her performances of the Widow Green, in The Love Chase, and Miss Biffin, in Popping the Question, are too well-known to call for any remarks now. Cheer after cheer followed her entrance, and the applause she received throughout the evening was enough to satisfy a very gourmand of praise. May she live many years to receive the same great tribute to her unsurpassable abilities. Murphy's stale comedy of All in the Wrong, has been revived with great completeness, but, we fear, to little purpose. Splendidly as it is put on the stage, and finely as it is interpreted by the actors, especially by Mr. Webster and Mrs. Nisbett, in Sir John and Lady Restless, we think the comedy cannot outlive a few performances. Nevertheless, to those who would like to see a comedy of a certain class, such as enchain our forefathers, and tended nearly to extinguish the glowing lights of Congreve, and which was considered the climacteric of witty writing in its time, All in the Wrong will prove a source of great entertainment, and give rise to much speculation. The greatest possible care has been expended in its production at the Haymarket. The dresses are splendid and correct, and the scenery painted with the finest possible effect. Mr. Webster cannot be praised too highly for his endeavours to provide novelty and entertainment for his visitors.

FRENCH PLAYS.—The queen of tragedy is again among us, she who wears the mantle and the diadem as no real queen ever wore them; who has in a single inflexion of her voice, grief, rage, remorse, and the most tender and devoted love; Mademoiselle Rachel, the divine interpreter of the great poets, the incarnation of their sublimest conceptions and aspirations. Unfortunately her genius is so dazzling, that the other luminaries are cast into utter darkness by her presence, and fittingly, or at least coldly listened to, when she is away. This interrupts, in a measure, the action of the story, and would almost induce authors to imitate musical composers, who fit their scores to the voices with which they have to deal, and compose their music to measure. Neither can we blame them, although art suffers and languishes, and is thereby stunted in its development. The piece chosen for Madlle. Rachel's début was Les Horaces, by Corneille, in which her part, a mere episode in itself, is rendered by her the most prominent of all. We last year entered into a minute analysis of the principal and most salient points of her conception, we shall not therefore tire our readers by repeating them, suffice it to say, that she stood forth in succession the retiring, modest maiden, the loving sister, the devoted lover, surpassing even herself as she threw off the old, and took up a new phasis of the character. The curse on her brother was electrical, and there was a sort of savageness in her anathema on Rome, which made the blood run cold. None can forget the burst of ferocity given in that full-toned, deep, hollow voice, which commences with—and finishes in a paroxysm of rage, in which she identifies herself with the vengeance she calls down on the cause of her sorrows, and winds up with—

"Puisse—je

Moi seule en être cause, et mourir de plaisir!"

On Wednesday we witnessed the performance of Marie Stuart, adapted from the German of Schiller, or, we should rather say, mutilated to suit the exigencies of the classical mania, which, however omnipotent in the minds of exclusively scholastic students, and however admirable in the great Greek dramatists, and in some few of our modern copyists, become supremely ludicrous when applied to modern subjects and ideas, inasmuch as the pith and marrow of the subject matter are sacrificed to mere forms and conventionalities, formal and freezing as the Roman toga, or the Greek tunic, on the shoulders of the northern barbarian. In the present version of Marie Stuart, there is none of that variety of character which forms the great interest of Camille, Phédre, and Roxelane, and which progressing onwards to a grand climax, interests in its development, and eventually winds up the tale by a grand and striking dénouement; we have here but one side of the character of the heroine, a very incomplete history of her trials and misfortunes, and the plot marred by an almost universal sameness of colouring. There is, however, one great scene, which redeems all imperfections, that of the meeting of the two queens. This is taken almost verbatim from the German, and displays a wonderful knowledge of the human passions and of stage effect. In this scene Mademoiselle Rachel threw all her energies, and displayed such virulent and withering hate towards her sister-queen, as amounted to absolute ferocity. The sudden transition from prayer and supplication to intense hatred—her humility subjected to the most severe ordeal—her bye-play, when taunted with the fate of her lovers, was admirable. The whole of this scene was listened to with breathless and intense earnestness, and will bear our entering into more minute details. Marie throws herself at the feet of Elizabeth, she exclaims—

"Reine, ne laissez pas votre sœur malheureuse,
Tiemblante à vos genoux vous supplier en vain ;
Et, pour la relever, tendez-lui votre main."

The position of the actress is admirably descriptive of the once proud and haughty queen, now a suppliant at the feet of her rival, she extends her hand, but when Elizabeth answers—

"Le ciel, juste entre nous, vous met à votre place," she starts to her feet, a sudden thrill pervades her whole frame, and the spirit of revenge, although subdued, begins to rise within her ; she continues, however, in her endeavours, and in answer to the queen's threat—

"Il menaçait ma tête, il va frapper la vôtre."

she answers—

"Je suis soumise à Dieu ; mais j'en garde l'espoir, Vous n'abuserez pas d'un semblable pouvoir."

her anger seems to have vanquished, to give way to the profoundest humility, until Elizabeth again launches forth into vituperations on the amours of her captive, then the whole current of her anger, dammed up for a time, bursts forth with irresistible impetuosity, and she exclaims—

"Ah ! je ne voudrais pas au prix d'une couronne ;
Au prix de tous ces bords que la mer environne,
Pour les trésors du monde, échangeant mes liens,
Être telle à vos yeux que vous le seriez aux miens."

Her cry, "Oh, ma sœur !" was full of indignation, and spoke volumes of undisguised contempt and abhorrence. Her vehemence can no longer be restrained—she stands erect and firm before her haughty jailer—she proudly asserts her claims to the throne, and crushes her rival, who writhes in agony under the infliction—

"Le fruit de l'adultère, Profane insolemment le trône de l'Angleterre."

Si le ciel était juste, indigne souveraine,
Vous seriez à mes pieds, car je suis votre reine."

This was given with wonderful and startling ferocity ; her exultation is at its height—she is repaid for all her humiliations—she has trampled her under her feet before her lover—she knows her fate, and embraces it with ardour, for she is revenged beyond her most sanguine hopes—

"Oui devant Leicester. Il doublait mon courage,
Je lisais mon triomphe écrit sur son visage.
Oui, quand j'humiliais des charmes orgueilleux,
Leicester était là : J'étais reine à ses yeux."

We have never seen such an effect as that produced by this scene ; it was indeed the triumph of histrionic art. The fifth act has nothing striking about it, and is much too long, even when Mademoiselle Rachael is on the stage ; there is a heaviness, a tediousness, which makes the fall of the curtain desirable. This is the author's fault, and we should suggest a few curtailments absolutely necessary. The part of Mortimer was played by M. Raphael Félix with much tact and discrimination. Hélas ! for a worthy Leicester. We have seen Talma in the part, and M. Marius must suffer from the comparison. This gentleman is, however, better than he was last year ; he has evidently been at some pains to restrain his too powerful lungs within proper limits. Madlle Rabut was the Queen, and read the part tolerably, rather too amiably and graciously to come up to our idea of the daughter of Bluff King Hal. We must, however, do Madlle. Rabut the justice to say, that we were pleased with her performance of Valérie. Madlle. Vallée, in the part of Calorine, was exceedingly pleasing and lady-like. M. Rhozevil also deserves a word of commendation. Of Tancredè we shall speak in our next.

CONCERTS.

MISS DOLBY AND MR. LINDSAY SLOPER.—It is not necessary to tell the readers of the Musical World who is Miss Dolby, or who Mr. Lindsay Sloper, or to remind them of the high position they both hold in their profession, and in the esteem of the public. The concert given by them in conjunction, on Wednesday evening, the 23rd ult., in the Hanover Square Rooms, was one of the best of the whole season. The programme was highly interesting and varied with judgment. Mr. Willy's efficient little concert band attended, and performed Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, and Sterndale Bennett's overture to the Naiads ; the former under the conduct of Mr. Benedict, the latter under that of the composer. After tendering our acknowledgments to Miss Dolby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper for their good taste and artist-like spirit in supplying their friends with an orchestra (a fashion, by the way, which appears, happily, to be coming into vogue again, if we may judge by the present season), we must express the pleasure we experienced at hearing the overture to Coriolanus, which, though one of the masterpieces of Beethoven, is rarely heard in public, and is treated with marked neglect by the Philharmonic Society, notwithstanding the encore it received at its last performance, five years ago, under the direction of Mendelssohn. But let us hasten to speak of the performances of the excellent concert-givers. Miss Dolby first sang Mozart's lovely recitative and air, "Resta O Cara." Of this beautiful composition, and of the exquisite style in which Miss Dolby renders it, we have so often spoken, that it is enough to say she sang it as well as ever, and thereby thoroughly delighted every true amateur and musician in the room. Her next essay was the florid cavatina from Semiramide, "Ah quel giorno," which Miss Dolby vocalised in a style of perfection that would have charmed Grisi herself, and evidently much pleased Mdlle. Jenny Lind, who was in the room, and applauded our clever English "nightingale" as heartily as any one of the audience. Miss Dolby last demonstrated her talent in a couple of ballads, "Forget thee," by G. E. Hay, and "Primroses deck the banks," by T. Linley, both of which she rendered with infinite taste and feeling. The former is an elegant specimen of the sentimental school, which now obtains among our English ballad-makers, so different from the "Chevy-Chace," "Nut-browne Maydes," and "Gawaine-and-Golograses," that delighted our fathers. The second is a favourable specimen of the elder Linley's style. Mr. Lindsay Sloper performed thrice. His first essay was in Mendelssohn's rondo brillante in B minor, one of the early works of that great master and at the same time one of his most beautiful. This was the first opportunity we have had of hearing the admirable young pianist in conjunction with an orchestra. It is one thing to play solos and another thing to play concertos. For our own parts, in opposition to existing prejudices, we hold the latter to be by far the most difficult and by far the most honourable. It was, therefore, with double pleasure that we listened to Mr. Sloper on this occasion. The masterly ease with which he played proved him to possess, beyond a question, that experience without which a pianist may be a very good pianist but still only a pianist and not a musician. Mr. Sloper's reading of Mendelssohn's rondo was quite in the spirit of the author, and the great rapidity with which he took the time of the allegro was justified by the unerring precision with which he executed it. It was altogether a very finished and musician-like performance, Mr. Willy and his orchestra contributing their share of the general effect. Mr. Sloper's next performance was, in company with Mr. Benedict, a MS. duet for two pianofortes, composed expressly for this occasion. The duet is a work of too much thought and elaboration to be critically dismissed after a single hearing. We shall, therefore, merely say that we listened to it with that attention which was due to the merits and reputation of its young and rising composer, and were enabled to discern clearness of design, beautiful and well contrasted themes, and careful and consistent elaboration ; moreover, as a display for the qualifications of two first-rate pianists it is highly effective and brilliant, and this was strikingly demonstrated by Mr. Benedict and Mr. Sloper, who played it in the most finished and admirable style. Stephen Heller's characteristic study, La Chasse, was the last piece executed by Mr. Sloper. This short sketch is as difficult as it is beautiful. Mr. Sloper took it at an immensely rapid pace, but sustained it to the end with unflagging power. We must dismiss the rest of the concert in a few lines. The other instrumental performances consisted of a concertino for two violins, composed by Fuchs, a Viennese professor, and performed with prodigious neatness and brilliancy by the clever brothers, Joseph and George Hellmesberger; and the Wedding March, from Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream, rendered with great spirit by Mr. Willy's orchestra. The vocal music offered a large variety of popular and classical morceaux, the former claiming the preponderance. Mr. H. Phillips gave his scena, (MS.) "On Lena's gloomy heath," which Mendelssohn composed expressly for him, and which he originally introduced at the first Philharmonic concert of the present season; and Miss Rainforth contributed an exceedingly pretty ballad from Tully's opera of The Forest Maiden (recently produced with great success at the Surrey Theatre); Madame Dorus Gras treated us to her air, "Des l'enfance," from Anber's Le Serment, Panofka's charming romanza and mazurka, "Il mal di paese d'una Polacca," and Clemenceau's romance, "La bouquetière du roi;" The Misses Pyne gave the duet "The ties of friendship," from Benedict's Crusaders; Miss L. Pyne displayed her great progress as a florid vocalist in the aria, "O luce di quest'anima," (Linda di Chamouni); Mdle. Vera and Miss Dolby sang the duet, "Divisi noi," from Rossini's Bianca e Faliero; Signors Brizzi and Ciabatta contributed the duet, "Parlar spiegar," from the same composer's Mosé in Egitto, and Signor Ciabatta sang the barcarole of Tadolini, "Se la vita;" Madame Dorus Gras, Mdle. Vera, Miss Pyne, and Miss Dolby, interpreted a sparkling and pretty quartet of Gabussi, "La rivolta del seraglio;" Madame Macfarren again delighted us with the beautiful air from Mozart's Il curioso indiscreto, which she has so opportunely rescued from oblivion; and lastly, John Parry introduced his "Lalla Rookh," which being encored he replaced by another of the joint facettie of himself and the prolific Albert Smith. Mr. Willy was, of course, the leader of his own band, and Messrs. Benedict, Sloper, and Kühne officiated as accompanists at the piano. Mr. John Parry, however, be it understood, accompanied himself—we should like to know who could accompany him—and Miss Dolby followed his example in her two ballads. The room was crammed to overflowing, and the programme afforded unanimous satisfaction. We have little doubt that Miss Dolby and Mr. Lindsay Sloper divided a good £300, net profit, between them—an event which, in the present dearth of public encouragement, is an indisputable proof of their high and deserving popularity.

MR. STEPHEN CHAMBERS, gave a matinée musicale on Tuesday last, at 16, Berners Street, Oxford Street. The vocalists comprised, Mesdames C. E. Horn and Stephen Chambers, Miss Ellen Lyon, Mr. C. E. Horn, Mr. Handel Gear, Mr. Wetherbee and Herr Brandt. The instrumentalists were Mr. Stephen Chambers (piano), Mr. Gerhard Taylor (harp), and Herr Lobbeck (clarinet). The performances afforded much satisfaction. Among the excellencies of the concert we may briefly notice a recitative and aria from Torquato Tasso, by Mr. C. E. Horn; a comic duet by Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Horn: a grand fantasia on the harp by Gerhard Taylor; Weber's Concert Stück on the piano, by Mrs. Stephen Chambers; and a very pleasing ballad of his own composition, sung by Mr. Handel Gear. Messrs. C. E. Horn and Handel Gear were the conductors.

MR. STOCKING gave an evening entertainment at the Princess's Concert Room, on the 16th ult. The vocal performers numbered Madame F. Lablache, the Misses Emily Badger, Lucy Pettigrew, Clara Soane, A. Alexander, Mademoiselle Cinzia Pagliardini, the Signors Brizzi, Massone, F. Lablache, and Pagliardini, and the Messrs. Phillip, Clark and Mr. John Parry. The instrumental executants, were Mdle. Cinzia Pagliardini (pianoforte), Master Thirlwall (violin), and Mr. John Balsir Chatterton (harp). Press of matter precludes us from entering into particulars. Mr. R. H. Andrews and Mr. Stocking officiated as conductors.

MADAME DULCKEN'S CONCERT.—The fair and accomplished

pianist provides, annually, a concert of such magnitude and importance, that it looks somehow, as though she thought it an unfulfilment of her duty to her patrons and admirers that an entertainment of some such kind had not taken place every day in the year, Sundays excepted, or included, as it might be, and that being precluded from giving these diurnal feasts, she thought it incumbent on her to combine the musical strength that might have been expanded over three hundred and sixty-five days into one. Let the reader but consider the programme and he will readily agree with us. It is as long and as wealthy as Regent Street.

From such a glittering heap of musical jewellery, what article of price shall we select for especial remark? or what shall we omit, from our unavoidably brief notice, that may not look invidious in the eyes of the assistants? To avoid this, we may state at once, generally, that the concert was one of the most brilliant that ever drew together a crowded assembly; that the performances on the whole were admirable, and that everybody appeared delighted with the entertainments; the only complaint being made, was, that many of the semi-fashionable folks had lost their dinner from the lateness of the hour to which the monster concert was spun out. Place à la bénéficiaire—we must first allude to the performances of Madame Dulcken—and yet, why comment upon the excellences of that of which all are cognisant, and which none dispute? Why descant upon the voluble fingers, the exquisite taste, the fine mechanism, the delicate colouring, the truthful reading, and brilliant style of Madame Dulcken's pianoforte playing, when only to mention her performance is to leave others to suppose them? Will not each and all of the above qualities be readily understood, when we merely name that the great pianiste played in her best style? Indeed the public are so well aware of the artist's abilities, and have been so accustomed to read daily encomiums on her playing that we should not wonder if they would consider any further praise as superfluous as adding perfume to the violet, or new blushes to the rose. Enough to say Madame Dulcken's performance of Schullhoff's Caprice was characterised by all her excellence of method and expression; that the Il Tremolo was played to perfection; and that her portions in the Otello and the Fantaisie Militaire were as brilliantly executed as possibly could be. This last was a grand display of pianoforte playing by the three artistes. A word must suffice in praise of Godefrid's solo, and Joachim's adagio and rondo, both exquisitely performed: nor must we omit, among the instrumental excellences, the violin performances of the Messrs. Hellmesberger and Sainton, and the flute playing of Signor Ciardi—all admirable. From the vocal department we can only select a few performances for notice, with which the reader must rest satisfied. First of all, as the great novelty of the entertainments, we are led to point out M. Roger's singing. This gentleman made his first appearance in London at this concert. His singing of Adolph Adam's song exhibited him as one of the first of living tenors, whether we refer to his vocal powers, or his art. M. Roger's voice is exquisitely pure, mostly proceeding from the chest, and rings like a silver bell. He is entirely free from that nasality of tone which is so much injurious to the singing of the French school. His style is simple and chaste, and his method of vocalisation irreproachable. M. Roger produced an immense sensation in both his songs. We really have not room to specify any other portion of the vocal scheme. When all is excellent it is no easy task to select for preference. The conductors were Messrs. Benedict, Kuhe, and Vincent Wallace.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—After the first act of Anna Bolena on Saturday, when Grisi was called for, a magnificent cadeau, in the shape of a bracelet, was thrown from one of the stage boxes, which was handed to Grisi, who immediately placed it on her arm. The bracelet, which was inlaid with the most valuable jewels, and was of solid gold, bore an inscription as follows:—"From the Dowager Countess of Essex to Madame Grisi, on the occasion of her benefit as a small token of admiration for her talent and genius." Could any thing be more gratifying to the great Italian artist than a tribute from one of the greatest singers England ever saw? We have been assured that among all the costly bijouterie, the jewels of price, and countless cadeaux with which Grisi has been presented, there is none more prized than the bracelet so graciously presented to her on Thursday night.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.—A Grand Concert took place last evening for the benefit of the Italian Gratuitous School, Greville Street, Hatton Garden. All the principal artists of the Royal Italian Opera assisted, by permission of Mr. Beale. The rooms were crowded to suffocation. A splendid concert was provided.

MADemoiselle Sophie Froco has arrived in London and will make her first appearance in a new grand ballet on Thursday next at the Royal Italian Opera.

EXETER HALL.—Spohr's Grand Oratorio, The Fall of Babylon, conducted by the composer, was given last night before a very large audience. The lateness of the hour, and the crowded state of our columns, preclude us from entering into a notice of the performance till next week. In our next number, we shall enter into a copious and analytic review of the work of the great master.

MR. MOSCHELES.—Messrs. Puttick & Simpson have announced to sell by auction, on Friday the 23rd inst. the extensive and valuable musical library of the above eminent composer and pianist, in consequence of his departure from this country. Among the works of Mr. Moscheles to be submitted to public auction, there will be found several of rare value. We direct the reader's attention to our advertisement sheet for further particulars.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—We are glad to hear, that a MS-Symphony by Mr. W. Bayley, and a Harp Concerto by Mr. John Thomas, will be performed at the Academy Concert this morning. Mr. Thomas will, of course, play his own concerto.

MR. FREDERICK WEBSTER.—The stage-director of the Haymarket Theatre, has announced his benefit for Tuesday next, when will be given a series of entertainments, which will combine the talents of the Haymarket and Adelphi companies. John Parry and other auxiliaries will assist. Mr. F. Webster, is the author of the clever "Analysis on the human voice," now being written in the pages of the Musical World, and we trust our numerous readers will not overlook his claim on their support in consequence. Mr. F. Webster is a Brother of the Ancient Order of Freemasons.

TO OUR READERS.

Erratum in the last article on "Etjah."—In comparing the social conditions of Mozart and Mendelssohn, and their consequent influence on their works, we spoke of the embarrassed life of the former which compelled him to write hastily. In the following sentence the compositor has made us say: "Mendelssohn unluckily for himself and the art, has never been in this embarrassed position. Need we say that it should be "Mendelssohn luckily for himself and the art," &c. &c.

PERSONAL GRACES.

The countenance is rendered additionally pleasing by the well-arranged curl, the braided plait, or the flowing tress. In dressing the hair, nothing can equal the effect of ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, on either natural or artificial hair, rendering it so admirably soft, that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendent lustre it imparts, rendering the head dress truly enchanting. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR is a preparation of unparalleled efficiency in improving and beautifying the skin and complexion, preserving them from every vicissitude of the weather; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, is alike invaluable for its beautifying and preservative effects on the teeth and gums.

Beware of Spurious Imitations—some are offered under the implied sanction of Royalty, and the Government Departments, with similar attempts at deception. The only Genuine "MACASSAR OIL," "KALYDOR," and "ODONTO," are "ROWLAND'S," and the wrapper of each bears the name of "ROWLAND'S," preceding that of the article, with their signature at the foot, in Red Ink, thus—

RESTORATION OF VOICE BY KEATING'S COUGH LOZENGES.

Glasgow, Jan. 12th, 1847.
Sir—I have great pleasure in informing you of the great good your excellent COUGH LOZENGES have done me. In December, 1845, I caught a severe cold from riding two or three miles, one very wet night, which settled in my lungs, and quite took away my voice, so that I could not speak above a whisper from that time until December last. I tried all kinds of Medicines, but they were of no avail. I was then advised to try your Lozenges, which I did only to please my friends, but before I had finished a 2s. 9d. tin, my voice, to my great joy, came back as strong as ever.—I am Sir, yours respectfully, Thomas Keating, Esq.

N.B.—To prevent spurious imitations, please to observe that the words "KEATING'S COUGH LOZENGES," are engraved on the Government Stamp of each Box.

RACHEL.

THE pen hesitates to trace the words; but, alas! they must be written. Rachel, the incomparable Rachel, took her leave of the English public last night, and almost immediately—perhaps even to-day—will quit the shores of England. The play was Virginia. It was a triumph—for with Rachel to appear is to triumph—but a melancholy one.

We cannot, without poignant regret, bid farewell to this gifted and extraordinary woman, before whose talent all other talents sink into mediocrity. That Rachel is the most wonderful genius, the most perfect and accomplished actress, who, in any time, has trod the boards of any stage, is our entire belief. In her, and only in her, do we acknowledge the presence of those bright qualities about which our fathers are so eloquent. She is the ~~lot~~ of the daughters of night, with the raven hair, the flashing eye, the scornful mouth. An echo of the Grecian song, heard through the distance of two thousand years, yet lives upon her tongue; the souls of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus breathe melody upon her lips, as the invisible winds upon the mysterious harp of Æolus. With her a mighty race will become extinct; when she is gone the voice of the tragic drama will be dumb, and poetry lament its oracle. She yet walks amongst us, but only as a memento of old times. Her face is the lamp that lights Melpomene's tomb in the ancient vault of the drama; her voice is the bell that tolls Melpomene's knell. Though she is with us, she is not of us; her eye, gleaming with a fire which is from heaven and dies not, looks with pity upon her uninspired companions. To her there is no future. She sees the past, folded in its shroud, and with clasped hands prays for her own hour to come. But her mission, which is to sing the drama's monody, must be fulfilled. When the last note is uttered, her heart will break, like the strings of some forgotten instrument, and her spirit fly to its home.

There are yet a few to whom the voice of Rachel is a warning and a prophecy. There are yet a few to whom that gentle form, stealing along the scene like some whited ghost, conveys a holy meaning. There are yet a few to whom that countenance—vibrating with expression more impossible to catch than the hue of theameleon—is as the moon—that,

“Wandering companionless, Among the stars that have a different birth—” climbs the heavens with silent step, the weary messenger of change. The moon foretels the changes of the year, and the face of Rachel, of which it is but a pale reflex, foretels the changes of the times. All things must die—the most lovely and the greatest, as the most unsightly and the meanest. And when the beauty and the life that give to that face a charm, unutterable as irresistible, shall fall away, like dust, and leave a thing

“To make men tremble who never weep,” it will be a sign that the drama's blood has ceased to flow, that the drama's heart has ceased to beat.

The characters sustained by Rachel during her present engagement have demonstrated the variety no less than the transcendancy of her talent. Whether as Camille, the gentle Roman girl, metamorphosed into a fury by the loss of her lover, her black hair streaming, her deep eyes flashing, her white arms waving, her whole frame convulsed with the intensity of despair and rage; or as the inspired Maid of Orleans, sheathed in resplendant arms, towering in counsel as in battle; or as the soft Virginia, clinging to the rough frame of her stern father as ivy to the oak, supplicating the knife with the innocent uplifted eyes of a lamb that knows not its terrors, shrinking from contamination, as the chaste snow from the kisses of the sun; or as the mother of the dissolute Nero, sublime in wickedness, haughty in humility, ambitious in counsel, terrible in reproach; or as the fate-struck Phedra, sinking under the weight of an unholy passion, distracting herself for that which is inevitable, moved by two opposite powers of attraction and repulse, that torment her soul with their incessant strife, gradually wasting and sinking, until her life goes out like the flickering embers of an unfed fire; or as the wise and beautiful Monimia, enduring the passion of the terrible Mithridates, and pining for the love of his more gentle son; or as the fair Amenais, a pale abstraction warmed into vivid reality by the breath of her genius; or as the spiritual coquette, the heartless, gay, and brilliant Celimene, killing with her wit, and curing with her eyes; or as the passionate, capricious, and revengeful Hermione, who silently consumes her own heart, and wantonly breaks that of her best friend, now all gentleness, now all flame, never knowing her own mind, insulting and humiliating her lover for the very fidelity with which he obeys her slightest wish; in one and all of these Rachel is equally wonderful, equally incomparable. There is not a passion which she cannot express;—love, hate, jealousy, revenge, hope, pity, joy, exultation, anguish, remorse, despair, pride, devotion, contempt, scorn, rage, irony, enthusiasm, all are completely at her control, all are ready to obey the slightest indication of her genius. To her the passions are as the keys of an instrument upon which the impulses of her heart can play it well, as the finger upon the clavier. Never was actress so gifted with the accomplishments of mind and the charm of personal attributes. There is something in her face that speaks of another and a higher world than this. The expression of her eyes is indescribable. Her forehead is the tablet of intellect. Her mouth the seat of passion, for enough, without sanctioning the greedy conduct of a needy tradesman. If the above be untrue, I hope the management will give it a flat denial. It is my intention, however, to be at the box-door the moment it is opened, on the day stated in the advertisement, and I promise you a report of the state of the box plan. Let me give the music seller a little advice, which is, to mind his shop and let speculation alone.—Yours,

"ONE BEHIND THE SCENES."

Need we point out where the puff lies, cunningly as it is wrapped up in the attack upon a music-seller?

But while we are upon the matter we may as well give our friend the Morning Post a turn. The following oddly-phrased puff is not beside the subject, and may lead, at any rate, to yet more sober and useful reflection. It is apropos of Tuesday's performance at the Opera, and is quite a gem in its way:—

"The sea, however rough, did not prevent Lablache and Lind returning from Osborne House in time for the opera. I Masnadieri was given last night for the last time, and however divided opinions prevailed, was warmly received; apart Jenny, Coletti, and Bouché, each of whom, in different degrees, commanding a reception such as belongs alone to super-eminent artists and well-proven favourites of the public. As to Gardoni, one would not have regretted this new opera being given this season, were it only that it has put to the test all this young artiste can effect dramatically as well as vocally as a tenore di forza. This opera, with its consequent expenditure, however, forms one of the brightest efforts of the season, as part of a principle so long neglected, and as a duty now redeemed. It is not only that it is utterly disgraceful for the greatest theatre in Europe to be constantly borrowing and never returning any lyrical resources, but the production of novelty is essential, in the long run, to the existence as well as to the progress of art, as a boon to encourage the rise of new composers. One can but smile at those who would have it considered as the greatest merit to enact only old works. This is a very convenient and economical process of management; but even the chefs-d'œuvre will not live on the stage unless new and interesting works, even though they be inferior, do not keep up the filtration; as we see in the drama, the faultless works even of Shakspeare without a stage, because in our age the real dramatists are too rare to produce a sufficient number of plays to keep up the interest in classical works. To-morrow Sonnambula will be given for the last, and on Saturday we hope Le Nozze for the first time this season, with such a cast as was never before thought of."

It is amusing to remark the wriggling about Verdi's opera. Even the Post cannot get over the fact of its disastrous failure; and the boast about managerial wisdom and liberality is somewhat vague when we consider on what worthless stuff managerial wisdom and liberality has been in this instance expended. The blow at the Royal Italian Opera is well intended, but misses the mark; since no one will deny that it is much better to perform good old operas well than bad new ones ill. The term FILTRATION is employed with a beautiful independence of meaning; and the "never-before thought of" cast of Figaro is very amusing, when we consider that it is inferior both in completeness and in individual excellence to the cast at the rival establishment.

The next puff that attracts our attention is more astonishing than all the rest:—first, because it contains a comparison between Malibran and Lind, and gives the palm to the latter, with singular contempt of truth; and second, because it appears in the respectable pages of Blackwood's Magazine:—

"THE ITALIAN OPERA AND JENNY LIND.—Her Majesty's Theatre upon a gala night presents a very gorgeous spectacle, and I do not wonder that, apart from the music, it is a place of so much attraction. The mere sight of the company is enough to strike us poor provincials with astonishment; for I believe that in no other assemblage in the world will you see so much beauty, rank, and elegance congregated as here. The opera of the evening was the Sonnambula, and after the curtain had risen, and the preliminary scene was over, a fair, fresh, innocent-looking girl, attired in peasant costume, tripped upon the stage, and the storm of applause which literally shook the house welcomed the appearance of the famous Swedish singer. * * * The great charm of her performances seems to be this—that she combines together in extraordinary perfection the leading qualities of the actress and the singer.* Nothing could be more natural, more touching, or more beautiful than the manner in which she embodied the character of Amina, and I write this with the full memory of the exquisite Malibran before me. But Malibran, with all her grace and genius, was more artificial than Jenny Lind. She always made it visible to you that somewhat of her simplicity was assumed; and occasionally she rather imitated the archness of the grisette, than the soft, modest, and yet playful demeanour of the village maiden. Jenny, on the other hand, is faultless in the expression of her emotions. Whether she is giving way to a burst of confiding love, or chiding her betrothed for his jealousy, or repelling with vexed impatience the approaches of the libertine count, she never for a moment is untrue to the proper nature of her character. I never saw any thing so perfect as the sleep-walking scene; Siddons could not have done it better; and if mesmerism had often such charming pupils, it would soon become a popular science. Her voice in singing is most charming, but I think it strikes one less with surprise at its compass, than with delight at the exquisite melody and birdlike clearness of its tones. Indeed, no more appropriate name could have been bestowed on her than that by which she is now familiar throughout Europe—the peerless Nightingale of Sweden."

That old "Christopher North" should have issued from the mountains, to write such a jumble of unmeaning rubbish, we confess, surprises us not a little; but we presume he had a good place for his trouble. Nevertheless, is it not a sad thing for art, that one of the great whips of criticism, the boasted enemy of charlatans, the crusher of rising genius in the bud, the mighty censor of letters, the brag, the bully, the swaggerer of the monthly press, the critic who lashed with his wordy cat-o'-nine-tails the brawny shoulders of Wordsworth, the nervous frame of Byron, and the frail form of Shelley; is it not a sad thing for art that even this self-constituted authority, so severe in censure, so chary of praise, so suspicious of innovation, so sceptical of original merit, should thus condescend to enroll himself among the motley company of puffers, that, defying the God of truth, set up a golden calf in Horeb, and kneel down, cringing, in the dust before it!

But we are tired of the subject. No one will accuse us of having received with coldness the claims of Madlle. Jenny Lind on her first appearance here. We were even studious to be kind, wishing rather to foster a youthful talent by encouragement than to blight it by disdain. But when after her striking failure in Norma, a part she attempted at the most unwise suggestion of her friends, we find her admirers not only lauding her for greatness where they should have censured her for mediocrity, but instituting comparisons in her favour at the expence of Grisi, and even of RACHEL, our patience is utterly exhausted, and we can but lift up our hands in amazement and our voice in remonstrance. It remains to be seen how long this madness will endure. We give it until next season, between when and now the eyes of the provincials will be opened, and the fever of the metropolitans abated. Madlle. Jenny Lind will then fall into the position for which nature and art have qualified her—that of a clever and promising, but not of a great, much less of an extraordinary dramatic singer. S.

[In the above, which we have been requested to insert and insert with pleasure, although we consider it somewhat overdrawn, will be recognised the style and the initial of an ancient and highly respected conductor of the Musical World.—ED.]

SHAKSPERE'S HOUSE.

THE preservation of Shakspeare's house continues to absorb universal attention. Letters have appeared in sundry papers, most of which laud the projection of the undertaking, and are not stinting in their vituperations, against Lord Morpeth and Her Majesty's government, for their refusal of co-operation and assistance. But while the government is apathetic, Prince Albert comes forward, and the Queen Dowager, and others of high names with the Corporation of Stratford, all subscribing handsomely—at least so we read in the Examiner, which gives the following on dit.

"We understand that a communication has been addressed to the committee of the Shaksperian Society, at Stratford-upon-Avon, by command of Prince Albert, intimating that it is the intention of His Royal Highness to contribute a donation of £250 to the fund which it is proposed to raise for the purchase of Shakspeare's house. This munificent contribution has been rendered still more valuable to the committee by the assurance which accompanies it of the strong interest felt by His Royal Highness in the preservation, as national property, of a dwelling which is connected with the greatest name in English literature. Her Majesty the Queen Adelaide has been graciously pleased to honor the proceedings of the committee by her patronage and a donation of £100. And the Corporation of Stratford has voted the very liberal donation of £100 for the same object."

We read the same announcement in the London and Liverpool Advertiser. But the strangest thing is yet behind. Another letter has appeared in the Examiner, which is likely to bring the undertaking to a very different issue from what was expected. It would appear, were we to judge from this letter, that Shakspeare's house—so called—is not Shakspeare's house at all, and that all the war of words, which has been lately engendered by Mr. Walter Savage Landor's enthusiastic letter in the Examiner, has had its origin in a fantasy and is likely to end in smoke. The letter runs thus:—

"To the Editor of the Examiner."

"SIR.—There is an enthusiastic and generous letter in your Examiner, of the 24th of last month, from Mr. Walter Savage Landor, complaining that Government, and Lord Morpeth in particular, had refused to purchase the house in Henley-street, Stratford-on-Avon, which has been for many years exhibited as that in which the immortal Bard of Avon first drew his breath. For the information of Mr. Landor, and I fear of many others, I take this means to inform him and them, from proofs which I could hereafter give, that the house in which Shakspeare was born is no more known than is the birth-place of Homer, of the prophet Isaiah, or of the divine legislator, Moses. These sacred and profane writers are known only through their works; but through them they must be known till chaos shall return and time be no more, and this ought to be enough. I greatly admire the spirit and generosity exhibited in Mr. Landor's letter; but I should most sadly have grieved if the Government had coincided in his views. An old friend of mine, a native of Stratford-on-Avon and an idoliser of Shakspeare, and myself, some few years since, through the public press, endeavoured to do away with this deception; but the exhibition of the old dwelling was profitable to the show-woman, and visitors, in such a case, had no objection to be deceived; and so it has gone on to the present day, and perhaps will go on: but Lord Morpeth and the Government shall have my most hearty thanks for not making themselves agents of or participators in it. For the information of Mr. Landor, whose generous enthusiasm I so greatly admire, I shall be happy to look up, should he wish it, the publication in which the proofs of the deception above stated appeared, and I have no doubt whatever but they will be perfectly satisfactory to his mind. It is sufficient for the lovers of Shakspeare, and the inhabitants of Stratford-on-Avon in particular, to know that theirs is the birth-place of the Bard; and if I were an inhabitant of that town, it might perhaps afford me little pleasure to reflect, that for aught I knew, or any one else knew, the house which I inhabited might stand on the very spot over which was the room in which the wonderful child, William Shakspeare first drew his breath. If this would not afford me pleasure—for it is merely conjectural—I can affirm on grounds free from suspicion, that oftentimes some pleasurable sensations do arise in my mind, when I reflect that the groundwork of the little education I received was laid in the same school in which the boy, William Shakspeare, with his satchel and shining morning face, went unwillingly (perhaps) to school. This, I observe, to me has always been a source of pleasure: I mention it, however, not I hope in the spirit of vanity, as a "laudator temporis acti," me "quero," but merely to show to Mr. Landor that I have some personal knowledge of the matters concerning which I write. And with this conclusion I subscribe myself,

Your obedient servant,

GEO. WILKINS, Parsonage, Wis, near Manningtree, Aug. 3, 1847:

The above letter is apparently written by one who is satisfied he can prove what he advances. We have little doubt that Mr. Walter Savage Landor will at once accept the proffer of Mr. Wilkins, and investigate the mystery of Shakspeare's birth-place. After the above letter it is not to be expected that any one would advance a doit in the way of subscription until Mr. Wilkins's communication be proved to be an error, and the birth-place of the poet be incontrovertibly established. From the commencement we did not put much heart in the undertaking; we conceived that it would be nothing better than expending energy and enthusiasm in a wrong direction to glorify the poet, and we shrank from over-exerting ourselves in the cause, because we conceived that the preservation of the house was an utter impossibility for more than a very brief period; but we nevertheless spied faintly in the distance a real good that would result therefrom. The attention of the public would be called to the fact that no national Monument has been erected to him who was the greatest of all England's great men, and that it would be time now to entertain a thought of honoring Shakspeare with some lasting memorial to which every individual in the kingdom might have it in his power to bring his offering. Let the money already collected for the preservation of a house, where he was not born, stand as the first item on the list for the subscription to the new national Shaksperian monument, and let a general collection take place throughout the united kingdom. Even were the house proved to be that in which Shakspeare was born, we should vote for the money being laid out towards the erection of a national monument, for expended in that way alone would it have any enduring results. Mr. Wilkins's letter is quite satisfactory to us; and we have no doubt a cheat has been long practised on the public, which should be immediately investigated and exposed. We trust that those who subscribed towards the preservation of Shakspeare's birth-place will not, when the deception is laid bare, withdraw their several sums, but leave them in the hands of the committee, to go towards, what we have already hinted at, the erection of a GRAND NATIONAL MONUMENT IN HONOR OF SHAKSPEARE.

RONCONI.

(From the London and Liverpool Advertiser.)

Of Signor Ronconi as a mere singer, we shall not speak. His high talent in this respect is universally acknowledged, and it is not to be forgotten, that he alone, of all the barytones at present in England, has known how to conciliate the favour of a far more fastidious public than our own—that of Paris. But as an actor Signor Ronconi has, as yet, had scant measure of justice done to his genius—for a man of genius he undoubtedly is, and such men are rare upon the stage. France owns but one great tragic artist—a woman—we, of course allude to Mademoiselle Rachel. We ourselves have none. Germany is at present equally wanting; and on the Italian stage with the exception of Madame Grisi, we find none but Signor Ronconi. Unrivalled as the genius of Lablache in the buffo, is that of Ronconi in the higher and nobler walk of his art. Since the elder Kean we have seen no artist to be compared with him. Possibly he is too prone to sacrifice a merely vocal beauty to a great dramatic effect, but this is a fault which we should be pleased to recognize more frequently in the lyric artist. Anything is preferable to the cut and dry mode of vocalisation which realizes the score only, without touching the intention or the inspiration of the composer. On the third act of Maria di Rohan, that of Ronconi—for it would be absurd to impute it in the present instance to Donizetti—the fate of the opera rests. Were the music poorer and weaker than it is, such acting as that of Signor Ronconi, in conjunction with his fine vocal execution of the part, must have carried it triumphantly through. The first burst of indignant surprise, and the fine touch of sorrow with which it concludes, on seeing the portrait, were worthy of any artist. Rachel never surpassed it. Equally fine was the terrible smile with which the injured husband gazed on the weapon which was to revenge him—and grander still the attitude in which he received the lover. It was a picture conceived and executed with the will and eye of a painter—a subject for study rather than for mere admiration. The bravi with which the scene was mingled by the audience, were—fine as in a vocal point of view, it undoubtedly was—directed to the magnificent acting of Ronconi, and when he was a second time called before the curtain, it was to respond to the unanimous enthusiasm of a public rarely moved so completely from their proverbial coldness. As a great tragic delineation, the part must take place and rank—in spite of the comparative poverty of the score—at the side of the highest exertions of tragic genius. Not a gesture which was not instinct with it—not a note but was subservient to the tragic purpose of the actor escaped from Signor Ronconi. He is a clever buffo singer, but as a male tragedian he stands alone on the modern stage. This is high praise—but we appeal to the whole range of Ronconi's serious parts to justify it. Why is it that the Direction of the Italian Opera at Covent Garden do not produce the Beatrice di Tenda as well as the Maria di Rohan? It is a better opera, and Signor Ronconi would find in it even greater scope for the display of his powers.

RACHEL AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

MANY of your provincial readers, who may not have had the good fortune to have seen Rachel, would think the leader in last Saturday's Musical World a rhapsody. Your Manchester readers who have had that good fortune can now vouch for its truthfulness in every line, except the one about her so soon quitting England's shores. Luckily for us in the north, before returning to "La Belle France," Rachel has accepted engagements for Manchester, Liverpool, and, we believe, Edinburgh and Glasgow also. The spirited proprietor of our Theatre Royal, not content with giving us Jenny Lind, has this week furnished one of the highest intellectual treats that ever was given in a theatre in Manchester. In a theatrical experience of some two-and-twenty years, we never witnessed any dramatic acting at all approaching that of Mdle. Rachel, on Monday, in Camille, in Corneille's tragedy of Les Horaces. Who could think, to see that fragile yet graceful form, gliding as it were, upon the stage—that it was capable of displaying such extraordinary power? We must confess that we were not in any ecstasies with French tragedy—the strict adherence to the unities of time and place—the unvarying unchanging scene—the monotonous declamation in stilted tones of long speeches, all in rhyme, which, however varied in intonation by the talent of the different actors, still becomes wearisome, from the measure being the same, and an unavoidable sing or whining emphasis being given to the concluding word of each line. In spite of all this, however, when Rachel was once on the stage, we forgot every thing in admiration and wonder at the etherealized being before us! We were fascinated and could not withdraw our gaze! It is impossible to find terms to express adequately what is felt by every one on witnessing such a performance. All usual phrases seem so out of place in allusion to her—and, as to criticising, what is there to criticise?—her performance is perfection from beginning to end! To point out beauties even is difficult where all is so great, suffice it to say, that every scene of her's was witnessed with wonder and delight. The last and greatest scene of all, where she curses Rome and goads her brother to the fatal catastrophe, electrified the house and in spite of its bad taste, and the evident exhaustion of the great tragedian, Rachel was summoned before the curtain, after her mimic death, to receive the customary but ill-timed tribute to her transcendent talents. The entire audience rose, the occupants of the dress circle, pit stalls, and all to cheer her. She appears to-night in Phedra, on Friday in Virginie, and Saturday, her last night and benefit (so say the bills), in Jeanne d'Arc. The rest of Mr. Mitchell's company do not call for any particular remark; all are respectable, at any rate, and that is much to say when appearing beside such a brilliant planet, for Rachel is more than a star. Mdle. Rabut pleased, indeed delighted us very much in Valerie ou L'Aveugle, in which she took the part of the blind girl; she played it admirably and with great feeling; at its close she was summoned before the curtain. There was a bumper house, so far as regards dress circle and stalls, a good pit, and the rest of the house empty. French plays do not attract a gallery audience, but we were surprised to see so few in the upper circle of boxes. The critique you gave in last week's number of the performance of the glorious band of amateurs, for the benefit of Leigh Hunt, from the Liverpool Chronicle, would apply exactly to the same performance in Manchester. Dickens was truly great, he reminded us in Jerry Bumps of Charles Mathews; so perfect is his study that he could prompt any one at fault, and in one instance gave a little bit, impromptu, to fill up a momentary lapse of one of his brother amateurs. As the actors appeared, and each well-known name was recognised in the persons of its owner, they were, one and all, warmly welcomed by the audience, especially Dickens, Lemon, Jertold, Leech, and Cruikshank. It was a gratifying affair on all hands and most gratifying in its results. It is supposed that the net proceeds of the two performances will realize something like £700, after paying the unavoidable expenses of the theatres, advertising, &c. To their honour, be it said, not one of the gentlemen, who thus devoted their time and their talents to the aid of their less fortunate brethren would receive a fraction towards their travelling expenses from London and back. They are repaid ere this in their own hearts!

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE SINGLE CHARACTERS IN THE "AFFINITIES."

AFTER we have seen the calm image of Charlotte in its great characteristic, we may watch it in the expression of its internal emotion and its feelings. In describing the Captain, we have already hinted that his clear understanding, his insight into everything practical—altogether the security of his nature must necessarily make a lively impression upon a heart like Charlotte's. This is the more natural, as Edward's qualities cannot in any degree counterbalance his own. But how will Charlotte display herself on being thus overtaken by her feelings? Can she ever succumb to them? Can the passionate feeling ever so print itself in her heart, that she will no more be able to separate from it? According to what we have already developed, this is impossible. With an individuality sharply delineated, the manner of its emotion is always prefigured to us in the firmly-impressed fundamental characteristics. Thus at the very sight of Charlotte we are already internally convinced of that solution, which is confirmed to us in the sequel.

In our first section we have shown why, according to the subject matter and the whole keeping of our work of art, the feminine nature must stand in the foreground. The poet has, therefore, in the two feminine individualities, which exhibit to us the necessary forms of the solution in the struggle between the natural force of feeling and the law of morality, perfectly carried out the process of this development. Charlotte has, therefore, naturally had a greater abundance of thought bestowed upon her than her correlate, the captain.

According to her nature, the unfolding of this character will be completed in two necessary moments, which grow before our eyes: in the contradiction and the contest of the heart with itself, and in the perfect victory of the moral idea. According to what has been developed, the exhibition of the latter naturally takes the first position, and is disclosed on all sides in its full effectiveness. "Persons who keep the same pace must become indispensable to each other; a reciprocal good-will must result." With this reflection the poet introduces the sympathy of Charlotte for the Captain. The good-will, therefore, properly arises from this, that each one sees himself furthered by the other; it is, if we may venture on the expression, in a certain measure drawn along by the understanding in its very origin, and is not that pure disinterested feeling, which immediately seizes on the whole man, which entirely loses itself in the object, and without any reflection lives in it, on the contents and basis of feeling. Even in the manner, in which Charlotte's sympathy for her friend is for the first time shown, a remarkable trait of her individuality is brought forward. "A sure proof of her good-will was this, that she quite calmly allowed to be destroyed a beautiful resting-place, which she had particularly sought out and adorned in commencing her improvements, and which was opposed to his plan, without having even the least unpleasant sensation." If we consider that Charlotte's understanding had already approved the Captain's plan, we shall consider the voluntary abandonment of her favorite seat as a proof rather of a calm affectionate good-will than of passion, properly so called. In this trait, we already perceive that it will hardly assume the aspect of consuming passion. In general a sympathy, which only gradually increases, excludes the peculiar quality of real passion. By this, we by no means say that passion cannot and must not increase, but still, in its very commencement, it will be announced as a force, suddenly* and unconsciously penetrating the whole individuality; we must, as it were, from the first quivering of the flesh, already feel a foreboding of the consuming flame. In considering Ottilia, we shall not be in want of a voucher for what we have said, and a counterpart of what we have described.

With individuals who, by equality of pace, have become valuable to each other, the whole intensity of feeling will be preeminently manifested in those moments, when the furthering companion is to be removed from their presence. Thus, with Charlotte, the power of the feeling for her friend, which has been hitherto suppressed, breaks forth at the moment when she learns from the Count that she is to lose him. But her natural mastery over herself gives her before company an artificial self-possession. "Yet she was internally torn, nay, so moved, that she looked out for a fitting moment to withdraw from the company. The full heart was opened for the first time in solitude; the thought of the loss, which had hitherto been so far from her, through the sweet habit of living together, now maintained its full present power. The tears, already on the half-way, burst from her eyes, and now she flung herself into the narrow space of the little hermitage, and abandoned herself entirely to a pain—a passion—a despair, of the possibility of which, a few moments before, she had not even the slightest suspicion." With a nature like Charlotte's we measure, by such an outbreak of feeling, the greatness of the heart-force. If in this individuality the perfect victory of the moral consciousness over the natural force of feeling is to be exhibited, we cannot dispense with the expression of the latter, to comprehend the importance of the former. Even Charlotte must become a prey to such a moment.

This involuntary force, which the feelings, in opposition to moral consciousness, exercise upon Charlotte, is now manifested in a double way: first, in the region of imagination, and then in the domain of reality. The first forms into living shapes that which governs us internally. Here it appears as the involuntary forming power, of which man is not master, but which first rightly unveils his most internal condition. The very fact that he is unable to destroy the forms which force themselves upon his imagination, and to supply their place with others, exhibits him to us, in this activity, as the product of a "will-less" power. To have fallen so completely under this power, that the imagination must, as it were, make living the image which rests upon the ground of feeling, that, in opposition to all better knowledge, it comes forth victorious—this makes the tone of the man, at such moments, perfectly unfree, and the man himself the mere instrument of a natural power. This is shown in Charlotte at the moment, when, with her husband in her arms, she is not able to banish the image of the Captain, when each of the two impassioned persons commits the crime of thought, and the imagination, by its right, which it maintains, announces the strength which the natural force of feeling has enveloped the individual.

After such a crime, which appears in the soft element of the imagination, ought we to wonder that reality also demands its tribute, and obtains it the sooner, the more intimate the individual has made himself with the object of his affection, the more he, while apparently guiltless, has filled himself with that object? But reality properly avenges only the innocent compliance on this willingly-moving power, and, at the same time, reveals the truth of this innocence and of this play of imagination. But here also the character of the surprise must not be denied. It is not a situation derived from the subject (person), nor designed by that subject, that must unfold to us the power of the heart. This would presuppose a familiar intercourse with the enemy watching within, an open compact, which it would be difficult, nay, impossible to break—nay, the individual would already have parted with moral shame. The more involuntary all appears to be, the more chance has introduced the fatal situation, the more decidedly does the sensation, which has hitherto been kept back by circumspection break forth. Here, for the first time, it is clear, what little command the most sensible and most confident natures have over themselves, and how all real moral consistency must be gained by a struggle with the evil one. It is not until reality opens the precipice to which the individuals are led by the "affinity" of their feelings, that they completely recognise it, and trembling shrink back.

All must be combined to augment the danger for Charlotte and the Captain, and to make manifest the astonished feeling. Charlotte filled with the image of the friend, who is now about to depart, on a waving boat, at the breaking in of darkness, confided by remarkable circumstances to her friend as a beloved burden, which he is to carry to terra firma, and finally clasped in the arms of this man, who is so passionately moved, and is so dear to her, is no more able to oppose a safe resistance to the elements which thus storm upon her; her strength seems for a moment to succumb to such a special coincidence of circumstances and her nature otherwise so certain of itself to depart from its equilibrium. This moment of self-forgetfulness is however, at the same time, a turning point for Charlotte. It only serves to collect again the usual strength, which has been forced back and to summon it to energetic resistance. With a nature, which is always accustomed to be conscious of itself,—to command itself, such a moment of self-forgetfulness makes an epoch for our entire life, shows it the danger in which it is floating, and summons every power to meet it. But if man has once comprehended his inmost emotions in words, he appears before them, to a certain degree, in the character of a master. Hence Charlotte's clear moral mind celebrates here—just where it seems to have lost itself—its most beautiful triumph, which in the most eloquent exhortation to self-control manifested itself with as much dignity, as with a spirit truly feminine. "We cannot prevent this moment from making an epoch in our lives, but it depends on ourselves, whether it will be worthy of us. You must depart, dear friend, and you will depart. I can only forgive you—I can only forgive myself, if we have the courage to change our position, since it does not depend on ourselves to alter our sentiments." In these words the usual position of Charlotte is expressed in the most concentrated and all-sided manner. In this self-possession, what a trembling of the heart,—in the victory, what an uneasy care, not to tempt the strength once more and play a thoughtless game with danger!

* The German word is stronger: "urplötzlich," that is, with original suddenness.

We here penetrate the self-consciousness, of a moral, self-controlling nature, which at once considers the moment as a warning to its moral dignity, to which it has to respond, with a consciousness of guilt, which can only be atoned by persevering in the former! How equally removed from a fluttering palliation of what has happened, and a presumptuous confidence in one's own strength! How clearly at last does her pure sense distinguish that which is inevitable and not to be annihilated in the sentiments, from that which belongs to the freedom of man, and by which therefore his guilt can be alone conditioned. For it is not until that which is not to be destroyed, that region of feeling which lies beyond her power is known as such, that the individual, by means of his freedom, is able to escape its consequences. Here first begins the imputation of guilt. For the last ground, for the sentiment, which has attained the immediateness of feeling, the individual can no more be made responsible, but he can be made so, if he does not voluntarily endeavour to free himself from the dark power he has recognised. Hence all that Charlotte can require of herself and her friend is to change their positions. This first brings to the light of day, that which ripens in the deepest abyss, this first calls forth the fatality of an invincible sentiment to a tragic conflict, in which it is certain of victory.

SONNET.

No. XLVII.

THERE was a time I hoped to find repose—
Hoped that life's troubles would ere long be past—
Small troubles those; they were not such, as cast
On the heart, scorch it till it wildly glows.—
YES I then hoped that I should shortly close
The gate upon all worldly troubles fast,
And calmly seek in mine own soul at last
That holy fount which for the chosen flows.
But all those tranquil hopes are now no more;
They were young dreams of what could never be.
'Tis mine to float on waters without shore,
Without a goal:—repose is not for me.
And I will bid the angry billows roar,
Hating repose. Roll on, thou stormy sea.—N. D.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

PRINCESS'S.—This theatre closed for the season on Saturday night. The entertainments consisted of some minor pieces, the principal parts of which were sustained by Mr. Charles Mathews. Mr. Maddox, in the course of the evening, delivered the following address:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—After having, with the exception of a vacation of ten days, kept open house continually for two-and-twenty months, I, thanks to your kind patronage, bring my season, for the seventh time, to a successful termination. My expenditure has been great, but your generous support has not only enabled me to reimburse myself, but has given me a fair margin of profit into the bargain. I do not, ladies and gentlemen, make so unwise a boast as to say that 'This is the only theatre in which the legitimate drama has found a refuge'—or hazard so unfounded an assertion as that, 'even when Shakspeare speaks, it is to scanty audiences;' on the contrary, Shakspeare does speak here, has spoken here, to anything but 'scanty audiences,' as crowded audiences and my pocket can testify. I think that we are as 'legitimate' as anybody. Mr. Macready and Mrs. Butler are 'legitimate,' lawful children—true representatives of our divine bard. And is not the talented Miss Cushman—whom I first had the honour of introducing to a British public—'legitimate,' too? And, by the way, I am proud to tell you that I have formed an engagement with that lady to appear in Shaksperian plays, in conjunction with Mr. Macready, on the opening of our next campaign. If that be not 'legitimate,' I know not what is. After all, the true test of public opinion is well-filled benches, such as I now see around me, and the very first season that, in making up my accounts, I find that I am a loser, I shall think 'there is something rotten in the state of Denmark,' and that my mode of catering for your amusement is unpalatable; but until that time arrives I shall pursue my present course, exerting all my energies to please, to give you every satisfaction; and, when I issue my programme for the forthcoming season, I feel convinced that the important engagements it will announce will secure a continuance of your kind patronage. For the unvarying success which has attended my labours as lessee of this theatre, I beg to tender you my most sincere thanks; and, furling the banner of the Princess's for a few weeks, in the name of myself and the ladies and gentlemen of this establishment, I most gratefully and respectfully bid you farewell."

We are very well pleased to hear that Mr. Maddox has obtained a fair "margin of profit," as he poetically calls it, to reimburse him for his expenditure, and we agree with him that it would be unwise to make a boast "that his was the only theatre in which the legitimate drama had found a refuge"—simply because it would not be true. Certainly Mr. Maddox has flown his endeavours at the highest quarry of legitimacy, and if he has not always succeeded in running down the game to the best advantage, it must be attributed to combinations of circumstances over which he could have no control. It is only at the Princess's Theatre that one of the greatest actors of modern times, Macready, has now a chance of being seen. In the double engagement of Macready and Miss Cushman, the manager is determined to take the theatrical town by storm; and if these great artists be well-supported by a creditable company—we don't want all Cushmans and Macreadys—we have much faith in the issue, and prognosticate a plenary harvest to the treasury of the Princess's. Now have we some hopes of seeing King John performed, and Henry the Eighth, and other plays of Shakspeare, not hackneyed of late, and performed to perfection as far as the principal parts are concerned. We cannot conclude without wishing Mr. Maddox every success in his endeavour to uphold the Shaksperian drama at this theatre, and trust that the issue of the season approaching may be such as his fondest expectations would warrant.

Mr. Maddox liberally granted his theatre on Thursday night for a performance for the benefit of the deceased actor, Mr. Walton. The Wife of Sheridan Knowles, Mrs. Fanny Butler taking the part of the heroine, and Mr. Creswick that of the hero; the farce of Somebody Else, with Mr. C. Mathews and Madame Vestris as Hans and Minnie; the Jacobite, with Mr. Buckstone as John Duck; and the farce of Early Closing, constituted the entertainments of the evening. The house was well attended.

SADLER'S WELLS.—A section from the late Drury Lane Operatic Company have been giving entertainments at this house for some time past. The corps consist of the Misses Rainforth and Rebecca Isaacs, and Messrs. Allen, Borrani, Horncastle, &c.; the band is by no means indifferent, and the choruses seem well trained. We strolled eastwards a few nights since, and saw Maritana very creditably performed at the Sadler's Wells. Allen's Don Caesar was decidedly the best operatic Don we have seen, and the other parts were well filled, Maritana being sustained by Miss Rainforth in her usual unpretending and expressive manner. The operas already performed by the Company, besides Maritana, we understand, have been Sonnambula, Norma, &c. Mr. Tully is the conductor, and Mr. Griesbach the leader—both highly efficient officers.

SURREY.—A son of the celebrated John Reeve made his first appearance on the stage on Monday evening at this theatre. He took his father's great part of Marmaduke Magog, in the Wreck Ashore, and, taking all things into account, acquitted himself very creditably. As yet he is a mere novice in many of the ways and appliances of the stage, and at times appeared sufficiently awkward in consequence; but, nevertheless, the true vis comica was apparent, and the paternal whim and raciness were not wanting, and the shuffling gait, and broad grin, that were wont to set the Adelphi audiences in a roar, were by no means faintly reflected. Mr. Reeve's person is good: he sings and dances right well, and, in short, has apparently every requisite to make a good comedian. After the piece he was called for and received with great applause. Mr. Buckstone played his original part of Jemmy Starling.

ASTLEY'S.—A new grand equestrian piece, entitled The Prince of Cyprus, or the Horse of the Elements, was produced on Monday evening with the most brilliant success. It is in reality one of the most gorgeous and surprising spectacles ever got up even at this house. The scenery is magnificent in the extreme, and the dresses and accessories of the scene on the same scale of grandeur. The feats of horsemanship are novel and striking; nor is the story indifferent for a piece of this kind. The plot is sufficiently interesting, and the fortunes of the Prince are watched with anxiety from the beginning. Barry, as Squire to the Prince, was excellent, and kept the audience in a continual scream of laughter while he was on the stage. The only drawback to the performance was an accident that happened to Miss Henry, who was performing the Princess. In descending from her horse, in the second act, she slipped and injured her ankle so much, that her place was assigned to another artiste in the establishment.

DEATH OF MRS. EGERTON.

Mrs. EGERTON, the well-known tragic actress, expired at her residence in Chelsea, on Tuesday, the 3rd instant. She was contemporaneous with Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Powell, Miss O'Neil, and Mrs. Bartley. Mrs. Egerton was born at Torrington in Devonshire, in the year 1782. Her father was the Rev. Peter Fisher, rector of Torrington. She made her first appearance on the stage at Bath in 1803. It was here she first saw Egerton, her future husband, who was a performer in the same company in which she was engaged. In a few years she made great progress in her studies, and her name had reached the metropolis. In 1810 she appeared at Covent Garden in Juliet. Mrs. Siddons' retirement from the stage in 1809 had left the tragic throne vacated, and it was expected that the new actress would, when time and experience had wrought their good results in her, have supplied the space left void by the great ex-tragedian. But a more dangerous rival than Mrs. Siddons started up in the person of Miss O'Neil, who in a few years after the death of the great actress burst upon the London public, like a sunrise at midnight. More dangerous than Mrs. Siddons, we have said, inasmuch as Mrs. Egerton had to stand comparison side by side with Miss O'Neil, and from playing the same parts, was more exposed to relative criticism. The consequence was that Mrs. Egerton abdicated the higher provinces of tragedy, and condescended to adopt the juvenile and melodrama. She soon found the latter to be her true forte, and indeed nothing of the kind could hardly be better than her Ravina in the Miller and his Men, Meg Merrilies, Helen Macgregor, Madge Wildfire, &c., &c. Upon her husband assuming the government of Sadler's Wells, she quitted Covent Garden. The first piece in which she appeared at this theatre was Joan of Arc, and so successful was her performance of the heroine, that the piece ran the whole season. She afterwards joined the Surrey corps, and subsequently was incorporated with the Olympic company. When Joanna Baillie's tragedy of De Montford was revived for Edmund Kean at Drury Lane, Mrs. Egerton was engaged to play Jane de Montford. In 1832, Egerton and Abbott became lessees of the Coburg Theatre, which name they changed into that of the Victoria. After a few years performances at this theatre, Mrs. Egerton felt that her powers began to fail her, and she retired from the stage altogether. She died at the age of sixty-five. Mrs. Egerton was a member of the Covent Garden Theatrical Fund. Her remains were interred in Chelsea church last Saturday.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN VOICE.

If there should be at any time a doubt as to the extent of the concrete interval, let stress be applied at its summit. When the interval is a note, the two sounds will form the commencement of the diatonic scale: for, with a little experience, the course of this scale can always be recognised upon the execution of its first and second degrees. The diphthongal sound of a does then, in this case, pass through the concrete interval of a tone; the movement being divided between the sounds of a and e, the first gliding imperceptibly into the last. But as the question here refers to the extent of the interval traversed, and to its upward direction, as well as to its concrete progress, it is necessary to guard against the utterance of the literal element with any emotion: for if it be done in a plaintive manner, with surprise, interrogation, or other impressive sentiments, or as if it were the close of a sentence, the concrete will be some other interval than the tone, or will move in a downward direction; this tone or second being, as will be shown hereafter, the instinctive mode of intonation, by which the mind denotes its simple thoughts exclusively of feeling or passion. I have called the first part of the concrete, or that of a, in the above instance, the Radical Movement: because, with a full beginning or opening, the following portion of the concrete proceeds from it as from a base or root. I have called the last part, or that of e, in the example, the Vanishing Movement, from its becoming gradually weaker as it rises, and finally dying away in the upper extreme of the tone. It must strike the reader that these terms can have only a reference to the two extremes of the concrete, since the gradual change of the radical into the vanishing movement prevents our assigning an exact point of distinction between them. When a single alphabetic sound, capable of prolongation, is uttered with propriety and smoothness, and without emotion, it commences full and somewhat abruptly, and gradually decreases in its upward movement until it becomes inaudible: having the increments of time in rise, and the decrements of fullness equally progressive. Let us call this movement the Equable Concrete. The varied mode of the vocal function in Song and Recitative, may help to illustrate the nature of this equability of the rising movement of speech. The long-drawn voice of one continued pitch, which we hear in Song and Recitative, is prodded in two ways. First—by giving the greatest proportion of time and volume to one continuous pitch, or to a level line of sound, if I may so call it, in the radical place; and by subsequently passing concretely, lightly, and rapidly through the vanishing portion. Let us call this the Protracted Radical. Secondly—by passing concretely, lightly, and rapidly through the radical, and then prolonging the voice with greater volume on a level line at the highest point of the vanish, let us call this the Protracted Vanish. Thus far then intonation exhibits three modifications of the radical and vanishing movement—the Equable Concrete of speech, the Protracted Radical, and the Protracted Vanish, both of which are used in Song and Recitative. But we shall have occasion to learn, as we proceed, the various relationships of the concrete to all the simple and compounded intervals, to the alphabetic elements, to time and to force. I have spoken of the radical and vanishing movement through a tone, with a view to explain, by that interval, the nature of the concrete rise, and its division into the parts that have been named. But in taking a wider survey of this subject we shall learn that this function, with all its properties, is performed on every other interval of the scale. Thus, if we ascend concretely from the seventh to the eighth degree, by the alternate use of a and e, as represented by the sixth diagram, that is, by laying a stress on the two extremes of this interval, the voice will have a plaintive character very different from that of the tone, or interval between the first and second. Now the interval from the seventh to the eighth place of the diatonic scale is a semitone. This plaintive concrete therefore when attenuated, or made what I have called equable, by gradually diminishing the stress at its upper extreme, as represented in the seventh diagram, is the radical and vanishing movement of a semitone. Again, if we ascend concretely upon a and e, from the first to the third place of the scale, by laying a stress on e in that third place, the effect of this continuous movement will differ from that of the tone and of the semitone: for it will resemble a moderate degree of interrogation made on the element a. This concrete when attenuated, or made equable by diminishing the stress on its upper extreme, is the radical and vanishing movement of a third. By a process analogous to that just proposed for distinguishing the interval of a third, we may ascertain the concrete movement of a fifth, and of an octave. For these, with stress at their upper extremes, have an interrogative expression like that of the third, but each successively more emphatic or earnest in its degree, and then by diminishing the stress, as directed in the former cases, we have respectively the radical and vanishing movements of the fifth and the octave. In this manner then the ear perceives, under their various degrees and characteristics, the several vocal movements of a rising radical and vanishing semitone—of a tone or second—of a major and a minor third—of a fifth—and of an octave. But these intervals have their proper significations in the expression of speech, and will be particularly noticed elsewhere. I say nothing here of a radical and vanishing fourth, sixth, and seventh, nor of higher ranges than the octave; not because the voice does not perform these intervals, but because a reference to the above-named points is sufficiently precise for the purposes of our history.

SHAKSPERE'S HOUSE.

THE announcement which appeared in the London journals on Saturday, the 7th inst., relative to the sale of Shakspeare's birth-place at Stratford-on-Avon, historically considered, requires but little comment. The gentlemen of Warwickshire have aroused themselves at the eleventh hour. To avoid the foreclosing of a mortgage of very trifling amount, the Shaksperian property was allowed to pass into the hands of strangers. The whole of the premises in Henley-street were purchased by a licensed victualler, named Court, whose son still holds possession; but, from family disagreements, a final appeal is to be made on the 16th of next month to the ordeal of a public auction, and the produce of this memorable sale will be divided among the legal expectants. Thus far all seems fair and equitable; yet, from opinions, gossipings, and gatherings, attained throughout the wide range of the county—in Coventry, in Kenilworth, Warwick, and Birmingham—there appears to be a conflict of feeling and an apathy of action; and in the same spirit that Walter Savage Landor deprecated the "chattering and chewing" of the annual festivals at Stratford-on-Avon, so, too, did a writer in the Morning Post of the 25th of April, 1846, speak of the nonsense enacted at the Town-hall—the folly of polkas performed by "children at half price," and the one flute and a harp, that was to do honour to the immortal memory of Shakspeare! The same writer predicted that ere long every relic of Shakspeare having been exhausted—the mulberry tree, which a thrifty wight, not inaptly named "Sharp," purchased from the Rev. Mr. Gasbit, entirely used up—they, the townsmen of Stratford, would next sell the house itself! to be "sawn into quantities," and distributed for various considerations. The recent advertisements of Mr. Robins, the auctioneer, prove but too truly the accuracy of the writer. The birth-place of Shakspeare has now become a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence! That the present unseemly struggle might have been avoided at the time that the last descendant of Shakspeare fell into difficulties, and mortgaged the property, is evident—a very trifling subscription among the inhabitants of the borough of Stratford would have secured the hallowed building from the chances of a public auction; but, alas! it would seem that what time, the destroyer, has spared, meanness, folly, and cupidity, have at length endangered. From information gathered upon the spot within the last few days, it appears that no less than four American speculators are on the alert, minute questions have been asked as to the soundness of the frame work, and the possibility of removing the timbers to North America. Private offers have been made, said to be to the amount of from four to five thousand pounds. The sum of three hundred pounds is stated to have been offered for the collection of the visitors' books, or, more correctly speaking, the albums kept for visitors. These books contain the autographs of many of the illustrious dead, and also of the living—Sir Walter Scott, Lockhart, Byron, Moore, Sheridan Knowles, Charles Dickens, and indeed every name distinguished in literature and science. A very curious one appears, dated July 12, 1847:—

"Sir Thomas Phillips, Bart., Middlehall, the discoverer of Shakspeare's marriage bond."

And among a variety of Russian nobility appears, written in excellent style—"Helena, Grand Duchess of Russia." The variety of all descriptions of adulatory verse is highly amusing, but the best is that inscribed on a tablet, and said to have been written by Lucien Buonaparte:—

"The eyes of genius glisten to admire
How memory hails the sound of Shakspeare's lyre!
One tear he shed to form a crystal shrine,
For all that's great, immortal, and divine!"

If Lucien did not write quite so well as Napoleon slaughtered, at all events the compliment of the Corsican is to be duly appreciated. These albums, or visitors' books, unquestionably form a curious collection—curiosities in calligraphy and orthography, and mementos of the "good, bad, and indifferent." Not less interesting are the pencilled memorials of visitors on the walls and ceiling of this time-honoured room. The following beautiful passage of Shakspeare's own writing may be faintly traced, and its application is not inapposite:—

"He makes sweet music with the enamelled stones, Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge
He overtaketh in his pilgrimage;
And so by many winding nooks he strays,
With willing sport, to the wild ocean."

And it is just possible, that some wag, in order to check the garrulity of the middle-aged sybil who at present shows the building, has quoted the lines from All's Well that Ends Well—

"Love all, trust a few,
Do wrong to none! be able for thine enemy
Rather in power than use, and keep thy friend
Under thine own life's key; be checked for silence,
But never taxed for speech."

The excellent moral philosophy of this passage must strike upon the hearts of all who can think; there are various others, gleaned from the same source, and applied to the same purpose. Apart, however, from poetical or historical recollections, it is necessary to place the statement of the Shaksperian Society, dated August 2, 1847, with that afforded to the writer on the morning of Thursday last, in the very room in which Shakspeare was born—and, moreover, in the presence of another gentleman from London, who, by permission, took notes of the conversation. Mr. Court as did also Mrs. Court, entirely objected to that part of the following extract from the circular put forth by the society marked in italics:—

"That portion of the property which belongs to the Court family, and which is to be sold on the 16th of September, consists of the rooms which have been always exhibited as the house in which the poet was born, and of the Swan and Maidenhead public-house, on the east side of it; but there are likewise within the area of the property, on the western side, belonging to Mrs. Izod, four tenements, three of which were apparently erected or converted into habitations at the beginning of the last century, for before that period they seemed to be unnoticed; and the fourth, which, from the continuation of the framed timber front, and from the old doorways communicating internally, evidently forms part of the birth-place, but which, in 1771, was separated from it." The committee have much satisfaction in stating that they have, within the last few days, purchased of Mrs. Izod the four tenements above-mentioned, for the sum of £320, which, as it puts them in actual possession of a part of the house in which Shakspeare was born, cannot but be regarded as a most important acquisition at the present moment. The price which the committee have given for this part of the property, and for the advantage of at once securing it, may probably be referred to as some indication of the amount required for the purchase of the larger and more valuable portion of it, which they understand realises from the rental of the inn, and the exhibition of the birth-place, from £80 to £100 of annual income. The committee, at the same time that they do not venture to announce any more definite estimate of the value of the property, which is to be sold on the 16th of September, wish it to be understood that a very considerable amount will be required to carry out their views as regards the purchase of the property, and the placing it in the most favourable position for its future conservation, independently of effecting the further intentions of the committee already indicated."

The annual income from the business of the inn, and the gratuities arising from showing the birth-place, is said to exceed £300, per annum, and sometimes much more; in fact, varying according to the enthusiasm of the visitors, and their several characters: very large sums have been given for the privilege of sleeping in the chief apartment—ten, and even twenty guineas. And taking into consideration that the gratuities from an annual influx of an average number of four thousand visitors is rarely less than half-a-crown, the statement of the present holders of the property appears to be correct. Without impugning therefore the statement hazarded by the society which is at present so nobly exerting itself, and from the evidence of the visitor's books, the property is far more valuable than has been estimated, and will consequently require additional exertions for its obtainment. The suggestion of Harriet Martineau is in itself excellent, if practicable. She says—

"In every town and neighbourhood set on foot a penny subscription. Speak of the matter all of you, wherever you go. You will all of you give your pennies. Such of you as can spare a little time, and do not mind a little trouble, make yourselves agents and collectors. If you want information, or desire to transmit your funds, write to 'C. H. Bracebridge, Esq., the Hall, Atherstone, Warwickshire.' Mr. Bracebridge is the honorary secretary of the Stratford Committee. He will forward circulars to any of you who wish for a printed account of the business. One thing you will be glad to hear. Lord Morpeth has written to the committee to say that the Woods and Forests' department will accept the charge of preserving the house, if it is once bought. It will thus be taken care of without further charge; and all we have to do is to raise the purchase-money now. I will say nothing about the disgrace in the eyes of the world if this object is not accomplished, for I do not wish to appeal to your fears. My appeal is to your better affections—to your reverence and love. By all the noble thoughts that Shakspeare has aroused in you, I appeal to you to honour him now. By all his noble thoughts—by the philosophy of Brutus and the mirth of Rosakind—by the remorse of Macbeth and the innocence of Desdemona—by the dreams of Hamlet and the fidelity of Imogen—by the misery of Othello and the patience of Cordelia—I appeal to you to honour Shakspeare now. And according to your love and reverence of him, be quick and diligent in your work."

It is a pleasing task to announce that steps are being taken, both in Coventry and Warwick, for the carrying out this suggestion. In Kenilworth, small, comparatively speaking, as the place is, the subject is warmly mooted. Strange, however, it may be to say, the town of Stratford-on-Avon is the dullest in the whole movement; the inhabitants appear to be, with a few exceptions, "waiters of Providence," sitting still and waiting for the wind to blow them along. The Royal Shaksperian Society, as stated in the Morning Post, already alluded to, has been divided against itself; Mouldy has quarrelled with Bullcalf—Wart has entered his execution against Feeble—and Dogberry has made his protest.

"There are a sort of men whose visages
Do cream and mantle like a standing pool.

As who should say—I am Sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips let no dog bark."

Without offering any invidious allusions, there can be no harm in hoping that a little more life and spirit will be evinced by the inhabitants of Stratford, and that while calling upon Hercules they will put their own shoulders to the wheel. As far as the patronage of the townsmen of Stratford-on-Avon extends to the drama, and just within bow-shot of where Shakspeare died, is the theatre. This classically arranged building has been closed since the winter, and the pieces then played, and most heroically applauded, were adaptations from Jack Shepherd, a trifle of dancing, and a few songs. The same class of amusement is at this time being pursued at Warwick. The latter, however, being an assize town, there may be some cogent reason for such exhibitions. With regard to the sacred spot that holds the ashes of Shakspeare in the chancel of the parish church, it is true that the visitor may see the bust of Shakspeare, and remember the oft-quoted lines on Malone:—

"Stranger, to whom this monument is shown,
Invoke the poet's curses on Malone—
Whose meddling zeal his barbarous taste displays,
And daubs his tombstone, as he marr'd his plays."

But the valedictory inscription said to have been written by himself, commencing—

"Good friend for Jesus' sake forbear," is carefully covered over with matting, and entirely hidden from the view of the pilgrim stranger.

REVIEWS OF NEW MUSIC.

"Les Voltigeurs," Deuxieme Quadrille Militaire, composed and dedicated to Monsieur HENRI HEWITT, of Cork, by AUGUSTUS WEISBECKER. EWER AND CO.

The quadrilles dedicated to Mons., the gentleman from Cork—how strange Monsieur Paddy sounds—though very light, are indeed very pretty. They have all the requisites of music of the sort, at least of such as is only intended for the piano. Some of the tunes are quite exhilarating. The accompaniments are simple to a degree, there being scarcely a modulation in the whole set, if we except the finale.

"The Shepherd's Mountain Song;" Ballad, sung by Miss RAINFORTH, &c. Written and composed by J. HALFORD. S. NELSON, New Bond-street.

There is something characteristic in the above song, but the strain is not elevated beyond the common, and the form is not symmetrical. It is moulded too slavishly after the fashion of the old ballads, without possessing a particle of their grace and tenderness. The Shepherd's Song, however, has a catching tune, and that is the first germ of popularity in music. Mr. Halford's numbers are very so!

"The Limerick Lasses Polka," composed for the piano by AUGUSTUS WEISBECKER. EWER AND CO.

When we read the name of these dances, we expected to have found them taken from Irish subjects, or the characteristic of Irish music copied. We found neither. What then? Why, we were inclined to call the Limerick Lasses Polka, or rather Polkas, for there are four of them, a decided misnomer. Nevertheless, these Polkas are cleverly written, and exhibit a pretty fancy, if not a decided originality in the author. The last is the best.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THERE has been nothing new since our last. MISs. Lind has played three times:—on Saturday, in Roberto; on Tuesday in I Masnadieri; and on Thursday in La Sonnambula. The ballet performances have offered no change. On Saturday and Thursday the houses were immense; on Tuesday the audience was far less numerous—the failure of Verdi's opera being incontestable. As there are yet two more performances to take place, and our analysis of the season will occupy an unusual quantity of space, we shall defer it till next week.

To-night La Figlia; on Tuesday Le Nozze di Figaro, and on Saturday the last night of the season.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

ON Saturday the Lucrezia Borgia was performed, with the ballet of the Peri. We have nothing new to record of the opera, or the performance, except that it appeared to us that Grisi sang better than on any former occasion in Lucrezia. Sooth to say, we never heard her sing more divinely than she did on Saturday. Her "Come, e bello," was perfectly faultless, and was warbled by her with all the thrilling expression and brilliant intonation that won us from ourselves when first we heard her in the Puritani. And then her last song, "Era desso il mio figlio,"—who that has a heart could have an unwet eye and listen to such strains? As warbled by Grisi, they might draw tears from the iron lids of Vulcan. The performance of Lucrezia Borgia is one of the most complete triumphs of the Royal Italian Opera, and was as splendid as ever on Saturday night. The chorus, "Bando e triste," was as usual encoored, as was also the trio in the second act by Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini; and Alboni received, according to custom, a double encore in the ballata of the last scene in the third act. All the performers were called for after each act, and Grisi was summoned three times at the fall of the curtain. Verily, there is a Grisi-mania, as well as a Lind-mania. By the way, why did Mario, who sang so finely on Saturday, omit his grand scena in the last act? The house was exceedingly full.

The Gazza Ladra was repeated on Tuesday for the third time; and here again we have nothing new to notice. That the opera with such a cast as that including Grisi, Tamburini, Alboni, Mario, Marini, Tagliafico, Polonini, &c. should create such a furor as it did previously, was inevitable. We have no expression, save that of unqualified praise, to bestow on the performance of the Gazza Ladra.

When we heard the Semiramide the first night of the season at the Royal Italian Opera, we avowed that we had never heard it before. We may conscientiously aver the same of the Donna del Lago, produced on Thursday last, for until then we had never been present at a complete representation of Rossini's delightful work. We had formerly listened to the music interpreted by all the great artistes. Donzelli, Rubini, Zuchelli, Pisaroni, and Blasis, had we seen in one cast; and in another, Curioni, Rubini, Tamburini, Brambilla, and Grisi. The greater part of the music was familiar to us from hearing it often; yet, somehow, had the opera an unfixed idea in our mind, and we could hardly even be prevailed upon to give an opinion of the work, so vague and incomplete was the impression it had produced. We can only account for this by supposing that heretofore we had never heard the whole of the music, and that what we had heard, excepting the solos, duos, and quartets, had never been given in a complete form. The opera was sacrificed to the singers. No such sacrifices took place at Covent Garden on Thursday. Rossini was regarded before the artistes. The representation of La Donna del Lago on that evening, was one of the most complete ever witnessed on any stage. Indeed, if we were compelled to award the palm of excellence to the production of one opera at Covent Garden above the rest during the season, we should not hesitate to affix our fiat to the Donna del Lago. The getting up of this opera is truly a magnificent climax to the season. After the production of so many operas, each of which was a triumph, it must have been gratifying to the directors to find that the last vigorous struggle in a glorious cause was the most successful of all, and that the public responded with the utmost enthusiasm. Before further allusion to the opera, it is necessary to give a list of the dramatis personæ, which was as follows:—

James V., { King of Scotland, under the name of Hubert, Knight of Snowdon, }	Signor Mario,
Douglas of Angus, - - - - -	Signor Marini,
Roderick Dhu, - - - - -	Signor Bettini,
Malcolm Grème, - - - - -	Madlle. Alboni,
Ellen, - - - - -	Made. Grisi,
Albina, - - - - -	Made. Bellini,
Sereno, - - - - -	Signor Lavia,
	Signor Rovere,
	Signor Tagliafico,
Principal Bards, - - - - -	Signor Polonini,
	Signor P. Ley,
	Signor Piacentini,
	Signor Tulli.

The completeness with which the opera was done may be instanced by the single fact, that the singers who played the principal bards were among the leading members of the company, and had to make their appearance, unnamed and unrecognised, merely to join in the finale to the first act; and, indeed, the assistance they rendered to this inimitable morceau could not be over-estimated. The finale was sung throughout in a manner that would have roused to musical fury the dormant faculties of the composer himself. It is one of the grandest compositions of the great maestro, and is surpassed by nothing in his works, if we except the finale to the second act of Guillaume Tell. The music of the Donna del Lago is often beautiful, and always original. It is a pure specimen of the romantic opera. Here we find no violent feelings required to be embodied; no terrible situations demanding forced efforts from the composer; neither denunciations, madness, fear, tears, fire, rapine, or death. None of the furies—those particular friends of Verdi—are summoned from the horrid cell to mop and mow before the groundlings. All is calm and unforced; natural and easy; touching and beautiful. Who but a genius that felt the greatest confidence in his own power would have undertaken to illustrate the exquisite though simple story of the Lady of the Lake by music? Who would have dared to do it that did not feel within himself an ever-springing fount of melody, which alone could give a beauty and a meaning to the subject? The Donna del Lago is positively flooded with melody. From first to last there is hardly a phrase but what has something new and striking. We paid the utmost attention to the opera on Thursday night, and only found two morceaux we could have wished elsewhere. All the remainder, so we thought, was unexceptionably beautiful. These morceaux were the cabaletta, "Cielo! in quel estasi," to the duet, "Sei già sposa;"

and the last motivo of Malcolm's song, "Ah! si pera," the song itself being one of the loveliest things in the opera. These excepted we think the Donna del Lago an opera perfect at all points. The singing of Grisi, Alboni, and Mario we never heard surpassed—might we not say equalled? What a splendid refutation to the remark we have sometimes read, and sometimes been compelled to listen to—viz. "that Grisi was only great on great occasions, and that tragedy only could call forth her powers"—was the Diva's performance on Thursday! In her freshest day her voice was never fresher, never more delicious, never more pure. On her lovely brow—how lovely she looked!—sat consciousness winking, as though she would say to the audience, "Come, put tragedy and acting out of the question, and answer candidly, can Jenny Lind sing like that?" And she looked as if she knew they could but answer in the negative. She was encored, with Mario, in the favorite duet of the second act, which contains the air, "Aurora ah sorgerai," the prominent strain of the opera. She and Mario were also excellent in the andante movement of the duet, "Sei già sposa," which was exquisitely given. Mario was in finer voice than we have heard him this season, and seemed to relish the music with his whole heart and soul. He sang most splendidly in the duet. Grisi and Alboni were encored in the duet of the second act, "Ciel! quel destin terrible," a most exquisite piece of music, and admirably suited to exhibit the vocal powers of the two incomparable artistes. We do not think we ever heard ensemble-singing so absolutely faultless as that of Grisi and Alboni in this duet. The scena finale rests entirely with Elena, and here Grisi surprised every one of her hearers by her execution of the most difficult passages, and by the precision, power, and beauty of her voice. She herself never sang this brilliant morceau with more perfection, and the simultaneous shout of applause that shook the house when the curtain fell, evidenced the delight of the audience at hearing Grisi once more in her favourite character. Alboni, in Malcolm, appeared in the most important part she has yet sustained. Much, no doubt, was expected from the great contralto in Malcolm, a character which Pisaroni formerly made herself so famous in, and the recollection of which had not faded from the memory of many who witnessed Alboni on Thursday. We do not hesitate to give the preference to Alboni over Pisaroni, in this, or any other part. Pisaroni never had the voice of Alboni, and though, perhaps, as much a mistress of the art of singing, and gifted with a more powerful-toned organ, she never produced the same effect upon an audience as Alboni. The fair contralto's opening scena, "Elena, O tu," and the last motivo "O, quante lagrime," were incomparably better sung than ever we heard them before. We really do not think it would have been possible to have found a flaw in her singing. Never was a voice more adapted to a love-wail than Alboni's. There is such a honey-sweetness in the tones, such a hidden pathos, a sub-plaintiveness, added to the most intense expression, that it makes it the happiest vehicle for the heart's love-utterings. Alboni's recitative singing proves her to be the consummate artist, as much as her aria and cavatina. The opening recitative to the "Elena, O tu," was magnificently given. Her most beautiful effort during the evening was the love song, "Ah si pera," a composition worthy of Rossini, and full of fine feeling. No words can do justice to Alboni's reading of this song. It made the whole house pulsate as if it had been one heart—and a heart moved with one delight. Mario, in every respect, was incomparable in the disguised king. He was dressed to perfection and looked extremely handsome. He sang most beautifully throughout. He restored the fine song, "Pace non trovo," in the second act, and gave it with immense effect. He was encored in the "Aurora ah sorgerai," in the last act, given behind the scenes. Marini was excellent in the first part of the opera. His want of upper notes told much against him in the quartet, "Cielo il mio labbro aspira," but he came out in the fine scene, "Taci, lo voglio," and in the cabaletta produced a great effect by his forte singing. To Signor Bettini was given decidedly the most onerous character of the opera; as in Roderick Dhu he has neither catching melodies to sing, nor is the part invested with any histrionic interest. We never heard a singer who could give the music of this part with any particular effect excepting Donzelli. The overpowering voice of that extraordinary tenor was just suited to the music of Roderick Dhu, and the singers since his time have done little else than fail in the part. Signor Bettini gave the music all the boldness and breadth it demanded. He sang with great taste and expression in the quartet, "Cielo, il mio labbro." The fall of the curtain was the signal for an absolute furor. First, in answer to the uproar, came on all the principals; then Grisi, per se; then again Grisi; then Costa was called for, and came on with Grisi; then Alboni, when Costa led both on; and then the tumult was appeased. We were much pleased that the audience, though at the eleventh hour, deemed Signor Costa worthy a special summons. No small part of the success of the season must be attributed to his skill, judgment, and determination. In every opera his band and chorus have wrung applause from very opposition, and perfection was attained where perfection was never dreamed of before. The manner in which he managed the chorus, the band on the stage, and his own orchestra, in the working out the three different subjects of the finale to the first act of La Donna del Lago, would be enough to rank him among the first of conductors. We shall have more to say of Signor Costa's good conductorship next week, when we shall furnish a resumé of the season.

Mdlle. Plunkett appeared, after the opera, in the Spanish pas, La Manola; and then followed La Rosiera, in which Mdlle. Fuoco achieved her usual success.

To-night La Donna del Lago will be repeated, with a new divertissement called La Nayade, composed by Signor Casati for the charming and intelligent Mdlle. Plunkett.

MR. EDITOR,—In your number, giving the notice of the Melodist's Meeting, it is said that prizes are annually given for English vocal compositions, and I can often see that some such prize has just been awarded, but can never hear of them before-hand. Now perhaps you can tell me how to learn when premiums are held out to competitors, as it is rather tantalizing to be always "a day after the fair." By so doing, you will greatly oblige

A COUNTRY PROFESSOR.

CHURCH MUSIC.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Having been informed by a musical friend that if I wished to hear the musical portion of the service efficiently performed I must go to St. Phillips', Stepney, on Sunday fortnight I did so, and was much pleased to observe it was performed after the manner of our cathedral service. The choir numbered about twenty and consisted chiefly of amateurs who had been trained by a choir-master, under the direction of the incumbent and his curate, both of whom joined ably in the musical portion of the service, setting a good example to the congregation. The Psalms for the day were chanted, Decani and Cantoris, to one of the fine old Gregorian chants. The Te Deum and Jubilata was King's service in F., one of the most useful services we have. The anthem was the "Blessed," by Kent. If I were disposed to be critical I might make some suggestions, such as the advantage that would be gained by ladies sitting near the choir and singing the verse parts instead of the boys, but where the service is generally so well performed, I can only hope that other churches in the neighbourhood will follow the example of St. Phillips', Stepney.

On Sunday week I went to St. Paul's, Chelsea, a church where I was informed the minister had been paying much attention to the improvement of the music. From its locality I expected to find a highly respectable congregation, nor was I disappointed, for long before the time of the commencement of Divine service every free sitting was occupied, and nearly every pew. The zeal and anxiety of the congregation to get seats put me in mind of those beautiful lines of Dr. Watts:—

"How did my heart rejoice to hear
My friends devoutly say, &c."

Here also I was much delighted to find an efficient choir of about twenty, performing Tallis's matchless service, chanting the Psalms, singing Dr. Boyce's Te Deum and Jubilata in A, with the other portions of the service, many of the congregation having provided themselves with the music, and thereby rendering themselves as competent to take part in the singing as the choir. How very desirable it would be if this plan was generally adopted; and how much more interesting to the congregation if they would take the trouble to qualify themselves to obey that part of the service when the clerk says, "Let us sing to the praise and glory of God." How many congregations there are that never attempt to sing at all! I am happy to observe this is not the custom at the above two churches.

On Sunday last hearing that Divine service was to be performed in Exeter Hall, a place so celebrated for Classical Sacred Music, where so much has been done by the Sacred Harmonic Society, with a view to create a more improved taste in the minds of the public for sacred music generally, I was anxious to hear how the singing would be conducted, and expected to hear some individual with stentorian lungs lustily singing the treble part of the tune, as is the case at the religious meetings annually held there, and in most dissenting congregations, but, to my surprise and astonishment, the first musical sound that greeted my ear was from a tuning fork from which the precentor gave the key note to an efficient choir, consisting of three melodious female voices, and about as many each alto, tenor, and bass voices, the precentor singing the tenor part, and with much skill and judgment guiding the whole. The shrill, piercing tone of the treble voices kept the vast assembly, which consisted of from 1500 to 2000 persons, well up to concert pitch, and the effect on all musical ears must have been most harmonious and spiritualizing. It appears that the reason of Exeter Hall being used for Divine worship arises from the circumstance of the enlargement of the Scotch Church in Crown Court, over which the Rev. Dr. Cumming is pastor, and it is expected that the Hall will be used for this purpose for the next three months. The Doctor preached an eloquent and appropriate discourse from the 18th chapter of St. Matthew and the 20th verse, "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." From the impressive manner with which the learned preacher treated his text I should infer his preaching in Exeter Hall will add much to his already well-known popularity and usefulness as a preacher of the Gospel. After the service a collection was made to defray the incidental expenses, a system I much prefer to the one usually acted on in many churches and chapels for a respectable person (if not a seat-holder) to be kept standing till a certain portion of the service, and then perhaps obliged to fee the pew-opener to get a decent seat. If it could be ascertained I doubt not but there is more money drawn from the pockets of the public in this way than would serve to maintain an efficient chorus in all the places of worship in the metropolis.

I remain, sir, yours, &c., M. M.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

BOULOGNE SUR MER.—(From our own Correspondent, Aug. 6th, 1847.)—DEAR EDITOR,—Want of interest in musical matters has delayed my letter to you, and as I am on the eve of starting for Belgium, I shall be brief in my communications. The Misses Pyne have returned for the season, and have announced their annual concert for next week. These excellent cantatrices stand in high favour here, and consequently enjoy the best patronage. Mons. Sina, the intimus of Beethoven, escapes from the heated Paris to enjoy the gaities and sea-breezes at Boulogne. He is a fine violinist, and celebrated in Paris for his masterly performances of the sonatas of Beethoven, which he knows by heart. I hope, some of these days, in succeeding to obtain a copy of an "original letter" of the "Immortal Maestro," which has never been presented to the musical public in any form. It was written soon after the completion of his Op. 59—the Razoumofsky quartetts. It proved to me that in these days Beethoven must have been in possession, not only of all the faculties of mind, but likewise of a very jocose disposition. Yesterday Miss L. Eyre, from Colchester, gave a matinée, by invitation, to hear her performances on the pianoforte and harp. She is a pupil for the pianoforte of Miss Bianchi, of Ipswich, to whom the credit is due of perfecting a most clever pupil, who, if she continue in her labours of study with assiduity, cannot fail to assume a most respectable position amongst our best pianists. Miss Eyre's harp playing is also very creditable. It appears that she does not confine herself to one school or style, for in the programmes of her ensuing soirées, Miss Eyre announces the names of Weber, Liszt, Thalberg, Chopin, Beethoven, Schulhoff, Stephen Heller, Prudent, &c., as well as harp solos by Bochsa. Mr. C. W. Glover (the "celebrated composer and pianist", as he announces himself) gives a matinée this day. My departure to St. Omer will preclude me from attending it. M. Godefroid is expected here, and I hear that the MM. Oberthür (harpist at the Haymarket Opera) and Gollmick, the pianist, intend visiting Boulogne shortly. My next letter will probably be from Aix-la-Chapelle.

I remain, my dear Editor, yours, &c. H. Z.

PROVINCIAL.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Wilson, the Scottish vocalist, gave one of his entertainments last evening, at the Natural History Society's large hall, which was filled with beauty and fashion. Criticism upon Mr. Wilson is superfluous; we shall, therefore, only say that "The Laird o' Cockpen" and "Allister M'Allister," were received with cordial greetings, while the more pathetic ballads—"The land o' the leal," "John Anderson," "The Stuarts of Appin," and "Lord Ullin's daughter"—held their customary command over the sympathies of the audience.

Mr. Bennett has concluded an engagement with the Misses Smith, who will give a Concert at the Theatre on each of the Regatta nights.

Miss Lloyd, of Leominster, was on Tuesday elected organist at the parish church of Tenbury, in the room of Miss Walker, of Shotton Park, the period of whose engagement had expired. The professional assistance of Mr. Done, of Worcester Cathedral, was called in by the churchwardens in determining the merits of the candidates. The salary is £25 per annum.—Berrow's Worcester Journal.

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.—The gala of the Madrigal Club at the Victoria Spa was well attended. The fête being held in the grounds of the Queen's Hotel, Bishopton, increased the pleasure of the party, and the arrangements made by Mr. and Mrs. Cranmer were so complete that perfect satisfaction could not fail following their exertions.

LIVERPOOL.—Jenny Lind will appear in an opera at the Liverpool theatre on the 5th of September. She may possibly sing at a concert a night or two after. Madlle. Lind has been invited by the Bishop of Norwich to stay at his palace during the concerts to be given in that city.

The celebrated French actress, Madlle. Rachel, will appear at our Theatre-Royal on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, the 16th, 18th, and 20th inst. The places in the boxes for these nights are rapidly filling up.—Liverpool Mail.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON AND LIVERPOOL ADVERTISER.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to the following paragraph, which occurs in a letter inserted in your journal of the 24th ult., and headed "The Stage As it Is":—"Much sympathy with the project was expressed, and the house was crowded nightly, but somehow nobody paid except the poor lessee; and when, after the lapse of a month, no one could be discovered bold or devoted enough to follow in the wake of Mr. Stephens, and expend three thousand pounds for the benefit of a non-paying public in the production of another original play—with 'Martinuzzi' the scheme began, and with that distinguished cardinal it ended, George Stephens not only paying the 'piper,' but the dancers also, under which category may be classed every one who could, on any pretext whatever, obtain access to the theatre." May I be permitted, as the principal party concerned, to state, that scarcely half the above-mentioned sum of three thousand pounds was expended on a scheme which had its source in no personal point of vanity, but was embraced with the sole aim of enlarging the arena of the English drama. If I apprehend rightly what is intended by the phrase "paying the dancers also," the inference would certainly not be correct. There was no temptation whatsoever held out to the playgoing public that I am aware of, save the performance on the boards. As respects your correspondent's criticism, "Martinuzzi" would not have been that piece of mine which I should have selected for representation; and few competent critics can well entertain a humbler opinion of the merits of the tragedy, as put upon the stage, than, sir, your obedient servant,

July 28th, 1847.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—It has been found impossible to produce "Le Nozze di Figaro" until Tuesday next, when it will be brought out with Lind as Susanna, supported by Castellan, Lablache, Staudigl, Coletti, &c. The next week is the last of Mademoiselle Lind's performance. On Monday the 23rd, she leaves London to fulfil her engagements at Manchester, Liverpool, Dublin, and Edinburgh.

MADAME CATHINKA DE DIETZ, the pianiste, has recently been married to Capt. Shaw.

MR. PARLOE, who was for many years prompter at Covent-garden Theatre, died last Friday morning, after a lengthened period of mental disturbance and bodily suffering. Having on Saturday week become very violent, he was removed to Lambeth workhouse, prior to being placed in a lunatic asylum, but death terminated his sufferings before his removal could be effected. He had been a long time an annuitant upon the Covent-garden Fund, and his widow will now be entitled to the benefits derivable from it. Mr. Parloe was from boyhood on the stage, and being well acquainted with all that pertained to the theatrical profession, he was considered a most efficient and attentive prompter. Many years ago, he lost an eye by the stroke of a harlequin's sword, whilst acting pantaloons, having volunteered to do so at a minute's notice, in place of Barnes, who was taken ill during the performance of the pantomime.

JULES DE GLIMES left London for Brussels, on Saturday.

RACHEL.—There is some hope that this inimitable actress will give yet two performances at the St. James's Theatre, after the expiration of her provincial tour.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER left, on Wednesday morning, for Vienna, via Hamburg.

M. ESCUDIER, editor of La France Musicale, has returned to Paris.

THE DAGUERRETYPE.—We paid a visit, a short time since, to Mr. Beard's Photographic Institution, 2, King William Street, when we were shown several likenesses of musical notorieties, which greatly pleased and surprised us. That some of the likenesses taken by the Daguerreotype are not truly resemblances, we can readily understand, because the Daguerreotype does nothing more than return back a most faithful reflection of the countenance, exactly as it looks when taken. Now there are few of us who, under the process of having the human face divine transferred to representation, do not endeavour to look their comeliest, and by this very means destroy the general aspect under which alone we are known and recognised. One attempts to look literary, another essays dignity, if he be in office—or courage, if he be a soldier; the ladies invariably strive to appear winning, and, of course, take the worst means in the world to do so, the whole countenance, under such efforts wearing an aspect of painful restraint; in brief, the submitting your countenance to be taken by the Daguerreotype, is a test of moral courage and presence of mind, the ordeal of which few can go through without exhibiting some signs of weakness. In every instance the photographic likeness must be an exact transcript of the face in every look, turn, and lineament, under which it presents itself to the instrument. We throw out these hints to put on their guard such of our friends as intend to be daguerrootyped, and to pray them not to endeavour to look one way or another, but leave it all to chance. We have seen some likenesses with Mr. Beard's new discovery of colouring, which, in point of finish, apparently surpass any miniature we ever saw, and, in point of similitude, are just as true as if they were reflected from a mirror. The daguerreotype likenesses, before the addition of the colouring, were very objectionable, as they represented every face with the pallid hue and peculiar uncomplexion of death. By means of Mr. Beard's discovery, every shade of complexion may be added after the picture has been taken, and this requires a most experienced and accomplished artist to effect. The photographic portraits we have seen in King William Street are among the most extraordinary specimens of modern art which we have seen for some time, and this is saying a good deal at a time when every week and day sends forth a new invention.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—A meeting of the stewards was held in this city yesterday, when it was resolved to delay the detailed announcement of the meeting for one week longer, in order that the whole of the arrangements may be fully published. We are glad to say that matters are progressing favourably.—Gloucester Chronicle.

THE KING OF BAVARIA.—A curious story has lately been circulated respecting this monarch, who is said to have dreamed that he saw three rats, one of which was very fat, another very lean, and the last stone blind. The King sought an explanation of his dream, and was informed by the gipsy that the fat rat represented his favorite, Lola Montes, the lean one his people, and the blind one himself.

MRS. WARNER has taken the Marylebone Theatre. Mr. John Cooper is engaged as stage-manager.

M. DUPONCHEL has engaged Cerito and St. Leon for the Academie Royale in Paris. He is also, we hear, in treaty with Rosati.

JENNY LIND.—The sale of tickets for Mademoiselle Lind's concert on the 15th September, has now been completed, and we understand that upwards of £1800 was drawn. It is currently reported among the musical profession that Jenny Lind will be induced to give a second concert in Glasgow.—North British Mail. [Indeed! How condescending!]

SHAKSPEARE'S BIRTH-PLACE.—So great is the curiosity excited by the sale of this relic of the immortal bard, that the catalogues are already selling at half-a-crown each.

NOT BAD FOR A YANKEE.—An American countryman, fresh from the magnificent woods and rough clearings, was one day visiting the owner of a beautiful seat in the Brook-line, and walking with him through a little grove, out of which all the underbrush had been cleared, paths had been nicely cut and gravelled, and the rocks covered with woodbine, suddenly stopped, and, admiring the beauty of the scene, lifted up his hands and exclaimed, "This is Nature with her hair combed."

LORD LANSDOWNE has appointed a son of Mr. Severn, the painter, to a situation in the Council Office.

TOM THUMS is building a handsome palace in America. When it is completed, never will an edifice have been raised upon so small a foundation!—Punch.

PRINCE ALBERT has intimated his intention to contribute £250 to the fund for the purchase of Shakspeare's house, an assurance of the strong interest felt by his Royal Highness in the preservation, as national property, of a dwelling connected with the greatest name in English literature.

MDLLE. FLUNKETT.—A new divertissement, composed expressly for this charming danseuse by the clever Signor Casati, of Milan, will be produced at the Royal Italian Opera, to-night, under the title of La Naysade.

DRURY LANE THEATRE—Among the engagements made by M. Jullien are Madame Viardot Garcia, Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, (we hope this is true), Herr Pischek, Herr Staudigl, Mr. Rooves, Mr. Whitworth Jones, Mr. Clement White, &c., &c.

MR. FRENCH FLOWERS.—We understand that Madame Spohr, wife of the celebrated composer, has undertaken to translate this gentleman's "Essay upon Fugue," into German.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—It is reported that the old company of Drury Lane Theatre, discarded by the present Lessee, will take refuge at this theatre and perform English operas during the winter.

MEYERBEER.—We learn from Berlin, by a letter of the 6th, that M. Meyerbeer, not having recovered his health at Frauzebrunnen, has gone to Marienbad, with the intention of proceeding to the waters of Gastein, in the circle of Salzburg, within the Austrian states. He is not expected to return to Berlin before the end of November.—Morning Herald.

THE BISHOP OF NORWICH has offered rooms in his palace to Jenny Lind. The Standard is in great alarm at this new instance of horrid liberalism. "It is very right, very proper that jackdaws should build in the church; they have vested interests there," says the Standard; "but farewell to the primitive purity of the Establishment, when it gives a roosting-place to nightingales!"—Punch.

THE OPERATIC SEASON.

THE season 1847 having terminated, it becomes our duty to review the events which have signalized its progress. We commence with the Royal Italian Opera, a resumé of which has been furnished us by our collaborateur, Desmond Ryan. The extreme length of his review renders it impossible for us to insert the notice of Her Majesty's Theatre, which we have prepared ourselves, with some preliminary and general remarks, until next week. Elsewhere will be found our account of Le Nozze di Figaro and Mdlle: Lind's Susanna.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

REVIEW OF THE SEASON.

THE year 1847 will be long memorable in musical annals for the establishment of a second Italian Opera in London. It will be memorable for the unparalleled feeling of partizanship, engendered in consequence of that establishment; it will be memorable for the breaking up of that system of managerial policy which considered art as nothing, and self-aggrandisement as everything; it will be memorable for monopoly overthrown, and reformation effected, whose influence will be surely felt for many a lustrum to come.

When we look back to this time twelvemonths—a poor year—and remember that there was then scarcely a breath uttered respecting the new Opera: when we call to mind that it was as late as Christmas-eve when Covent-Garden Theatre was entered by the artizans to commence the entire, dilapidation of that huge house, to build it up again and make it ready for performance by the spring; when we consider the powerful opposition against which the advancement of the new speculation had to contend, the immense sums of money to be procured for so expensive an undertaking, and the short time allowed for completion; and, finally, when we behold the theatre, thoroughly perfected, opening the first week in April, a period earlier even than at one time was announced, it seems to us like some event in a dream or fairy tale, or an act of invisible agency, as surprising as the enchantments of Maugis, or Morgana.

The causes whence arose this establishment require not to be considered too curiously by us. The principal singers, the chorus, and nearly the entire orchestra, with the conductor, thought themselves aggrieved by Mr. Lumley, and deserted his theatre to lend their services to the new speculation. There is no doubt Mr. Costa's secession from Her Majesty's Theatre the year previously was one of the assistant causes in the establishment of the new Opera. Mr. Costa had always been held in the highest respect and esteem by the members of his orchestra, and these, when they found an opportunity of serving under their former leader, did not hesitate to desert Mr. Lumley's standard and take refuge in the ranks of the enemy; especially since they considered that Mr. Lumley was the aggressing, and Mr. Costa the aggrieved personage, and that for other reasons they had equal cause of complaint in their own cases. We have not taken the trouble to ascertain the exact discrepancy; considering it unnecessary for the purposes of this journal. Meanwhile, the project once set on foot, the new proprietors of Covent Garden were busily securing a company composed of all the first-rate artists that could be procured in Europe. They had already engaged Grisi, Persiani, Mario, Salvi, Tamburini, and Ronconi, all of whom had great names, and were known to the English public. Certainly these alone, of themselves, would have made a magnificent company, and might reasonably be supposed to satisfy the exigences of any musical theatre; but the proprietors had determined that the lyrical drama performed at Covent Garden should be "on a scale of efficiency in every department never before attempted in England," and for that purpose it was necessary the operatic corps should be considerably enlarged. Italy was searched for singers of reputation, and among others Marini, Rovere, Steffanoni, and Alboni were engaged. Great care was next taken to render the band and chorus as complete as possible. In the orchestra Sainton and Blagrove were placed among the first violins, the former as chef d'attaque, and the stringed quartet was encreased in power and numbers, such violinists as Mr. Dando consenting to swell the corps of the ripieni, and Mr. Jarrett willingly joining in the corps as third horn. Every department of the band was carefully revised by the indefatigable conductor, and though perfection was not obtainable in all points, there was brought together, as was subsequently proved, a body of instrumentalists such as was never heard in this country before, and most likely, such as was never surpassed in any country at any period. The chorus was also enlarged and improved; a great change for the better being hardly less effected here than in the band. Early in January the new company issued its prospectus. One of its most popular acts of administration, and one which certainly conferred a grace and gave an importance to the establishment at its outset, was the appointment of Mr. Beale as manager. The general esteem in which Mr. Beale was held, the high respectability of his position in society, his great influence in musical circles, his worth and independence as a man, and his character as a gentleman, lent to the new speculation a weight and a seeming it could not boast of before, and attracted thereto universal attention. From the appointment of Mr. Beale to the management may be dated the first dawn of the success of the Royal Italian Opera. The prospectus was issued in January, it ran as follows:—

Biasis (of the theatre la scala, Milan.) Leader of the Ballet—Mr. Alfred Mellon. Regisseur de la Danse—Mr. O'Brian. Composer—Signor Alessandro Curmi (of the San Carlo Theatre, Naples).

Among the names of the composers whose works are promised we find those of Cimarosa, Meyerbeer, and Mercadante. But we had no opera of Cimarosa, nor of Meyerbeer, nor of Mercadante. So far the proprietors may be said to have broken the pledge of their prospectus, but when it is considered that almost all the operas produced at the new theatre had unparalleled success, and that they were consequently repeated oftener than was intended, it will be seen that this alone precluded the possibility of giving all that was promised; and a still more cogent reason, and one in which the public entirely sympathised, compelled the management to depart from the minute terms of the prospectus—viz., the immense success of Alboni, and her favouritism with the public, which demanded she should be heard as frequently as possible, and necessitated the production of operas in which she would have a part. Moreover it must not be forgotten that every opera produced required as much time, pains, and expense as an entirely new work. With regard to the principal artists promised, strict faith has been preserved, if we except one of the bassi profondi, Signor Angelo Alba, who did not appear, and whose place was supplied by Signor Tagliafico from the Italiens at Paris. From the impression Tagliafico made in many of his performances, we are inclined to think that the Royal Italian Opera lost nothing by the exchange. With regard to the other portions of the prospectus, every item has been scrupulously observed; so that on the whole, it may be fairly inferred, that the directors of the Royal Italian Opera published their prospectus with an eye to its strict fulfilment, laying down no more than was compassable, and intending no more than was within their means: that nearly every thing therein promised was carried out, and that the departures from the prospectus were perfectly warranted by circumstances, and agreeable to the feelings of the public.

On Tuesday, April the 6th, the very day announced months previously, the Royal Italian Opera opened with Semiramide. The management could not have selected a better opera under all circumstances. In the first place the brilliant overture, and splendid instrumentation of Semiramide, would a priori, tax the highest powers and resources of the orchestra. In the next place the choruses were numerous and on a grand scale, and would perfectly display the completeness of the choral department; and lastly, the three principal characters of the opera would give Grisi, Alboni, and Tamburini fine scope to exhibit their vocal and histrionic capabilities. In addition to these, the magnificence of the scenery required for Semiramide, together with the costliness of the dresses, the scenic accessories, &c., and the provision of a military band on the stage, must necessarily afford an opportunity for conveying a complete idea of the manner in which the Royal Italian Opera management intended to produce operas on the stage. Therefore the Semiramide, agreeing with all these requirements, was happily selected. Never shall we forget the opening night of the theatre. The pit was half filled with people who, we conscientiously believe, never entered the walls of an opera house before. These, we presume, were attracted solely by the opening of a new theatre, and paid their eight shillings to behold Covent Garden converted into a "house for singing." Upon entering the Pit the light seemed somewhat dull, and the hangings had rather a dingy appearance. The shape of the house was pronounced on all sides irreproachable and a great improvement on the ancient theatre. While the eyes of every body in attempting to scan the ornaments, the ceiling, the proscenium, the hangings, the facades &c. and were endeavouring to penetrate a sort of haze that seemed to envelope the whole house, suddenly the whole area of the theatre was flooded with a light so pure and brilliant that one might have fancied it was broad daylight. "The lustre, the lustre," shouted simultaneously a thousand voices, and then there followed such a shout of applause, and such a clapping of hands, as must have warmed the heart of old Covent Garden, which had not felt such cheering for many years. And now that every portion of the house was so plainly visible its real beauties became apparent. Perhaps there is not in the world a more elegant theatre than Covent Garden. Witness the magnificence of its painted proscenium, the splendor, yet chasteness of its ornaments, the fitness of its decorations, and the symmetrical proportions of the whole. Certainly we have heard exceptions taken to a portion of its embellishments, and of its decorations, which would not seem to be entirely ungrounded. The painted entablatures of the ceiling have been pronounced too heavy, and discordant in color with the brightness of the house. We are inclined to agree with this opinion. The curtains have been considered too dark, and it has been said that they render the appearance of the boxes dull and sombre, and are not in keeping with the brilliancy and lightness of the rest of the theatre. From this we take leave to dissent. The hangings are, in color, of a fine crimson, and to make them a shade brighter would be to bring them to the confines of scarlet, a very bad night color. Those who find fault with the draperies of the Royal Italian Opera are such, and such only, as have been accustomed to the glittering gorgeousness of the hangings of Her Majesty's Theatre, and can spy nothing beautiful save what dazzles, surprises and astonishes. The occupiers of the boxes, at all events, will have to thank the choosers of the Covent Garden decorations, as the color suits admirably the complexion of the ladies. With these exceptions the house was the theme of universal admiration. The lustre was pronounced the most splendid ever hung in a theatre, and the proscenium the most magnificent both in design and execution ever beheld. The provision of stuffed chairs in the pit gave entire satisfaction, another great improvement on the old system. And now the members of the orchestra began to make their appearance, and we recognised the faces we had known so many years at Her Majesty's Theatre. After a while Signor Costa appeared and was greeted tumultuously from all parts of the house. Then there was a pause interrupted occasionally by the tuning of an instrument; then the tap of the Conductor's baton on the tin reflector—a call to order and attention—then an uplifting of the baton—and the overture commenced. It was an anxious moment for Sig. Costa. The instant the band was heard its power was felt. The overture was magnificently played. The quickness and precision of the allegro passages, the mellowness and suavity of the andante, the accuracy of the solos and the thunder of the fortes were never equalled in our hearing. The band was faultless. We have opened the theatre to our readers, but we shall not tax their patience by leading him through the minutiae of this stirring night. It is unnecessary to allude to the enthusiastic reception accorded to Grisi and Tamburini. These, as they were expected, caused no surprise. Nor need we speak of the perfection of the chorus, nor the splendour of the scenery. But we cannot pass over one event of the evening, which caused the greatest surprise, and the issue of which has had an influence on the destinies of Covent Garden, as gratifying as it was unexpected, without dwelling on it for some space of time. We speak of the debut of the new contralto, Signora Alboni. So little was known of this lady in England, that we could learn nothing of her but what was vague and unsatisfactory. In our article in the Musical World of February the 6th, descanting on the prospectus issued by the Royal Italian Opera, we made mention of her thus:—"Alboni who is the only Signora in the catalogue, has a sort of floating reputation that oozes from time to time out of the adeposity of Italian Carnivals, whether deserved or not, we cannot pretend to determine." So little did the public think of Signora Alboni, that when she came on the first night as Arsace, they received her with the utmost indifference, looking upon her with about as little interest as upon any individual in the chorus. But she had not sung three bars of her opening recitative before she rivetted the attention of the whole house. The wondrous beauty and purity of her tones went right home, instantaneously, to every heart. At the end of the recitative the audience were excited to an absolute furore, and Alboni was established in the public mind as a great singer, and for ever. Great as was Alboni's success on the first night, it was only a foundation for repeated triumphs during the rest of the season. By every new part in which she has appeared she has obtained an addition to her reputation. A contrast here naturally suggests itself with a popular singer belonging to the rival establishment, which we cannot resist setting forth. The antipodes scarcely present a greater contrast than is afforded by Jenny Lind and Alboni, whether it be in their persons, their talents, or their fortunes. The one came to London heralded by such a name as no artiste ever possessed before; the other came almost unknown, and certainly unreported. Jenny Lind's voice, though beautiful, is not faultless; Alboni's, beautiful in another style, is without a flaw. Jenny Lind's talent is as artificial as it is brilliant; Alboni's as natural as it is charming. The Swedish Nightingale is fair-haired, slight, and homely; the Italian Mavis is dark, stout, and very handsome. But in the amount of impression produced on the public mind, and the increase, or falling off of that impression, chiefly consists the great antithesis between the two famous artistes. Nothing could surpass the impression Jenny Lind produced the first night she appeared in London. This was an anti-climax. That impression has been wearing out ever since. We do not mean to say that Jenny Lind does not attract as large audiences now as on her first coming to London. That would be stating what we do not know. But, supposing she does, we can easily account for the prolongation of the Lind attraction. There are upwards of 200,000 people coming to London every week, all strangers. Now among so many it would be wonderful indeed if Jenny Lind, with her extraordinary provincial reputation, could not find a few thousands nightly, who, out of mere curiosity, would be induced to hear one whom the Morning Post has dubbed a better singer than Malibran, and a better actress than Rachel. We cannot lose sight of the fact, that with those who have heard her more than once, Jenny Lind's exorbitant reputation is declining. But the case is directly the opposite with Alboni. The oftener she is heard the more genuine and enthusiastic are the feelings she excites; and we have little doubt that ere a year passes by, the contralto of the Royal Italian Opera will have pulled down from her throne of pre-eminence the soprano of Her Majesty's Theatre. The first performance of the new company was a forerunner of the many triumphs of the season. We never witnessed an opera so splendidly executed in every respect as the Semiramide. The chorus, band, and principal singers were as powerful as art and indefatigability could render them, and the enthusiasm excited in the audience was the legitimate consequence of the finest combination of first-rate talent applied to the execution of a great work in the completest form.

We must now give a general glance at the performances of the season, and consider the causes that have conduced to the success of the new establishment; for be it known, that the success attending the Royal Italian Opera performances has been commensurate with the highest expectations. We must next allude to the principal singers, endeavouring to estimate their separate influences on the fortunes of the theatre; and finally devote a few lines to Signor Costa's importance as a conductor.

Seventeen operas have been given by the new company at Covent Garden during the season. Of these, five were Rossini's: namely, Semiramide, L'Italiana in Algieri, Il Barbiere, La Gazza Ladra, and La Donna del Lago: two were Mozart's (and such a twain!!!) Don Giovanni and Le Nozze di Figaro: five were Donizetti's, Lucia di Lammer- moor, Anna Bolena, Lucrezia Borgia, L'Elisir d'Amore, and Maria di Rohan: three were Bellini's, Sonnambula, Puritani, and Norma: and two were Verdi's, Ernani and I Due Foscari. In addition to these there was given on two occasions a scena from Donizetti's Betty, for Mademoiselle Alboni. Some of the above performances must have been necessarily better than others. Those which were given in the completest form, and in a manner certainly never dreamt of before in this country, were Semiramide, Barbiere, Don Giovanni, Figaro, Lucrezia Borgia, Norma, La Gazza Ladra, and La Donna del Lago. The other operas, though carefully and completely performed, did not draw on the highest resources of the band and chorus, and achieved a less decided effect. The great impression produced by the Maria di Rohan and the Due Foscari was entirely owing to Ronconi's wonderful acting, the operas being considerably below average merit. The Lucia was an immense hit, due for the most part to Salvi and Ronconi, in consequence of their highly impressive acting and singing. Salvi's Edgardo was one of the great hits of the season. The Italiana in Algeri, introducing Marini and Rovere, was played three nights. The music captivated, but did not excite, and so the performance gave much pleasure, but awoke no enthusiasm. The Sonnambula pleased for a few nights, but was not violently successful. We suspect, but this is entre nous, that Persiani's position between Grisi and Alboni was anything but favorable to the display of her talents. Persiani is really a wonderful artist, yea, the most wonderful of them all, but unfortunately the people prefer voice, and Persiani's organ is deficient. The Elisir d'Amore did nothing, though it was splendidly performed, and Tamburini's comic acting should have been sufficient to guarantee it a long run. Ernani was given twice, introducing Mademoiselle Steffanoni. We forget what impression it produced. All the other operas were decidedly great triumphs, the performances surpassing by many degrees any thing of the kind ever done in England. To give some idea of the perfection of the ensembles in these operas, we may instance the Lucrezia Borgia, in which Marini, the primo basso who in Milan played the Duke with great éclat, undertook the part of one of the conspirators, without having three bars of solo to sing; and Tagliafico, Polonini, Pietro Ley, &c., all stars in their continental hemispheres, did not deem it beneath them to sing in the chorus. The Donna del Lago offers another instance of this perfection in the ensemble, wherein we find Rovere, Tagliafico, Polonini, Pietro Ley, &c., undertaking the Bards, who come on merely to sing in the first finale. That the chorus in general was vastly improved was evidenced in the first performance of Semiramide. We never heard a band of singers display so much precision, energy, and power. The female choir was absolutely faultless, and shewed the training they must have undergone to have brought them to such perfection. Of the orchestra we do not think it necessary to say more than we have said at the commencement of our article. It is universally admitted that a more complete and magnificent body of instrumentalists never assembled together in a theatre. Their performances alone at the Royal Italian Opera would be well worth paying to hear. We must now direct the reader's attention to the principal singers, and fairly set before him the value and importance of each artist individually, and endeavour, by a statement of facts, simply to arrive at a conclusion of how much service the artist was in furthering the success of the season: and this brings us to her who has been the most important and influential of all the vocalists in directing the fortunes of the Royal Italian Opera—Giulia Grisi.

Of the seventeen operas produced at Covent-Garden during the season, Grisi appeared in ten. These were Semiramide, Puritani, Norma, Lucrezia Borgia, Anna Bolena, Due Foscari, Don Giovanni, Nozze di Figaro, Gazza Ladra, and La Donna del Lago. Of the sixty performances of the season, she appeared in no less than forty-five. This alone amounts to a strong proof of her overwhelming importance in the Covent Garden company. But besides this, it is an incontrovertible fact that Grisi has created a greater sensation this year than she has done since she came to this country. The causes of this, which at first sight would seem paradoxical, may be readily found. It must be granted that when Grisi first came to London, however exquisite her voice might have been and finished her vocalization, and whatever sensibility and felicity of portrayal her acting might have displayed, she fell short of the loftiest efforts of genius. She was not yet fashioned to stand on the highest pinnacle of fame. She was just beginning to climb that hill on whose summit Malibran stood, and was beginning to put forth those wings which, at no distant period, were destined to waft her, yea, to the same towering height as Malibran. Grisi was yet young, and Nature had done so much for her that it rendered her somewhat careless of improving and cultivating her genius. The public were so contented with her, and their applauses were so rapturous, that she seemed to have gained all she desired. "The force of favor could no further go,"—so thought Grisi, but she was soon compelled to alter her sentiments. In attempting to depict some of the sterner characters of the Lyric drama, she found she had still something to consider and to learn. Stung by the unworthy comparisons of some journal of the day, her genius rose within her, and she was determined to do or die. A genius like Grisi's seizes and embodies with the rapidity of lightning. In a few brief seasons she stood pre-eminent as the grandest delineator of the tragic passions since the days of Pasta. But still all immediate competition was apart; there was no Richmond in the field to claim the "golden round" from her, and Grisi, from want of some extreme cause of excitement, occasionally allowed her intellect to "rust in her unused." We have frequently had cause to complain in the Musical World of Grisi's apathy and indifference. This was during the latter years of her engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre. We are now aware that there was a far stronger reason than natural indolence, or any want of exciting cause from the absence of competition, to account for Grisi's apathy and indifference. For the last two years of her engagement all friendly intercourse had ceased between her and Mr. Lumley. A misunderstanding, or, more properly, a breach had taken place between the artist and the manager, and Grisi, who thought herself insulted, went on the stage, night after night, utterly heedless how she sang, or how she acted. At the very first opportunity she broke from her bonds at Her Majesty's Theatre, and flew into the ranks of the Covent Garden company, determined to exert her genius and talents to the utmost, and show the world what LA DIVA could really do when she felt inclined. The manner in which she sang on the first night of the opening of the Royal Italian Opera proved she was still the greatest vocal artist in the world. Here every thing seemed to lend a spur to her genius and exertions. First, she was naturally anxious to establish the new theatre, after having quarrelled with the old one—a powerful motive for putting forth her energies; next she had a profound regard for the manager—a sufficient stimulus to press her onward in the cause; and lastly, Alboni's great success (for she knew beforehand what that success would be)

was enough to awaken any dormant faculty, and make her apply it to the best advantage. These motives combined, made Grisi exert herself to such extent, that those who heard and saw her in, what some call, her best days, declared she was never half so great as at the present time. Almost every opera in which she appeared had an immense success. Her singing was pronounced more marvellous than ever; and her acting was universally allowed to be equal to the finest efforts of Pasta and Malibran. Perhaps there was yet another cause, chiefier than those above named, why Grisi came out with such determined vigour and renovated powers. Had not the coming of the popular Jenny Lind something to do with those astonishing and arduous nightly displays that would seem to wear out, in brief season, a constitution, unless it were made of very iron? Was there not in the whirlwind of passion she allowed to sway her in Norma, a murmur, or underbreath, which seemed to say—"With this blast I blow into invisible fragments for ever the frigid efforts of the Swedish nightingale?" If there were not, there might have been, as that was exactly what did happen. We have not room to follow Grisi through all her triumphs. At no period of her career in England has she been received with anything like the amount of enthusiasm she has encountered this season at the Royal Italian Opera; and at no period has she sang more divinely, or acted half so magnificently. The season 1847 at the Royal Italian Opera has been the true climax of Grisi's reputation.

Next to Grisi we consider Alboni to have been the greatest source of attraction of the Royal Italian Opera corps. We are aware that there are many who will tell you that Alboni has been the chief loadstone of the company, but in this they decidedly err. Nor was that possible, even though Alboni's qualities were superior to Grisi's; seeing that Grisi on every occasion played the principal part, or one of the principal parts in the operas; Alboni only in four operas undertaking leading characters. Alboni, like Grisi, appeared in ten operas. These were Semiramide, Italiana in Algieri, Barbiere, Maria di Rohan, Anna Bolena, Le Nozze di Figaro, Gazza Ladra, Lucrezia Borgia, Ernani, and La Donna del Lago. She appeared forty-three nights out of the sixty, or more than two nights in three. Her reception in Semiramide, on the opening night, was tremendous. We never witnessed a more decided case of super-eminent success. The whole house felt it, and acknowledged it by yielding itself up to a pitch of enthusiasm to which an English audience is rarely wound. The entire of the daily press—even the Morning Post could not shirk his chagrined pen from it—echoed the triumphant success. From that night we have marked the progress of this inimitable artiste in public favour,—for be it remembered that something of Alboni's immense success on the first night must be attributable to its unexpectedness—and we now behold her placed among the greatest favorites that ever adorned the operatic boards. Her performance of Malcolm Græme formed a splendid climax to all her triumphs.

Our old favorite, Tamburini, assuredly follows next, as the artist who has tended most to add weight and importance to, and encrease the attraction of the new operatic corps. Tamburini appeared in nine operas out of the seventeen, viz:—Semiramide, Sonnambula, Puritani, Anna Bolena, L'Elisir d'Amore, Don Giovanni, Nozze di Figaro, Gazza Ladra, and Lucrezia Borgia. He appeared forty times during the season in entire operas, and two or three in selections on extra nights. The service this great artist has rendered to the Royal Italian Opera cannot be sufficiently estimated. His admirable singing and unsurpassed acting in all he undertook, whether it was light comedy, or genteel comedy, or elegant comedy, or serious drama, or melo-drama, or tragedy, were equally the theme of wonder and admiration. His Don Giovanni alone would have made his fame European. The Royal Italian Opera would certainly lose its right arm, if it lost the services of Signor Antonio Tamburini.

Signor Ronconi has been one of the principal sources of attraction at the Royal Italian Opera, or, more properly, would have been, had his services been more used. He only appeared in four operas, but in these four he achieved two of the greatest triumphs of the season. Those who have seen him in Maria di Rohan and I Due Foscari, have witnessed two of the most finished and powerfully tragic performances of modern times. We must greatly blame the management, however, for not bringing forward Ronconi oftener; for though his main power lies in deep tragedy, and few of the modern masters have written tragic parts to suit a barytone, at least one of his peculiar quality, yet, from his repertoire of 140 operas, there would surely have been found many which the public could have been pleased to hear. It will hardly be denied that among the greatest triumphs of the season must rank the Maria di Rohan, and I Due Foscari, in which the acting and singing of Ronconi were immensely great, and certainly entitled him to far more consideration than he has received from the management. What a pity the Otello of Rossini would not fit Ronconi's voice. What a magnificent performance it would be. It is Ronconi's misfortune that there is nobody but Verdi left to write for him.

Of Madame Persiani's attractive powers we do not feel ourselves bound to make statement, as that lady, from some cause we are unacquainted with, withdrew herself entirely from the Royal Italian Opera; or—we must give the fair artiste the benefit of the doubt—was taken ill, and could not perform after four or five representations.

Signor Mario is the most popular and accomplished tenor in Europe. He was an immense addition to the new company, and was one of its greatest attractions. He appeared in the following nine operas: Sonnambula, Puritani, Lucrezia Borgia, Barbiere (once), Anna Bolena, Due Foscari, Don Giovanni, Gazza Ladra, and Donna del Lago. He performed thirty-two times in entire operas, and five or six in single acts or selections. His most splendid performances were in Sonnambula, Puritani, Lucrezia Borgia, and La Donna del Lago.

Signor Salvi places us in the same predicament as Madame Persiani. He seceded from the opera before little more than half of the season had passed. His success, however, was unequivocally great. His debut was one of the most triumphant ever witnessed on the stage.

Signor Marini came from Italy with a very high reputation. He deserved it, in some respects, and belied it in others. The quality of his voice is the most beautiful we ever heard in a bass; but this fine organ is too frequently marred by dubious intonation, and its power lies too low to be at all times available. As an actor we think him better in comedy than tragedy, although he came to London with a great serious repute. His Mustapha, in Italiana in Algieri, was capital, and he was still more excellent in Basilio, in the Barbiere. His Figaro in the Nozze gained him many admirers. Taking him all in all, Marini was a great addition to the Covent Garden corps. This gentleman deserves the highest possible praise for permitting himself to be cast in inferior parts. The feeling is alike honourable and artistic. Signor Marini's commanding voice was found of immense advantage to the general tone of the opera, on many occasions, in parts hitherto thought of no consequence.

He was of decided utility in the cast of the best operas of the season. He debuted in Taddeo in L'Italiana, and acted with extraordinary comic humour, but which, nevertheless, appeared to the audience somewhat exaggerated. That it was not so, and that it was but following the true reading, we are reasonably led to infer from his subsequent performances, in not one of which did he betray the least tendency to extravagance. Signor Rovere's Leporello, Bartolo in the Barbiere, and Basilio in the Nozze di Figaro were excellent, and required little to render them first-rate. The Royal Italian Opera would meet with a serious loss if deprived of his services.

Signor Tagliafico has shown himself a most worthy member of the great vocal host at Covent Garden. On every occasion when his services were made available, he proved himself of the utmost utility, and in one or two instances come out with a power and an energy that would not have discredited the first living artist. He was magnificent in the Ghost in Don Giovanni.

Signor Polonini also deserves honorable mention for the efficient assistance he lent in sustaining several of the minor characters. He has a fine bass voice; and sings like a thorough musician.

Signor Bettini came late, and appeared under considerable disadvantages. He had to debut in one of Salvi's principal parts; and after that great tenor's success, the undertaking involved no small amount of risk. Nevertheless, he acquitted himself most creditably, and was received with much favor. He appeared only in two parts, which hardly authorises us to pronounce a determinate opinion on his real merits. There is no doubt that he has a fine voice, but we are inclined to think the parts in which he has appeared are out of its legitimate register.

Three fair artistes remain for us to notice of the magnificent group of the Covent Garden vocalists, viz., Madame Ronconi, and the Desmoiselles Steffanoni and Corbari. The first lady has been somewhat obliquely dealt with. She made her first appearance as Maria in Maria di Rohan, and though her performance was not such as might have been expected from Götis, it was, to our thinking, a highly admirable one. Strange to say, the very journal that upholds through thick and thin every thing that is done at Covent Garden, pronounced this performance a failure: and that in the teeth of the artist being recalled at the end of the opera, and obtaining more than an average amount of applause. We like fair play, and heartily hope that the writer in the journal alluded to was innocent of what he was writing about. That we were correct in the opinions we formed of Madame Ronconi was proved by the second appearance of that lady in Maria, when she was received with still greater favour by the public. Madame Steffanoni debuted in Ernani. She produced a very lively sensation, and is, in many respects, rarely gifted as a singer. The Countess in the Nozze di Figaro was the only other part in which this artiste appeared. She sang Mozart's music judiciously and carefully, and acted in a very lady-like manner. Mademoiselle Steffanoni proved a very praiseworthy substitute for Madame Persiani. Mademoiselle Corbari made decidedly the best seconda donna within our remembrance. This young lady is a most charming singer, has a charming voice, and only requires a little more self-dependence, and a little more time and experience—she is still very young—to make her a great artiste. She was the best Adalgisa we ever heard. She was also excellent as Elvira in Don Giovanni—a most arduous part, be it understood. Mademoiselle Corbari was certainly a worthy addition to the Royal Italian Opera Company.

We have now had our say respecting the band and the chorus, and all the principal singers whom we considered worth an especial notification in our review of the season; but we cannot conclude without devoting a few lines to Signor Costa, whose fame and position, independent of what he has effected for the Royal Italian Opera, would demand some attention from our pen. Perhaps no individual in Europe is more happily endowed by nature with qualities befitting the conductor of an operatic band than Signor Costa. To the talents of an accomplished musician; an amazing quickness of ear, decision and promptitude in the use of his baton; and a manner of wielding it that conveys a forcible meaning, together with almost an intuitive knowledge of the mode of treating a morceau dramatically, Signor Costa adds energy, ardour, and indefatigable industry in his office as general of an orchestra. He never spares time, nor study, nor labour, to effect that which time; study, and labour can effect. As a disciplinarian, he is the very Napoleon of the orchestra; treating all the members of his band in terms of the greatest familiarity, but without allowing them or himself to break that line of separation which he knows well cannot be broken on either side without the power and influence of the chef being compromised. For this reason, Signor Costa obtains the friendship and respect of every individual in the band, which therefore works under him, as though the work were a real labour of love. Signor Costa's kindness to the gentlemen of the orchestra in allowing them to absent themselves from rehearsals when they have engagements for which they receive payment, places him in an amiable light. His influence among a certain section of the aristocracy no doubt has had some effect on the success of the Royal Italian Opera season. We do not think that the Covent Garden management could have found anywhere a gentleman in every way so admirably suited to conduct their instrumental forces. But Signor Costa is not infallible; and we are sorry to be compelled to found so grievous a charge against him as that of not paying due respect to the scores of the great works of Mozart and Rossini. The introduction of new instruments into places in which the composer never intended them, and the eternal use of the noisy brass band, showed either a curious obliquity of taste; or a desire to please the public palate by making that extraordinary which was simply beautiful. The meddling with the scores of Barbiere and Le Nozze di Figaro, was decidedly an error, and did not tend to elevate the establishment in the mind of the musical public. We are quite sure if Signor Costa heard his own band as we hear it in the pit, he would soon find that the only effect produced by the additional brass, is to drown all the rest of the instruments—a thing not to be desired. The blast of Orlando's terrible horn at Roncesvalles, when he blew for succour, and was heard as far, yea, as Saint-Jean-Pied-de-Port, where Charlemagne lay with his army, only some hundreds of leagues off, seems but a child's penny whistle to the stunning, deafening strepitation of these instruments at Covent Garden. We are certain Signor Costa has not the least idea of the effect thus produced in his orchestra. If he is desirous of having his band heard to advantage he will in future dispense with them altogether. As this is honestly meant we trust Signor Costa will take a friendly hint from it; if not, we shall not give up the subject, but return to it again and again, determined to preach a crusade against these Saracenic intruders. And so we rest contented at present.

A few lines must suffice for the ballet. It must be conceded that the Covent Garden ballets did not excite the overwhelming interest they excited at the other house. The operas distinguished them. We need not name all the principal dancers engaged during the season. A few names, however, will show these were all but equal to the great guns of Her Majesty's Theatre. First, we notice the universally-accomplished Fanny Ellsler, than whom no one who ever breathed had greater genius as a mime; then Dumilatre, a very elegant danseuse; and the graceful Fleury; and again the fascinating and beautiful Plunkett, who promises to be Carlotta the Second; and the sylph-like, ever-pointing Fuoco—so full of hope and expectation, that she is ever on the toe; and the Andalusian, Marietta Brambilla, who plays the castanets as no one ever played them before; and many more of inferior note,—showing that the Covent Garden management obtained all the Terpsichorean celebrities obtainable.

Several grand ballets, and a number of divertissements have been produced: Among these, Manon L'Escant, which exhibited Fanny Ellsler's splendid dramatic powers to great advantage, and Dion Bourcicault's Salmandrine, were among the most beautiful we have seen: The former was arranged by the accomplished Signor Casati, the latter by the clever and careful M. Blasie.

A strong word of praise is also due to Mr. Grieve for his admirable scenery, and another to Mr. A. Harris for his efficient and spirited direction of the mise en scene.

The Royal Italian Opera despite the Lind attraction, the prestige of the elder establishment, and the preference of Royalty, has had a triumphant season. No establishment founded in this country has ever given more general satisfaction; and now that confidence is confirmed, and the real intentions of the new company are seen, there is no doubt that the public will rush next year to support that which is excellent in itself, and is conducted on the best principles.

EVERY creature has a moment of the brightest bloom in its existence, in which that which it can become, according to its nature—its full organisation—steps into existence perfectly. This instant,* developed in its deep significance, exhibits to us this blooming point of Charlotte; for all the elements of her existence have been interpenetrated into the most intensive life; she rules, so to speak, at this instant, the whole measure of all her moral and mental powers, as far as she is capable of developing them. But here Charlotte, at the same time, breaks off the perfect fruit of this moment. She looks down, smiling, upon the contradiction and perplexity into which she has fallen, "she feels herself inwardly restored." But this internal repose gains its purest and most beautiful character from the fact, that it rests with self-consciousness on the deeply-felt significance of marriage, and this connects itself with the infinitude of the moral idea. Thus Charlotte is not only internally restored, but also allows the objective power of the moral substance, which has been removed from her for a moment, to rule clearly within her. It is, as it were, the atmosphere of her whole existence, the refreshing exhalation of which she now draws in at full draughts, and the life power of which she has never before experienced to such a degree. This is represented to us in the most judicious manner by the solemn renewal of the vow of conjugal fidelity, which, touched and kneeling, she repeats.

Indeed, Charlotte, in this great, important moment, is reborn as Edward's wife, for she has freely extricated herself from the labyrinth in which the unguarded natural force of feeling threatened irretrievably to leave her. The first vow before the altar was an oath of fidelity, which she had made without knowing the strength of its enemy, nay, without suspecting the possibility of an attack; the second vow, which she makes to herself, manifests to us the conscious exaltation of the moral idea, which has proceeded out of the contest. The certainty of the sanctity of the substantial power of marriage, has now changed itself into a moral consciousness, which becomes the truth, and, as such, penetrates the whole being. Charlotte has become perfectly aware of its high moral dignity, its force, and its importance.

What is still developed from this point, appears to us only as an out-beaming of this purest consciousness, which, however, can no more raise itself to a higher power (Potenz). The further utterances and actions of Charlotte are, therefore, only the unfolding, and, as it were, the voucher for this moral depth, which has once for all been gained, and which only brings itself perfectly to light.

What any one acquires by means of his moral liberty, is to him a gain, which he neither selfishly locks up, nor believes to be denied to others. He even exhorts his fellow-beings to acquire what he has gained by his struggle on this ground, and expects from kindred beings a victory over themselves with the same confidence, as he cannot suppose them to possess less moral energy. If Charlotte can collect herself to a renewed existence, why should she not hope the same from Edward? On her point of view, it is a very natural delusion, into which she has fallen just through her own strength and circumspection, that that which has been forcibly severed, may be again united. Whoever has so happily moulded† himself into the sphere of the self-denying, how should he not summon to reflection one held fast by passion, and make success dependent from his will alone. This justifies Charlotte in her eloquent appeal to Edward, in which she holds before him the mirror of her own soul. Here she rightly warns him to lay the axe to the tree himself, since, "No one can any more take care of us, we must be our own friends, our own tutors: no one expects of us that we shall lose ourselves in extremes." And looking upon herself as one escaped from passion, she entreats him with as much earnestness as tenderness, not to despise the counsel and aid which she offers. "In troubled cases, he who sees clearest, must act and assist. On this occasion, I am that person. Can you advise me so immediately to renounce my well-acquired happiness, my fairest rights—nay, to renounce you?" To understand the whole value of this situation, we must not forget that Charlotte expresses all this as something that has been thoroughly felt, and has thoroughly thrilled through her inmost being. The intensity exactly lies in this. Before a catastrophe so courageously passed through by Charlotte, such a warning would have been wanting in the fragrance of true womanliness; it would not have been without a shade of a certain "school-mastering," which one would always have listened to doubting whether thought and deed so completely kept pace with each other. This whole scene now appears to us so important, so truly feminine, exactly because we hear from the circumspect and clear-minded lady, a great event in the history of her own feelings—see spread out the germ of a treasure dug up in the depths of the heart. The clearness of thought has seized upon and purified the soul. Throughout the whole, we only hear the eloquent expression of her own purification from the dross of the natural force.

Whoever, like Charlotte, has allowed the moral power so completely to prevail in him, and by it has again restored himself, is able to practice self-denial generally, to renounce his own well and happiness. This is a trait which no more surprises with such a nature, after what it has accomplished. But, nevertheless, it is necessary that she who has seized us by the energy of moral dignity, should elevate us by her moral eminence in the renunciation of her own happiness. But let us consider more closely the circumstances under which this happens. To elevate above all † The expression is, "sich dem Kreise einbilden." The general meaning of the words, "sich einbilden" is, "to imagine to oneself;" but these require the accusative, of the thing imagined; and the "sich" is dative. By going into the root of the word, I have given a meaning, which seems to me to suit the context, but for which I have no precedent.—Translator.

doubt the purity of a remuneration of one's own weal, we must have gained a double conviction: first, that that which the individual gives up, is really a dear and esteemed good; secondly, that he does not gain in exchange some other desired good—nay, that the very thought of such an exchange is decidedly excluded. It is through this certainty that the sacrifice first appears in its true essence, and the self-denying person in his moral eminence.

Let us compare with this general thought the concrete position of Charlotte. It is not until Charlotte sees the fate of several persons, who stand so near to her, in her own hand, that she perceives that the gates of deliberation are completely closed—that the individuals have lost themselves in the labyrinth of passion, that she sees in what has happened a command to resign the possession of Edward. She consents to the separation, with the reflection, "that there are certain things which fate obstinately purposes to carry out. It is in vain that reason and virtue, that duty and everything sacred, stand in the way; something is to happen which is right to fate, but which does not seem right to us, and thus fate at last carries its point, let us demean ourselves as we will." We here see Charlotte, who, before, with all the strength of her soul, exhorted Edward to man himself, and was unwilling to give up all claim to her dear husband, now thoroughly practise self-denial. Her mind bows to that which stands before her as unalterable, and a longer resistance to which appears to her as presumptuous obstinacy. It is not that her understanding pronounces as right that which fate has willed, but she rather bends it to a power, which she regards as unfathomable, but, at the same time, as immovable. Thus she perfects within herself her renunciation of her own views and understanding, and brings the sacrifice of a perfect self-denial.

But Charlotte is not satisfied with a resignation to a "conceptionless" (begriffslos) necessity; for thus, in opposition to her consciousness, had the power appeared to her, to which she resolved to bow. Such a clear nature can, so to speak, only pause for a moment at the difference between its views and actions; it would, during this difference, only yield to a blind necessity, and remain unrecanted in the act of renunciation. Hence it is, that the consciousness of bowing only to a "conceptionless" fatality, elevates itself into the acknowledgment that now an old illusion is dissipated, which had once seen, in Edward's urgency and perseverance, a real love, and had confounded friendly inclination with that full love, which perfectly comprehends the whole being. Placing in this error her whole guilt, which lies, as it were, beyond all imputation, she comprehends her renunciation in the deepest sense, as something commanded by a higher order of things, by which those who were destined for each other, and torn asunder by a mere human delusion, are again united.

The progress of consciousness in this matter is not to be mistaken. Resignation to a blind necessity has changed into a resignation to a higher order of things, which is recognised by the subject, and to which man must yield—nay, sacrifice his weal and woe. It is important that Charlotte exhibits to us the whole process of this elevation of consciousness. The tone of mind which the whole work and its development produces for us—namely, that a higher order of things, exalted above all choice and feeling, triumphs at last over all obstacles, whencesoever they may come,—this term is already acquired by Charlotte. Only in that clear-minded Charlotte, ever striving after the solution of the riddle, can such a result be produced—a result which reveals itself to her in the purest act of her moral depth, and hence appears more like an intuition from which the character of a mere raisonnement of the understanding is completely stripped. The thoroughly subjective colouring which is given to the whole passage, the gradual growth of this result, is the very thing which, at the same time, gives this movement of thought such a force, and makes it the manifestation of a great soul-contest.

But this sacrifice is only the expression of moral elevation, when the individual does not leave open to himself the least prospect of a compensation. As soon as the least doubt prevailed, whether Charlotte was resolved to reject the Captain's hand, when offered by circumstances—nay by Edward himself, the most moral significance of the renunciation would have been disturbed. We hence require the plain open declaration of the noble Charlotte, that she decidedly renounces this highest good, and with such a nature this no more surprises us. Hence this resolution appears to us as the purest act of moral liberty, and of exalted clearness of mind, since to all the inquiry on the part of Edward, as well as to the Captain's question, what he dare hope? she only replies by this refusal: "We have not deserved to be unhappy, but neither have we merited to be happy together." In these weighty words, Charlotte takes upon herself the whole extent of a fault once committed, and at the same time effects an atonement by them, in the very moment when nothing more is opposed to the fulfilment of her inclination—nay, when all combines to make her consent to an union with the Captain, rather as an act for the happiness of others, than for her own satisfaction. Thus is the resignation of all claim to a clear possession, for the sake of a blind passion, connected with the resignation of one's own happiness, at the hands of a revered friend, into a moral deed which peacefully and satisfactorily solves all the collisions of the heart. Charlotte has brought herself quite pure out of the contest; her heart is troubled by no shadow of an impure feeling; at the same time, all harshness, all appearance of a pride in virtue, is so remote from this nature, that we rather see in her infinitely tender treatment of Ottilia the expression of a "fine soul," which has been touched in an infinitely painful manner, by a lot, which regards her only as the great sacrifice of unalterable destiny, determined as it was by nature itself. In the midst of this shattering catastrophe, not a word escapes her, which with self-sufficiency places the deed she accomplished with freedom, in opposition to the lot of the lovers. The last victory, as it has made her internally free from every relic of the natural force, has also endued her with that highest moral grace which, indeed, always determines itself in an innate tact, but never looks back upon itself with a composing glance, and suns itself in the contemplation of a moral preeminence. The relation of Charlotte to Ottilia appears to us, as it were, the exhalation which has placed itself round the moral purity and "virtuosity" of this noble lady, which in the presence of this individual fills us with a feeling of imposing pleasure. Thus is Charlotte the completed, living image of a truly feminine nature, exactly comprehending the greatness of her destination, endowed with all those gifts of heart and mind which have a claim to the exhibition of the most successful and satisfactory existence. That this last is denied her is her destiny—her fate exalted above all responsibility, which has confined her in a sphere, in which is fought out the contest between the natural force of feeling and the moral idea. Even she must be painfully touched by this destiny, since even the purest feast of victory is accompanied by a mourning for the sacrifices which have been required. Great, therefore, as are the results of this triumph, much as it shines before all as an evitable good, when it once comes to a contest, we nevertheless hear, even in the midst of the rejoicing, the cries of pain, which are involuntarily forced out of the proud heart of the conqueror, and which first utterly, silence the thought of a divine government of the world to the restriction of which this victory has, essentially contributed.

Because Charlotte is called to be representative of that point, which, by means of moral freedom, frees itself out of the discord, she required a perfect development, pursued through all its degrees. We have in our treatise carefully pursued the moments of this individuality, in which understanding and feeling so interpenetrate each other as to produce the most beautiful equilibrium, and have endeavoured as much as possible to bring to consciousness the moral relatives in their universal significance and internal connection. We have now, therefore, according to the declaration we made above, to turn to the last group—Edward and Ottilia; and, in the first place, to bring forward the fundamental characteristics of Edward's individuality.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Of Saturday La Figlia del Reggimento, and the ballet of Le Jugement de Paris, formed the entertainments of the evening. The house was full, and the accustomed "ceremonies" took place.

On Tuesday Le Nozze di Figaro was produced, in which Mdlle. Lind attempted the part of Susanna. The other principal characters were thus distributed:—Countess Almaviva, Mad. Castellan—Cherubino, Mad. Solari—Count Almaviva, Signor Coletti—Figaro, Herr Staudigl—Dr. Bartolo, Signor Lablache. Thus, apparently, except in one particular, the cast was strong; but the result dispelled the illusion.

As so much was predicated by the admirers of Mdlle. Lind, in favor of her Susanna, the disappointment was greater than it might have been had nothing been said about it. We must confess that we have seldom witnessed a more unsatisfactory performance from an artiste of renown. There was neither the spirit of the part nor the spirit of the music. Beaumarchais and Mozart were equally lost sight of. Through the whole of the first act, Mdlle. Lind was as stiff and as formal as a boarding-school miss. We could not avoid thinking of Grisi in the duet for Susanna and Marcellina, "La sposa novella," and in the exquisite air, "Venite, inginocchiatevi," where Susanna tries the cap upon Cherubini; we could not but think of Grisi, and sigh for the presence of—we grieve to say it—her natural and lively comedy. But alas! in Mdlle. Lind there was not a spark of humour, not a glimpse of animation. The two first duets with Figaro were correctly sung, but both wanted a little more vivacity. The fine trio, "Cosa sento," with Basilio and the Count, was sadly handled; the two gentlemen did not seem to know what they were about, and the tameness of Mdlle. Lind's delivery helped little to make the matter clearer. There was some excuse, however, for Coletti, in whose behalf indulgence was asked, after the conclusion of the overture (which was played from a set of uncorrected parts, to judge from the wrong notes in the forte passages), on the plea of indisposition. Not that we think Coletti's heavy style at all fitted for the dashing Almaviva. We have already complained of the want of comic humour displayed by Mdlle. Lind in the air "Venite, inginocchiatevi," and unfortunately there was little in her singing to redeem it. Nothing could well have been more insipid. We were greatly disappointed in this song; anticipating something much more refined and sparkling. The only remarkable point was in the last verse at the refrain, on the words "Han certo il lor perché," which, however, Mdlle. Lind, whose classical taste is so much admired, took the liberty of delivering much too slow—making of a naturally effective point what is vulgarly termed a "gag." In the trio, "Susanna or via sortite," with the Count and Countess, where Susanna is behind the curtain, Mdlle. Lind was much more at home, and the ease with which she took the high C (albeit the said high C is not a very musical note,) was admirable. The charming little duet, "Aprite, presto aprite," for Susanna and Cherubino, pre-facing the latter's escape from the window, was executed in anything but faultless style by Mdlle. Lind and Mad. Solari. We, who know the duet by heart, could with difficulty make out any of the phrases of which it is composed. In the finale to the first act, the principal singers were either imperfect or inattentive, and the orchestra was unusually loud, although Balfe effected wonders in keeping it together. A great deal has been said of Mdlle. Lind's "bye-play." We do not deny that she is always engaged upon something—always essaying to act; but not the less are we compelled to affirm that her "bye-play" is often inappropriate, and consequently obtrusive. For example—while Staudigl was singing the "Non piu andrai," Mdlle. Lind who, as the representative of Susanna, should sympathise with Cherubino in his unexpected misfortune, was all the time making faces and gestures at him, significant of irony and contempt; and drawing away the attention of the audience from Figaro, to whom it should properly be directed; a liberty which no actor should take with another. But to such a pitch of unreasonableness has criticism arrived lately, that if Mdlle. Lind simply walks across the stage, it is termed "good acting," or at least "a capital point." Such points, however, escape our faculty of appreciation. After the curtain dropped upon the first act, the principal singers were recalled—a cogent proof of how easily such an honor is gained now-a-days, when audiences who will not think for themselves, are led, by the example of interested persons, to commit no end of absurdities.

We must not leave the first act without noticing Lablache's "La Vendetta," a fine piece of declamatory vocalisation; Staudigl's "Non piu andrai," which, though deficient in power—the great German basso ill brooking the fetters of Italian accent—was vigorous and animated; Madame Solari's "Non so piu cosa son, cosa faccio," ("I know not what I am, or what I am doing,") the words of which exactly described her position; and Madame Castellan's "Porgi amor," which was (after Lablache's "La Vendetta") the best piece of singing during the entire act. Her "Voi che sapete" was not so good; and, moreover, it was absurd to put in the mouth of the Countess—a married lady—a song that speaks the sentiments of an uninformed youth, and can only properly be sung by a damoiseau, or a demoiselle—to borrow terms from la langue Romaine. If Madame Solari could not sing it (and it belongs of right to the Page), Mdlle. Lind should have undertaken it. From the lips of the maiden, Susanna, the sentiments it conveys might reasonably fall. Perhaps Mdlle. Lind did not imagine she could produce any effect in it, and so magnanimously resigned it to Madame Castellan, who sang it coldly enough.

The second act was sadly mutilated. The lovely duet, "Crudel perche," and the noble air, "Vedro, mentr'io sospiro," with the recitative that precedes it, were—owing, we suppose, to Coletti's indisposition—omitted. This put us out of humour, and we paid little attention to the rest. Of course the duet "Sull' aria" was encored—how could it escape it? And, to say truth, it was very gracefully sung by Madame Castellan and Mdlle. Lind. But what the audience meant by calling for a double repetition of the fag end of a piece of unaccompanied recitative—where Susanna, Marcellina, Figaro, and Barbarina wind up a passage with a long shake—we were puzzled to divine. Mozart, who wrote the passage, would have been puzzled himself. The sandango which follows the chorus, "Amanti costanti;" the air for Basilio, "In quegli anni;" and many other good things, were cut out altogether. But Mdlle. Lind restored the pleasing little ballad in F, "Deh vieni non tardar," which she sang with charming taste, sinning only by occasional exaggeration of ritardandos and elongations of cadences. In all other respects this performance was worthy of the best ballad-singing of Kitty Stephens, the queen of ballad-singers. One ballad, however, sung to perfection though it be, cannot atone for the mediocrity displayed throughout a whole opera. There remains nothing more to say but that the second finale was rendered with tolerable energy by all concerned, though with no great degree of intelligence. The curtain fell upon what can only be termed a failure.

The general performance of the opera did not reach mediocrity. The minor parts were inefficiently rendered. The chorusses were noisy, but neither refined nor invariably correct. The band, thanks to Balfe—who knows the score thoroughly, and must have fagged incessantly to get anything like order from such materials—was never so correct in expression, never less coarse and scratchy in execution. What a pity all the violoncellos were not Piattis, all the basses not Anglois, all the oboes not Lavignes, all the violins not Pluys', Tolbecques, and Nadauds! Balfé would have had something like a band, then, for his Figaro. With a less intelligent and practised director, a break down, in the present instance, would have been inevitable. But this is not the first time we have had occasion to be thankful for Balfé's energy and skill during the season—nor the second, nor the third, nor even the tenth nor the twentieth—shall we say the fiftieth time? The costumes and scenery were not in that spirit of munificence which characterised the managerial policy previous to Mdle. Lind's arrival. Great stress has been laid by some of the press upon the fact of Mr. Lumley having deferred the representation of Figaro until the term of the subscription was at an end. But as the opera was represented the subscribers have no cause for complaint. They would have had legitimate reason to grumble, had they been obliged to hear Mozart's great work performed in such a fashion:

It would appear that the management of Her Majesty's Theatre has been sturdily endeavouring of late to merit the reproach levelled against the Israelites of old; who "waxed fat and kicked." Certainly, a very small part of the money that has flowed into the treasury since the "Nightingale's" advent, has flowed out of the treasury for the expenses of the costumier, decorator, and scene-painter;—while the band, inefficient as it was at the beginning of the season, is likely, from all we learn, to be still more so next season. Such economy is ill advised. A grand lyrical establishment without a band and chorus of appropriate excellence, is deficient in the most essential department of its machinery; and this is the condition of Her Majesty's Theatre at the present epoch. Mr. Lumley should mend the matter while he may. The "Lind mania" will certainly not last another season, even though Meyerbeer should come, with his Camp of Silesia, to prop it up. It is tottering even now. The stout and successful opposition to he recall for Mdle. Lind—which issued from certain boxes, after the second act of the opera on Tuesday night, was full of meaning and significance. John Bull is getting ashamed of the fatuity into which he so heedlessly allowed himself to be betrayed. A reaction is at hand. Mdle. Lind's Norma was a great failure; but Mdle. Lind's Susanna is a greater. Will the fair Swede essay another of Grisi's parts? We hope she may not be so ill advised.

After the opera we took the opportunity of witnessing our favorite of last season, Le Jugement de Paris, one of the happiest efforts of Perrot. Taglioni was all herself; Cerito more than ever animated and graceful; Perrot as lively as a squirrel; but Lucile Grahn's place was ill supplied by Rosati, who continues to look at her feet as pertinaciously as ever; and the part of Louise Taglioni was most clumsily interpreted by a coryphée whose name we did not learn, having no bill. In short much of the charm of last year's performance had vanished away utterly.

On Thursday Figaro was repeated with the same ballet. To night, La Sonhambula will be given, with Le Jugement de Paris, being the last performances of the present season, of which we must postpone our resumé till next week.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday and Tuesday the Donna del Lago was repeated for the second and third times. The enthusiasm it excited on the first representation was not an atom abated on the second or third. The same encores took place, the same recalls, and the same ovations. We must be necessarily curt in our notice, as we have already devoted so much space to the resumé of the Royal Italian Opera season. On Saturday, after the performance of La Donna del Lago, a new divertissement was produced for Mdle. Plunkett, expressly composed for her by Signor Casati, the talented maitre de ballet. Signor Casati has manufactured a very pleasing ballet divertissement from some slender materials connected with the fortunes of a Naiad, or Water-spirit. He has divided it into two tableaux, a sylvan and aquatic, both very beautifully put on the stage. Then Signor Casati has introduced various picturesque groupings; and has supplied some exceedingly pretty dances for the choregraphs. And Signor Casati, in fine, has composed some delicious pas for the ever-graceful Plunkett; and has woven a highly effective divertissement. The dancing of Plunkett was extremely elegant. Her dress was the most picturesque we have seen for a long time, and, altogether, she looked most charming. Mdle. Plunkett received immense applause, and had showers of bouquets flung to her after several pas. The divertissement was entirely successful, and will, no doubt, run to the last night of the season. On Thursday the Nozze di Figaro was repeated; and was magnificently done. The audience was roused to a greater pitch of excitement than at any previous performance, and after summoning all the performers twice, called for Costa at the end. We are glad to find that the public are beginning to feel the real worth of Sig. Costa at the Royal Italian Opera. Better late than never. The subscription season closes to-night with Semiramide; but on Tuesday, there will be one more performance before the curtain drops its last.

SONNET.

No. XLVIII.

I MAY conceal the truth with outside fair,
Deceiving others and myself the most;
Looking within, I feel what I have lost,
Glancing upon my heart—'tis written there;
The smile upon the lips, when eyeballs glare
With anguish, is not more an empty boast
Than mine, when—on a restless ocean tost—
I give the name of solace to despair.
Despair! rise in thy dark magnificence,
Come in thine awful truth, cast off disguise,
Tread out the torch of Hope, that makes men err,
With thy hot breath banish delusion hence—
As when, perchance, the sun, in wintry skies,
Melting the snow, reveals a sepulchre.—N.D.

GIORGIO RONCONI.

THIS celebrated dramatic vocalist was born in Venice on the 6th of August, 1814. His father, Domenico Ronconi, an artiste of great eminence in his time, was first tenor to Alexander, Emperor of Russia, Francesco 1st of Austria, and Maximilian of Bavaria. Giorgio Ronconi received his earliest instructions in singing, at Milan, from Rosa Ronconi, his sister, who, though an amateur, was an excellent musician. During this time his father was at Munich, fulfilling the office of maitre de chant, at the court of Maximilian—father of the present King of Bavaria, renowned as a warm patron of the arts and Lola Montez. At his return, young Giorgio, who had made considerable progress, and already knew more than his sister, profited by the experience and knowledge of his parent, and under his admirable tuition advanced rapidly in his studies. After two years practice he went to Pavia, a university town situated about ten miles from Milan; and, bitten with the rage for dramatic representations, entered into an engagement with the manager of the Opera there. He made his début, at eighteen years of age, in the part of Arturo (created by Tamburini), in Bellini's La Straniera. The composer himself was present, and felicitated Ronconi warmly on his success; and here a friendship was begun between Bellini and Ronconi, which endured until the lamented death of the former put an end to it. The impresario of La Scala at Milan, the well-known Merelli; was also present on this occasion, and was desirous of securing the services of the youthful débütante for the troupe he was then forming for the Carnival. But Ronconi was fearful of risking the consequences, at his early age, of a failure at the largest theatre of Italy; and preferred accepting an engagement which was offered him, for the Carnival, at the little theatre of Cremona. There he appeared in La Straniera, Donizetti's Olivo e Pasquale (not Don Pasquale), and Il Barone di Dolseim, an opera by Pacini. His success was uncontested, and the result was an engagement for the Opera at Bologna, with Madame Ungher and Signor Poggi; afterwards the husband of Mlle. Frezzolini, the now celebrated soprano. At Bologna, Ronconi gained fresh laurels in La Straniera and I Normani in Parigi, an opera by Mercadante. The sensation he produced in this last opera was so deep; that it procured him an engagement for the great fiéra (fair) at Pádua, where the same operas were produced, with the addition of Mercadante's Gabrielle di Vergy, and Eufemio di Messina of Persiani. From Padua, Ronconi proceeded to Rome, where Donizetti; at the time, was engaged to write an opera for the troupe of the Valle, the second lyrical theatre in the city of the Cæsars. The popular maestro had but small faith in the new comer, and it was with a faint heart that he submitted to his care the principal part in his new work, Il Furioso. But contrary to all expectations, Ronconi created a perfect furor in this opera; and was the main cause of its success. So content was Donizetti, that the year following he wrote Torquato Tasso—one of his capital works—especially for Ronconi, the triumph of which is now a matter of history. For fifty-two representations in succession the theatre was so full; that crowds were sent away from the doors every night. After his success in Il Furioso, Ronconi appeared at Piacenza, and at Padua (for the second time), where he gained new honors. It was thence he returned to Rome, in the season of the Carnival, and achieved the triumph in Torquato Tasso, which we have already recorded. From Rome he proceeded to Turin, where, at the theatre Carignano, he sang in Rossi's Il Disertore Svizzero, Herold's Zampa, and Donizetti's Parisina. In the same season he was engaged at the Teatro Reggio, where Mercadante wrote for him La Francesca Donato, which, in spite of the favor accorded to Ronconi, achieved but a cold reception, and was not played more than nineteen times. In Italy an opera that is only played nineteen times is considered almost a failure.

Ronconi's next engagement was at the San Carlo of Naples, where his Torquato Tasso created the same sensation as at Rome. Not only were the abonnés of the great Neapolitan Opera wound up to an unusual pitch of enthusiasm, but a young and beautiful lady, Giovannina Giannoni, an enthusiastic amateur, and daughter of the Cesare Giannoni (pupil of the celebrated Fenaroli, of the Neapolitan Conservatoire), was so charmed by the talent of the young barytone, that, on making his acquaintance, and finding a reciprocity of sentiment on his part, she consented to admit his addresses, and in less than three months was wedded to him—which important event in the life of Ronconi happened on the 18th of October, 1837. From this time Ronconi remained two years at Naples, where he performed no less than 282 times. Among the operas in which he appeared, were Torquato Tasso, Jean de Calais (Donizetti), Il Bravo (Marllani), Emma d'Antiochia (Mercadante), Il Campagnello (Donizetti), I Saraceni in Caltanea (Persiani), and Lara (Ruolz)—all of which were written expressly for him—besides many others too long to recite. At this time the theatre was managed by a society of distinguished Neapolitan dilettante. The troupe comprised the following celebrities:—prime donne, Madame Malibran, Madame Ronzi de Begnis, Madame Persiani, Madame Duprez (wife of the celebrated Duprez), Madame Schulz, Madame Ungher; tenore, Duprez (who commenced his career in Italy, and at this period, which was immediately previous to his appearance at the Académie in Paris, was a singer of very little note); Reina (a great vocalist in his day, and the admitted rival of Donzelli), Donzelli himself, Moriani, Salvi, Pedrazzi; bassi, Lablache, Coselli, (for whom Donizetti wrote Parisina) Crespi, Porto (nephew of the celebrated Porto, for whom Rossini wrote the part of Brabantio, in Otello, and who had the most extended register of voice ever known of its genre), Ronconi, and many others. This was the greatest, most various, and most efficient company ever known in Italy. And yet, with so magnificent a troupe, it is a positive fact, that on one occasion, in consequence of Duprez being absent on leave at Ancona, and Ronconi being indisposed, the theatre was obliged to be closed—and that on Sunday, ordinarily the most profitable day of the week in the Italian operatic towns. Herefrom two great operatic establishments, not far off, which we will not specialise by name, might derive a beneficial lesson, to guide them in the formation of their future companies.

During the three succeeding years Ronconi visited Livourno, Florence, Bologna, Verona, Trieste, Venice, Sinigaglia (la porte des Français,—Seno Gallia—the birth place of the great and renowned Pio IX, who was governor of the town at the time of the engagement of Ronconi, with whom he lived on terms of friendly intimacy,) Faenza, &c., each of which towns he visited at least four or five times. During his last season but one in Italy (the autumn of 1841), Ronconi was at Modena, where the well-known Laporte, formerly director of Her Majesty's Theatre, happened to be staying at the time. Laporte was so delighted with Ronconi's talents that he immediately engaged him for London, for the spring of the following year. Accordingly, after fulfilling his last engagement in Italy, at the Carnival of Milan, Ronconi arrived in England in April 1842. Laporte, whose judgment in artistic matters was justly renowned, had been struck with the talent displayed by Ronconi in two very opposite characters—Filippo, in Bellini's Beatrice di Tenda, and Dulcamarra, in Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore—characters demanding respectively the deepest tragic and the liveliest comic powers. Madame Ronconi, who played the part of Adina in L'Elisir d'Amore, also favourably attracted the attention of Laporte, and was included in the engagement. On their arrival in England, however, the Ronconis found poor Laporte dead, and Mr. Lumley, the present lessee, in his place as director. Their engagement, nevertheless, was equally valid, and in Beatrice di Tenda, Lucia di Lammermoor, Don Giovanni, Elena di Feltro (Mercadante), Il Barbiere di Siviglia, L'Elisir d'Amore, Torquato Tasso, Roberto Devereux, I Puritani, and Mosé in Egitto, Ronconi exhibited the variety of his resources, and the energy and originality of his talent, to singular advantage. After the season he undertook a tour in the provinces, accompanied by Thalberg, Made. Ronconi, and John Parry, during which he sang at forty-six concerts, in rapid succession.

Subsequent to this tour, Ronconi went to Paris, where he gave several concerts, and sang at all the soirées of the nobility, in company with Mad. Ronconi. His reception at Paris was so great that M. Vatel engaged him for the Italian Opera, where he made a brilliant début, and where he has remained ever since for five years) one of the most attractive members of the troupe.

At Vienna, where Ronconi had previously created a great sensation in 1839, Donizetti composed for him the opera of Maria di Rohan, in 1843, which produced an effect that has never been effaced in that city of connoisseurs. From Vienna Ronconi proceeded to Pesth, in Hungary, where he was equally well received. The operas there performed were Maria di Rohan, Beatrice di Tenda, and L'Elisir d'Amore, in all of which Made. Ronconi shared the success of her celebrated caro sposo. From Pesth Ronconi came back once more to Paris, where he formed an engagement with M. Salamanca for the opera at Madrid. At the Spanish capital he became such an immense favourite that M. Salamanca entered into terms with him, to form and direct the entire company for the ensuing year. The troupe engaged by Ronconi included Made. Persiani, Made. Ronconi, Salvi, Marini, &c. In the previous year (his first in Spain) Ronconi visited Barcelona, where he gave five representations; after which he returned to Naples, the scene of his most frequent triumphs, and performed with Made. Anna Bishop in Beatrice di Tenda. Since then Ronconi's visits to Paris have been annual; he is an enormous favorite with the Parisians, who will not admit any one to be his equal as a dramatic singer. The result of his engagement this year with the Royal Italian Opera is well known to the readers of the Musical World. Ronconi is an honorary associate of the Accademia di Santa Cecilia, at Rome, Naples, Venice, Bologna, and Firenze, and an honorary member of the Capella Sistina at Rome. His repertory is more varied and numerous than that of any other living dramatic vocalist. Twenty-five operas have been expressly written for him:—L'avvertimento ai Gelosi, by Balfe; Il Furioso, Torquato Tasso, Maria Rudenz, Il Campanello, Maria di Rohan, and Maria Padilla of Donizetti; I Saraceni in Cattanea, Eufemio di Messina, Il Fantasma, and L'Orfana Savojarda of Persiani; Corrado d'Altamura, and Il Disertore per Amore of Ricci; Nabucco, by Verdi; Francisca Donata, by Mercadante; and others by Ruolz, Vaccaj, Nini, Lillo, Rossi, Gervasi, Gerli, Raimondi, and Bornaccini. With these, and the other operas in which he is famous, Ronconi's repertoire includes no less than 140 works, by various composers, ancient and modern, in any of which he is ready to sing at a moment's notice!

Our own high opinion of Ronconi's dramatic and vocal talents has been given too often to need repeating here. It is enough to say that we consider him one of the most extraordinary of living artistes—one of the greatest and most versatile. And, to add another charm to all this, he is as modest and unaffected as a child.

RACHEL AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

SINCE our last, Rachel has appeared in Phédre, Virginie, and Jeanne d'Arc. There is a charm in everything she does; she realizes so intensely the beau-ideal of the tragic poet, that we find it difficult to pronounce which character she most excels in. We were delighted with her in Camille—as we faintly endeavoured to pourtray last week—and perhaps if asked to say which character we would recommend any one to see her in, who had never seen Rachel before, we should say Camille in Les Horaces. But to see her in Camille alone is to know but little of her talent. Phédre calls for far greater display of her tragic powers—and what more difficult to depict than the guilty love-stricken woman, consumed by a passion of which she is not only the unwilling, but the resisting victim! No one can describe her wonderful acting in Racine's masterpiece; it must be seen, and by those only who have seen it can it be felt and appreciated. Her reception was far more enthusiastic than on Monday night, and she was recalled at the end of each act—even after the final close, so powerfully given, of her death by poison. This calling before the curtain is a most unmeaning and senseless custom, and after a closing scene like the one in Les Horaces, or in Phédre, it becomes truly painful, and jars all feelings of propriety; it must be a very doubtful sort of compliment to the actor when she has just been taking such pains to convince us she was dying! It wants reforming altogether; surely some more suitable mode of expressing approbation might be adopted. Tartuffe was admirably played the same evening by the other members of Mr. Mitchell's troupe, especially Tartuffe by M. Brevame, and Orgon's wife by Madlle. Rabut; nor must we omit to mention favourably Orgon's beaufrère, by M. Cloup, and the suivante by Mdle. Derouet—it was a capital performance. But one of Molière's comedies and Racine's tragedy make too long a performance to be given the same evening. We did not see her Virginie on Friday, but understand it was another triumph for Rachel. On Saturday evening we saw her, for the last time in Manchester, in Soumet's tragedy, Jeanne d'Arc—a most lovely picture it was! one that will never be effaced from our memory. We are sorry to say the house was not a very good one—the thinnest of the four, and that Mr. Knowles and Mr. Mitchell (whose joint venture it was) will be anything but gainers by this the first attempt at bringing out Rachel in the provinces! Next week we shall have Jenny Lind. Mr. Knowles will make money by her engagement, as nearly every place in the theatre is taken for her four nights.—Will she satisfy us as well as Rachel has done? We shall see. Meantime, the Lind seems to be falling into disfavour with the Editor of the Musical World, this last week or two, as well as Her Majesty's Theatre generally.

MUSIC AT MARGATE.

SIR,—Observing that you frequently insert communications from provincial correspondents on matters musical, may I request that you will spare a corner for a sketch of our doings at Margate, in the harmonic line. Promenade concerts take place every evening, in the spacious room belonging to the Royal Hotel, under the direction of Mr. Gardner, a talented violoncello player, belonging to the band of Her Majesty's Theatre, who has adapted several overtures and selections from popular operas, as septetts for violins, violoncello, double bass, flute, cornet, and pianoforte; these are performed in a very efficient manner by Messrs. Bradley, Gardner, Taylor, A. Wells, Davies, Taylure, &c., most of whom play solos on their several instruments in very clever style. Interspersed with the instrumental pieces, are songs by the Misses Kenneth, Mrs. A. Newton, and others. Mr. J. L. Hatton, the composer, is announced for a pianoforte performance and a buffo song, and we look for his appearance with interest; he was highly successful last year. The concert terminates at half-past nine, when dancing commences under the direction of Mr. Mott, from Her Majesty's Theatre, and is kept up with great spirit and respectability for two hours, to a most excellent orchestra. The Tivoli Gardens are open every afternoon, and concerts take place in the evening under the direction of the veteran, Sinclair, whose property the gardens are; he sings Scottish ballads with great applause. Songs and duets are also nicely sung by Miss Harcourt and Miss Millar. After which dancing commences to a good band, and the whole concludes with a brilliant display of fireworks.

At St. Peter's, two miles on the Ramsgate road, music and dancing take place daily; and we have had some soi-disant negroes, with their banjos and their bones. There is a band of sixteen Germans on the Pier, which plays three times a day, while the visitors promenade. We have also our Jenny Lind, who sings ballads, accompanying herself on the guitar, at the end of the Jetty, when the tide is out; so, Sir, I think you will allow that Margate is not an anti-musical place. I perceive, in a popular Sunday paper, a sketch of our renowned town crier, which, I assure you, is by no means overcharged. Mr. Phillpott is one of the most eccentric and amusing fellows imaginable. He was born a poet, although his profession is only that of a cobbler; as he himself observes, "I cries all the summer, and cobbles all the winter." The manner in which he announces the amusements, the sailing of the steam boats, goods to sell, &c., is highly laughable; he generally accomplishes his devoir in doggerel verse, and the visitors crowd around him whenever they hear his bell. As a specimen of his poetical talent, I send you one of his recent effusions respecting the promenade concerts, premising that his delivery is most quaint and ludicrous; he lays emphasis and makes long pauses in wrong places, taking all sorts of liberties with the Queen's English—ecce signum—

"Ye gents and ye ladies attend to my call,
When the consort is over—there will be a ball!

(Tingle-ting—Tingle-ting.)

"The gentry is invited
To the consorts for to go,
Where they will be delighted,
As very well I know.
The music, which is pretty,
Begins exact at eight,—
Then quit the Pier and Jetty,
And to the rooms go straight.
The singing is enchanting,
The playing very fine,
In short, there's nothing wanting
To make it all dewine!"

You shall hear from me again, the moment I find anything worth noting for the information of your readers.—Your obedient servant,

HARMONICUS.

PROVINCIAL.

LEICESTER.—Considerable excitement has been manifested during the last fortnight by the announcement of a concert to be given, for which the Distin family was engaged, and who made their appearance before a Leicester audience on Monday evening last, at the Theatre. The house was very well and fashionably attended, and we beg most heartily to congratulate our worthy townsman, Mr. H. Nicholson, on the success which has attended his spirited attempt to introduce for the first time these artistes in Leicester. Mr. Distin's performance of Dr. Arne's "Soldier Tired" was redemanded. Miss O'Connor made a favourable impression on the audience by her unaffected manner of singing. We must not omit to mention the piano-forte accompanying of Mr. Willy, which added greatly to the general effect, and who also played a concerto of Doehler's in a first-rate manner.—Leicester Advertiser.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CAMEO ENGRAVINGS.—The finest specimens that are known are those devoted to Mythological subjects, and consequently are liable to the caprice or fancy of the artist, whose object is to pourtray the general character, without the necessity of subscribing to the features, except so far as they are classically delineated. A young Medallist of the name of Picourt has struck out a new path, and has ventured upon taking likenesses on Cameos which of course are unperishable, and his essays have been crowned with the greatest success by those of her Majesty and the Prince Consort. His stay in this Country will be of some duration unless called upon to resume his avocations as a medallist at Paris.—(From a Correspondent.)

BENEDICT left London, on Thursday, to join his family at Boulogne. Benedict intends during the recess to visit the principal towns of Germany.

FELIX GODFROID, the harpist has gone to Boulogne Sur Mer.

MRS. FANNY BUTLER.—An interesting anecdote is told of Mrs. Butler on her passage from Jersey to this island. It appears that the fair actress was very ill on board the steamer, and consequently not much in the humour to be disturbed or spoken to. The stewardess, however, was obliged to ask for the fare. Her application was responded to by Mrs. Butler, with a tone and attitude strictly theatrical—"Woman, when you see a poor creature, suffering as I am now, you should not ask her for money."—Guernsey Sun.

GIBSON, THE HARLEQUIN.—This popular pantomimist and dancer met with a premature death by drowning, on Sunday, at Liverpool, while bathing in the river Mersey.

A MUSICIAN IN TROUBLE.—About noon on Friday, as the band of the First Royal Regiment was at practice in the Regent-road Barrack, all the members of the band, with the exception of the non-commissioned officers and one or two privates, made a simultaneous attack on Signor Castaldini, the band-master of the regiment. Throwing a sheet over him, so as to prevent his identifying any one in particular, they beat him with their fists severely about the head and the body, though not so as to inflict any severer injury on his person than a sound thrashing. Of course all the offenders were immediately placed in confinement. Colonel Bell forthwith instituted an inquiry into the cause of this outrage; and from what we have heard, we understand that it is alleged to have been provoked by a long series of violent, harsh, and offensive treatment to which the men have been subjected by the band-master. This was the more irritating to the band, as Signor Castaldini is a civilian, and has therefore no right to abuse the power intrusted to him, as he has nothing to do with the discipline of the men, beyond the performance of his duty in teaching them music. As his name implies, he is an Italian, a musician of considerable talent, and successful as a teacher; but it is said that he has been in the habit of applying to the band generally the most contemptuous epithets, such as "English brutes," and other terms unfit for publication; and that his behaviour towards them has at length driven the men to inflict this summary punishment on the one holding for the time the position of their officer. They would have acted much more wisely in preferring a complaint of Signor Castaldini's conduct to Colonel Bell, whose known impartiality would have insured them attention, a fair investigation and ample justice. It is said that Signor Castaldini, on a former occasion was similarly treated by the band of the 11th Foot, for like conduct towards them, and that his connexion with that regiment was then terminated by his discharge. In all probability he will soon cease to be band-master of the Royals.—Manchester Guardian.

MR. STUART and his accomplished daughter have been playing with great success at the Queen's Theatre, Manchester.

A GRAND CONCERT was given yesterday in the concert-room of Her Majesty's Theatre, in aid of the Chorus belonging to the establishment. All the artistes lent their services gratis, and the attraction was immense, especially since Mdle. Jenny Lind descended to sing. We need not specialize all the morceaux. Those which obtained most applause were, of course, given by the Swedish Nightingale. She was encored in "Quand je quittai la Normandie," in "Sul l'aria," with Madame Castellan; and in two of her Swedish Melodies. The first song was brilliantly given, the duet was very charming; and the two National Melodies exhibited the peculiar qualities of the fair artist to very great advantage. Gardoni gave the "Spirito Gentil," from Le Favourite, with great expression and feeling. Staudigl sang two songs, one from Balfe's Casle of Aymon, in which he was much applauded. There were, besides, the usual solos, duets, trios, &c., and the whole choir gave choruses of Verdi and Bolognese. Balfe accompanied almost every morceau with his customary skill and efficiency. The concert-room was full, but not inconveniently crowded.

THE GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.

Gloucester, Sunday, Sept. 26th, 1847.

DEAR RYAN,—My last was cut short by the anticipation of an immediate ascent to the top of Gloucester Cathedral. But I did not go, and might have got to the end of my letter without interruption. The reason of my non-ascent I have forgotten. Therefore, without further preface, let me pursue the main subject of the present communication—the Festival.

To begin at the end—there has not been for many years a meeting which has given so much satisfaction and proved so light a burden on the shoulders of the stewards, who do not like paying through the nose, gentlemen though they be. But to return to the beginning—I have already furnished you with an account of the first day's proceedings, and the following are the remaining contents of my common-place book:—

Wednesday.—The clouds are gone to the hills; the sun rides alone in the sky; birds are singing, insects buzzing, bells chiming, carriages rolling; the old city is alive again, and the aspect of things proclaims a joyous Festival. It is strange—but I have remarked, since 1836, in the month of May, when Paulus was first performed, at the triennial Rhenish Festival, held that year in Dusseldorf—that the name of Mendelssohn is sure to bring fine weather. I cannot recall, during eleven years, any musical event in which Mendelssohn has been concerned, without the memory of blue sky and sunshine spontaneously accompanying the recollection. It will seem odd, but it is nevertheless true, and I have taken such particular note of it that I cannot be mistaken. The Elijah, this morning, the grand event of the Festival, is another instance to add to my collection. You will say, the oratorio opens with a prophecy that there shall be neither rain nor dew "for these years;" but this is merely punning upon the circumstance, and is unworthy of you. Certain it is, however, that the sky, which yesterday was all brown, to-day is all blue, and I have a superstitious credence that Mendelssohn's Elias is the real cause of the change.

The Cathedral was crammed to repletion. Elijah is destined to be a great popular idol, like the Messiah—an attraction never failing—a sure card in Festivals; and it deserves to be—for, nearer than any other work, it approaches the beauty, grandeur, and sublimity of Handel's masterpiece. The performance on the whole was excellent. The band was careful, the chorus on the alert, the soloists on their mettle. Madame Caradori and Miss A. Williams were the sopranos, Miss Dolby and Miss M. Williams the contraltos, Mr. Lockey and Mr. Williams the tenors, Herr Staudigl and Mr. Weiss the basses. I will not tire you with a repetition of details which have more than once been given in the Musical World. You know my opinion of these vocalists, apropos of their exertions in the Elijah. Suffice it they exhibited their usual merits and their usual zeal. I have only to protest against the impropriety of taking from Miss A. Williams the part in the duet, "Lord, bow down thine ear to our prayer," which Mendelssohn himself assigned to her in Birmingham, and which is not suited to Madame Caradori's voice or style of singing. The conductor, Mr. Amott, had studied the score attentively, and only sinned, here and there, in dragging the times:—as for example in the overture, which was taken much too slow, and in several of the choruses. The organ, in the hands of Mr. Townsend Smith, was what Mendelssohn intended:—a medium for strengthening the harmony and varying the instrumentation—not a coarse obtrusive feature, as it has been made elsewhere. The sensation produced by Elijah justified all that the Gloucester amateurs had anticipated. Its success, both in an artistic and pecuniary point of view, was triumphant. There was but one opinion about it. Worcester, next year, and Hereford, the year after (unless Mr. Done and Mr. Smith, the organists of either cathedral, be not the men for whom I take them) will imitate the example of Gloucester, and make the Elijah the prominent attraction of the Festival.

The second miscellaneous concert took place in the evening, at the Shire Hall. Mendelssohn was again the feature of the programme, and with the overture and incidental music in A Midsummer Night's Dream, the performances commenced. Nothing new can be said of this chef d'œuvre. Let it suffice that the overture was well performed, albeit a shade too slow; the scherzo ditto ditto; the two-part song, "Ye spotted snakes," was ably rendered by the Misses Williams and chorus; the interlude, in A minor, of "Hermia seeking Lysander in the wood" was omitted; the notturmo was not so well played as the other instrumental pieces; the wedding march, brilliantly but noisily executed, was encored by the whole audience; and the final chorus "Through this house," went with great precision and delicacy. Like the Walpurgis Night, the Midsummer Night's Dream has now tested the ordeal of the three choirs; admired, applauded at Worcester, it was more admired, more applauded at Hereford, most admired and most applauded at Gloucester. A better sign of the advancement of musical taste in the provinces could hardly be looked for.

After the last echo of Mendelssohn's faëry music had died away, Alboni, the gorgeous Alboni, with her portly frame and winning smile, came forward and sang "Una voce poco fa," after her own peculiar fashion, and at once produced an impression which has had no parallel in the musical annals of Gloucester. It is enough to say that Alboni sang in her usual style, to account for the effect she produced. She was rapturously encored, and repeated the allegro with increased brilliancy. There was scarcely a note of Rossini's text, but the thing had a charm of its own that was quite irresistible. Alboni's triumph was followed by Staudigl, who sang a lugubrious recitative and air by one Fuchs in first-rate style, giving place to Miss Dolby and Mr. Lockey, who rendered due justice to Balfé's graceful duet, "The sailor sighs as sinks his native shore," and were in their turn followed by Mrs. Weiss, who distinguished herself favourably in the elegant song, "They little know the charms," from Benedict's opera of The Crusaders,—the first part concluding with the duet "Dunque io son," which was read in a style thoroughly original, by Alboni and Staudigl.

Then ensued the "interval of twenty minutes," which might have been termed an interlude, so loud was the causerie, and so boisterous the merriment; the prime motive thereto being John Parry's "London Season," in the course of which the buffo unique sui generis (it requires three tongues to apostrophise him) introduced, with singular felicity and apropos, the name of the gifted Alboni, whose singing had so stirred the hearts of the auditors. And to say that John Parry sang was to say that John Parry was encored—Albert Smith coming in for his share of the ovations, although not present to endure them in propria persona.

Weber's tremendous overture to Euryanthe, capitally played, began the second part, and was followed by Curschman's smooth terzettinello, "Ti prego," which was pleasantly chaunted by the pretty Misses Williams and Mr. Lockey. Then once more the voice of Alboni pealed through the building, until it was alive with pulsatory vibrations, that made the atmosphere quiver, as with delight at being thus deliciously oppressed. The air was "Il segreto," the well-known bacchanalian from Lucrezia. To describe the sensation and the triple encore demands a pen more used to apostrophe than mine, which I lay down in despair. It was a rare treat, however, to behold the crowd, moved as the sea by tempestuous winds, roar and roar again with convulsions of satisfaction. Mr. Lockey's quiet reading of Hatton's quaint serenade, "The silver moon," nevertheless, did not fail to find appreciators. Of the glee, "O by rivers," (also styled serenade), "arranged" by Bishop, from Wilson and Saville (a large companionship in such a small commodity) albeit nicely rendered by Miss Dolby, Misses A. and M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Weiss, I would rather say (because I think nothing) nothing. But no praise can be too warm for Miss Dolby, who in Mozart's unaffected and lovely air, "Quando miro," sang in such unaffected and lovely style as to move all hearts to feel, all hands to applaud, all voices to say, "once more!" And once more the charming singer gave a tongue to that divine melody, and once more impressed her hearers with a sense of her own great merits and Mozart's unapproachable supremacy. Nothing in the concert—not even Mendelssohn's Dream, not even Alboni's oily tones—pleased more than this modest air, thus modestly interpreted. The music and the singer were worthy of each other. Another encore followed, for Staudigl, who sang with glorious fervour, the glorious, "Ruddier than the cherry," from the pearl of pastorals, Acis and Galatea. It is but truth to say that the Gloucester audience knew what to applaud and what to be indifferent to, as well as any London audience I ever came amidst. They showed it in their instant appreciation of the two gems last mentioned.

Nor did the beautiful tone and finished execution of Mr. Williams, in a fantasia upon the clarionet, escape the best appreciation; the air, "Hope told," was exquisitely played, and the variations were executed with masterly ease. Miss Martha Williams sang a little air, by one Krebs, "Dearest I think of thee," in a manner that was not the less attractive because it was wholly unpretending: A M.S. song, by H. Legent, "Old customs," though intelligently rendered by Mr. Weiss, did not make any great impression. The duet, "Bella imago," from Semiramide, by Alboni and Staudigl, was the last item of the programme, and played the audience out—which, by the way, was but a mean compliment to the great artistes who were singing. The attendance at this concert was numerous, but not inconveniently crowded, as might have been anticipated from the attractions of the programme. But Alboni's influence was more legitimately exerted after she had been heard, and early the next day not a ticket was to be obtained for the third concert, par amours or otherwise.

Thursday.—I shall make short work of this day's selection, in the Cathedral, which was fragmentary in form and egregious in length. The first part commenced with "Spring," from Haydn's Seasons—Miss A. Williams, Mrs. Weiss, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Weiss, taking the solos; and concluded with some fragments from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, in which Madame Caradori Allan, the Misses Williams, Mrs. Weiss, Messrs. Lockey, Weiss, Williams, Genge, Ashton, Smythson, and Herr Staudigl, were the principals. The second part began with a selection from Beethoven's Mass in C, the solos by Miss Dolby, the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey and Herr Staudigl; proceeded with the chorus, "Rex tremendæ," and quartet, "Recordare," from Mozart's Requiem (Miss A. Williams, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Weiss,) the air, "Rolling with foaming billows," (Staudigl), the air, "With verdure clad," (Madame Caradori), the air, "In native worth," (Mr. Lockey), a chorus, "Gloria in excelsis," by Pergolesi, the air, "Gratias agimus," by Guglielmi, (Madame Caradori, with Mr. Williams on the clarionet), a duet, "Forsake me not," by Spohr, (Miss A. Williams and Mr. Lockey), the air, "But the Lord is mindful," from St. Paul, (Miss Dolby), a quartet unaccompanied, "Alla trinita beata," (Madame Caradori, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Herr Staudigl), and a chorus, by Haydn, "The Arm of the Lord," and concluded with some pieces from Handel's Israel in Egypt, in which Madame Caradori, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Weiss, and Herr Staudigl officiated as principals. This motley classification of good and indifferent music produced an universal effect of ennui. It proved quite unattractive, moreover, for the attendance was unusually scanty, although the weather was fine, and expectations of a successful third day had been general. But the truth must be told:—pol-pourris are going rapidly out of fashion, and strong hopes may be entertained of their ultimate abolishment, never to be revived again, by which music will be an immense gainer.

Equally brief shall I be with the concert in the evening—the third and last—of which the following was the scheme:

Alboni triumphed again, was encored in both her songs, and solicited by a deputation from the stewards to sing yet another—with which solicitation she cheerfully complied, repeating the Bacchanalian from Lucrezia, which had created so great a sensation on the night previous. Here let me make the amende honorable to Mr. Lindsay Sloper, who has been accompanying Alboni on her tour, and there being no orchestral parts at hand, assumed his place at the piano, and played this sparkling song in a style of brilliancy and neatness peculiar to himself. Encores were also awarded to Staudigl in Mozart's fine air; to Mr. T. Cooke's clever "glee and chorus;" to Miss Dolby, in Mr. Hay's ballad; to Madame Caradori in the charming air of Gluck; and to the duet from Semiramide by Madame Caradori and Madlle Alboni. An encore was also deserved, though not obtained, by Miss A. Williams and Mr. Lockey, in Spohr's duet. The national anthem was not encored; but John Parry's new song—one of excellent humour, by the way—was enthusiastically re-demanded; in response to which John Parry sang another. On the whole this concert was much inferior to the first and second. The only great piece attempted, Beethoven's symphony in B flat, was shorn of the two last movements, and what was given was in a style that may be called slovenly, with strict adherence to truth. Nevertheless, owing to the extraordinary sensation produced by Alboni on the previous night the Shire Hall was crammed to an overflow, and many were sent away disappointed in obtaining tickets. Alboni is the whole theme of Gloucester causerie; you cannot pass up and down the streets without hearing an earnest discussion of her merits in almost every corner, nor can you approach a house where there is a piano, without hearing some young lady endeavouring to emulate the fervour and intensity of her "Yah-e-oo!" in the Betty affair, which absolutely fills the atmosphere of the city with strange and unmusical noises, the awkward ebullitions of amateur screamers. I cannot much admire this tyrolien, and I quite agree with a musical friend who observed to me that a Parisian audience would hardly tolerate it even from Alboni. But like the Ethiopian business, it has acquired, in England, the whole favour and sympathy of the mob. This I cannot deny; but I would rather not hear such a magnificently endowed artiste as Alboni descend to such means of courting popularity.

Friday.—The Messiah was performed this morning in the Cathedral, in first-rate style. The principal singers were Madame Caradori, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Weiss, the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Williams, and Herr Staudigl, who all exerted themselves with commendable zeal, in rendering justice to the great masterpiece they were interpreting. The band and chorus were admirable, and on the whole I have rarely heard the Messiah more satisfactorily performed. It is unnecessary to say more about this undying work, which every musician and amateur knows by heart, or ought to know. The attendance was good, but not so crowded as on the Elijah day.

In the evening there was another ball at the Shire-Hall, which was not so well patronised (although by no means ill patronised) as was anticipated. I amused myself by looking at the dancers for an hour or two—and then for an hour or two more—and eventually got to bed at five in the morning, and rose in time to miss the train for London by which I had calculated on going. And so I took a solitary walk in the country instead, and was enchanted with my excursion—for Gloucestershire is really beautiful and romantic.

The pecuniary result of the Festival, in respect to the Charity which it is intended to assist, may be gathered from the following, which gives the result of the last three Festivals, and has appeared in the Gloucestershire Chronicle and Journal:—

First day,	170	16	2	163	18	4	180	12	4
Second day, ...	240	14	4	111	9	4	126	7	11
Third day, ...	125	10	0	79	19	0	155	6	2
Fourth day, ...	147	2	6	175	0	4	121	1	*4
	£684 3 0			530 7 0			533 7 9

By which it will be seen that the present year has considerably the advantage. Indeed, the Festival has altogether exceeded the warmest anticipations of the stewards, who are likely to issue, scot-free, from the ordeal of responsibility. This must be satisfactory to all, since it ensures the continued association of Gloucester with the other two choirs in future meetings. It would be a grievous thing were any untoward mischance to put an end to these really splendid meetings, which, while they assist an excellent charity, advance the cause of music. But the inhabitants of Gloucester must bestir themselves, and not leave the entire responsibilities on the shoulders of the stewards, who get nothing but honor for their pecuniary risk and their heavy labor. Instead of impeding the objects of the Festival, by raising the prices of everything, they should rather endeavour to promote them by offering increased facilities to visitors by accommodating them at a reasonable profit. They would thereby draw numbers to the town, during Festival week, who, as matters are now managed, keep away altogether, in fear of the exorbitant expense. Let them remember that, more than anybody they themselves would suffer by the annihilation of the Festival.

The Rev. Dr. Evans, one of the most zealous and active of the stewards, and Sir John Seymour, a liberal patron of the Festival, kept open house all the week for the artists and visitors from a distance, in a style of prodigal munificence.

The greatest kindness was shown to the members of the press by Mr. Brown, the excellent secretary of the stewards, who spared no pains in procuring them every information they required, and was unremitting in his courteous and gentlemanly attentions. The musical arrangements, on the whole, conferred much credit on Mr. Amott, under whose sole superintendence they were. Mr. Done was of good service in directing the concerts at the Shire-Hall; and Mr. Townshend Smith, as organist, acquitted himself with commendable zeal and talent. Nor must we omit to name with honor our excellent friend, Mr. T. Cooke, who filled the post of chef d'attaque with his usual ability and diligence.

On the whole I have spent a very agreeable week at Glocester, which I am not sorry to have visited, if only for the sake of the Cathedral, which is one of the finest in the world, and is a glory to the city of which it constitutes the almost solitary monument. For the present, adieu. You will probably hear from me again next week.—Yours as ever, D.

P.S.—If you want a list of the company that has attended the Festival, you will find it in The Times, from Lord Ellenborough down to Mr. Grantley Berkley, who was brilliantly conspicuous at the evening concerts, and wore his shirt collar nello stilo Byrono. He is a well-looking man, considering his letters and speeches.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUMÉ OF THE SEASON.

BUT little more remains to be said on this subject, to which we have already devoted more space and attention than our limits warrant. A few general remarks must close our present examination.

That the season has been one of almost unprecedented success there can be little doubt. It is even stated, with confidence, that Mr. Lumley has pocketed £22,000, clear of all expenses. We cannot believe it. The prosperity of the season is entirely attributable to Mdle. Lind, the loss previous to whose advent must have been severe, while the outlay that guaranteed her presence was doubtless very great. Add to this the enormous cost of the general company, operatic and choregraphic, and the probability of a large surplus at the end of the season appears in nubibus.

Comparing the prospectus that was issued previous to the commencement of the season with the record of what actually occurred, we find a long catalogue of sins by omission. The subject, however, is worn out; the unaccomplished pledges have been discussed ad nauseam by certain of the press, and all that invective has been able to draw from Mr. Lumley, in reply, is a sneer. But Mr. Lumley may fairly urge, in defence of the policy he has thought proper to pursue, "If my subscribers and the public be satisfied, who has a right to complain?" That the public was satisfied needs not to be insisted on; the crowds that flocked to Mdle. Lind's performances, up to the very last moment, sufficiently testifying it. Whether the subscribers were or were not satisfied is of slight consequence, since their numbers were but scanty. Complaints have been made, however, about the number of nights on which they were deprived of the advantage of hearing Mdle. Lind; but we have already said, and we rest firm in the conviction, that the subscribers heard her often enough for their money—oftener, indeed, than they had a right to expect. If there be any among their number who would rather hear one fine opera than one fine singer in several indifferent operas, these have a right to reproach Mr. Lumley for want of faith, in failing to accomplish the pledge contained in his prospectus, about The Tempest of Mendelssohn. If also, there be among their number any who prefer a variety of works, old and new, thoroughly well done in all respects, to a monotonous repetition of two or three stale operas, inefficiently represented, except in one or two particulars, these may also complain of the prospectus, which promised so much and performed so little. If, lastly, there be any among the number who prefer the classical works of the great masters to the threadbare trumpery of the modern Italians, who nourish themselves with the rinsings of Rossini's bottles, these also have a right to complain of the prospectus, which was as the mountain that groaned, and gave to the world—a mouse. But we hold the opinion that "a lion," quelconque, is what the "subscribers," properly so called, chiefly demand; give them a bravura air from Lind or Alboni, and Mozart and Rossini may be shelved, for aught they care, ad perpetuum.

But next season will be the ordeal; next season will test the strength of the two operas, and the judgment of the public; next season will try the Lind-mania; next season will draw the curtain, behind which strange things are in preparation; next season will show whether two Italian Operas can or cannot exist in London—and, if the latter, which of the twain shall survive, and which give up the ghost. For the present, then, we lay down our pen, and shall not take it up again, until an occasion presents for a renewal of our "Chats with Rumour."

IF now the sympathy which we feel for Otilia is, from the moment when her love for Edward fills her whole existence, accompanied by the painful surmise that a tragic fate is here preparing, this sensation is heightened by the increasing suffering of Otilia's soul—a suffering over which she has no control. But the fact that she is the very person selected to experience this fate, being placed in a conflict from which she cannot completely draw back—the consciousness of this fact changes any reproof which might emanate from a certain moral pride into the acknowledgment of a state which is elevated above imputation, and which unceasingly hastens towards its painful development. To use the poet's word's, "We observe with reverence a mind in which the seed of a great destiny has been sown, which must await the development of what it has received, and can accelerate neither the good nor the bad, neither the happiness nor the unhappiness, which can arise from it."

It belongs to the following section on the composition of the work to shew with what high art the poet has exhibited to us the state of Otilia's soul, especially by a contrast with the noisy proceedings of Luciane, and how by bringing Otilia into contact with elements so opposed to her, he has still heightened our painful sympathy. It is our present task, now we have brought to consciousness the fundamental traits of the character, to comprehend the tragical catastrophe of Otilia in unity with what has been developed.

Since Otilia's whole nature is absorbed in Edward, and this inclination, as we have seen, has penetrated her whole individuality, there was need of a fearful warning to bring her to reflection upon herself and the condition of her soul, and, as it were, to free her from herself. This warning from a high power she discerns in the death of the child, which immediately follows the passionate resignation to Edward, and which, as her return to Charlotte is delayed by this meeting, is caused by the hurry with which she endeavours to make up for lost time. Through this frightful event, which announces itself to her deep heart in the unveiling of a fearful crime, she trembles in all the depths of her life, and, as if guided by a higher inspiration, declares the renunciation of Edward to be a necessary expiation.

As with Otilia, everything has the character of immediateness,—of intuition; so does this act of perfect voluntary renunciation take place at a moment when every outward obstacle is removed, which yet opposed in any degree the highest wish of her life. As if sunk into a magnetic sleep, she hears in it the voice which, with unyielding strength, now demands the unconditional sacrifice of the heart. Even in the manner in which she hears this penetrating summons of her divine nature, the natural force maintains, as it were, its power, since every form of reflection, and generally a gradual growth of this result is completely banished, and her resolution comes forth as a lightning-flash suddenly illuminating her whole being.

As Ottilia in this act has completely elevated herself above herself, so has she also at the same time completely freed herself from herself. The moment in which the beautiful child of nature, who has hitherto merely followed her own wishes unconstrained, and whose whole organization only impelled her to the fulfilment of her own laws, raises herself with self-consciousness into the region of moral freedom, has severed her from her whole former condition, nay, from her whole essential nature, the mysterious connexion with the macrocosm has given way to an open compact with the moral Idea, the "elective affinity" of the heart has changed into a free union with the divine spirit.

This free elevation of Ottilia carries with it—according to her nature—a double result which we must bring forward. Ottilia from this moment appears illumined by a superterrestrial clearness, in which she knows that she has thoroughly atoned for her offence, and at the same time feels cut off from every return into her former state of mind. The grace, which she feels, she participates, keeps her upright in the most fearful moment of her life. Here in the meeting with Edward, when the natural force of feeling once more gathers together all its strength, and forms before her the fulness of the happiest hopes and remembrances; here she completely plucks the first fruit of moral elevation, and feels herself powerfully sustained by the divine grace which powerfully reigns within her. Here, therefore, the internal element is completely accomplished, and the divine clearness, which is diffused over her, and which manifests itself by nothing more powerfully than by the energetic effort which she herself exercises on the urgent natural force in Edward, has elevated her both above herself, and above the whole sphere of the temporal and the finite.

But this elevation above herself at the same time announces itself as an absolute separation from the whole compass of her existence, from all the fibres and sinews which attached her to the natural soil of her life, and gives us the certainty of her freedom. Since Ottilia was nothing out of the natural power which entirely filled her, so a perfect victory over this is, in Ottilia, a delivery of the mind from the pressure of matter. This feeling, too, streams through Ottilia. Both sides are interwoven to an indissoluble whole. Ottilia, illumined by the views of moral freedom and divine grace, can regard herself as a consecrated person, who, educated in a most singular course, invisibly guided by a superterrestrial power, becomes herself elevated above every earthly ill, and in the purest activity sees her only satisfaction in educating others in a gentle way, and leading them towards their destination. But that such a fearful destiny is fulfilled just in her—that she is selected to experience extraordinary suffering, and to bring her heart, nay, her whole existence as a sacrifice, because in her are kindled the irrecoverable powers of the moral Idea, and the natural force of feeling,—this for the moment makes her regard herself as "a singularly unfortunate being, who, even if she be innocent, is nevertheless marked in a fearful manner."

But in truth the notion of Ottilia that she is elevated out of the multitude by a fortune quite peculiar, and chosen as a vessel for a great soul-suffering, is merged in the thought that she has thus become the organ of an Idea, which extends beyond the individual, and has, as it were, the honor of exhibiting in her individual appearance a great moral law for all. This is the case with Ottilia in the highest sense of the word. The victory of the moral Idea over the natural force, which in her fate appears in the most striking manner, is, as it were announced as a victory of spirit over matter. As Ottilia frees herself from the bonds of the natural force, so, being purified in herself, she turns against matter, and by her unconquerable dislike to eating and drinking, expresses at the same time her aversion from all that is earthly and material,—a dislike which with her has become an immediate natural determinateness, a secret law of her being.* But in this aversion from the material is expressed at the same time the spiritualization of the whole being and its freedom from the body. Death only seals the absolute want of agreement between the unfree world of that feeling of natural law to which Ottilia's whole individuality has been subject, with that region of moral freedom which, as it is generally built upon the constrained natural man, comes, even in Ottilia's fall, to itself, and to a feeling of its highest energy, which is elevated above all natural determinateness, and which in the dissolution of Ottilia gives itself, as it were, the most striking and extensive confirmation.

That character of mystery, which is diffused over Ottilia's entire personality, once more comes forward at her death with all its weight, but fully in accordance with the individuality itself and its development. What else is exhibited in that miracle which Nancy, who has fallen down at the feet of Ottilia as if lifeless and apparently shattered, experiences by contact with Ottilia,—what else, we say, but the same victory of spirit over matter, which has presented itself to us in the renunciation and in the death?† In the cure of Nancy, by touching Ottilia, returns that secret power of natural determinateness, which swayed Ottilia's whole being, but in a higher form, since in it is immediately revealed to the senses, only the brightest energy of the soul over the body in its invisible mastery over matter. This mystery, indeed, like every other, is only for a sense which is thoroughly certain of the absolute power of the mind over earthly matter, and acknowledges its unconditioned effect, which passes over every limit of the understanding. Thus the miracle performed on Nancy also exercises its extraordinary influence over many as the place where the holy body is laid, became for them an object of pilgrimage, and "no one was old and weak that he did not feel himself refreshed and lightened on this spot."

Thus the image of Ottilia represents itself as a beautiful formed whole, which, while in its fundamental traits it announces itself as a mystery for the understanding, fulfils the mysterious laws of its organization, and in its tragic fall both atones for the crime of that resignation to the natural force of feeling, which is rooted in her individuality and also brings to view this eternal victory of moral freedom and the present energy of the mind above matter.

SONNET.

No. LIII.

I thought of love but as a strange sweet pain,
Which in my youth I was compell'd to know;
Feeling the stream of life too smoothly flow,
I long'd to undergo that pain again.
I bared my heart, with that desire insane,
And call'd on love to bring me joy or woe,
To waken feelings wither'd long ago;—
I call'd on love, and did not call in vain.
I knew not what I ask'd—he came, he came,
And in his train brought demons of despair,
Like an avenger hast'ning to destroy.
And in my heart he rais'd no gentle flame,
But a dark lightless fire he kindled there,—
And then the fiends laugh'd with unholy joy.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN VOICE.

THE atonics, from the deficiency which suggested that name, afford no basis for the function of the radical and vanish. Most of them have a perceptible vocule, which consists in a short aspiration like the whispering of e-rr. There is no musical quality in their sinking frame; here also a moral affection appears as that under which the body is completely crushed.—Dr. Rötscher's note.

† "Nancy appeared shattered in every limb. The girl was picked up, and by accident or through a special providence was rested upon the corpse,—nay, seemed with the last remains of life to wish to reach her beloved mistress. But scarcely had her dangling limbs touched Ottilia's dress, scarcely had her powerless fingers touched Ottilia's folded hands, than she sprang up, first raised her arms and hands to heaven, then fell down upon her knee before the coffin, and with devotional transport looked up to her mistress.—Cited by Dr. Rötscher.

* In this sense Göschel, in his "Discussions on Göthe's manner of poetizing and thinking," very sensibly asks: "Is Ottilia's death a suicide or the result of an irreconcilable misunderstanding between body and soul from which an insupportable disgust at everything material has been developed?" The death of Ottilia is with the greatest art, deprived of the character of an intentional deed designed with full reflection. It should also be observed that the reckless explanation by Mittler, of the sixth (seventh) commandment, consumes the last force in the sound. They do furnish Time or the power of prolongation to speech, but on a wretched material. Though inferior in most of their properties to the other elements, yet it shall be shown, in treating on the expression of speech, that the aspiration is both significant and emphatic. The enumeration made under the preceding divisions, includes all the elementary sounds of the English language, which, apart from questionable and unimportant points, have been noticed by observant authors. There are three of the subtonics, and three of the atonics—b, d, g, p, t, and k, that have eminently an explosive character; the breath bursting out after a complete occlusion. From their serving peculiar purposes in speech, they may be distinguished as a subdivision, and called abrupt elements. In the beginning of a syllable, they produce a sudden opening of the succeeding sound; and at the end they exhibit their final vocule. The foregoing arrangement of elementary sounds was devised to display their relationships to intonation. For a closer view of this subject, I shall describe particularly the structure and functions of the Tonics. This detail was separated from the general view, in order to avoid distracting the reader's attention from the drift of that classification, by the interesting development which has been deferred to this place. In illustrating the nature of the radical and vanishing movement, by the tonic a-le, it was stated that this element consists of two sorts of sound, and that when uttered with inexpressive effort, the voice rises through the interval of a tone; the radical beginning on a, and the vanish diminishing to a close e. Now, as all the tonic sounds necessarily pass through the radical and vanish, they demand an analysis relatively to that concrete function pitch. These seven of the tonic elements, a-we, a-rt, a-n, a-le, i-sle, o-ld, o-ur, have different sounds for the two extremes of their concrete movement. The remaining five, ee-l, oo-ze, e-rr, e-nd, i-n, have each one unaltered sound through their concrete movement. The tonics may, therefore, be properly divided into Diphthongs and Monothongs. A-we has for its radical the sound of a in a-we; and for its vanish a short and obscure sound of the monothong e-rr. A-rt has for its radical the sound of a in a-rt; its vanish, like that of the preceding, being the short and obscure sound of e-rr. The radical of a-n is the sound of a in a-n; its vanish is the same in degree and sort with the last. The sound of these elements has heretofore been considered as homogeneous throughout: for their vanish being very faint in ordinary utterance, it has escaped perception. But it may be heard by using these elements severally with earnest interrogation. They will each terminate at a high pitch in a feeble sound of e-rr. A-le, as said formerly, has its radical with the distinct sound of the monothong ee-l for its vanishing movement. I-sle has its radical followed in like manner by a vanish of the monothong ee-l. The diphthong nature of i has long been known, and the discovery of it is attributed to Wallis, the grammarian. It is described by Sheridan and others as consisting of a-we and ee-l; the coalescence of the two producing the peculiar sound of i.

In this account it is admitted that the element is peculiar: one can therefore see no need of reference to a-we in the theory of its causation. A skilful ear will readily perceive that the radical of i-sle is a peculiar tonic, and will so report thereon without having recourse to any supposition as to its changes from a previous sound. O-ld has its radical in the sound of o, formerly supposed to be homogeneous. Its vanish is the distinctly audible sound of the monothong oo-ze. O-ur has a radical followed in like manner by a vanish of the monothong oo-ze. That the first sound of this diphthongal tonic is not a-we, but a radical of its own, may easily be proved by a discriminating ear; and a trial with the voice will show that a-we does not unite with oo-ze by that easy gliding transition which is heard in the junction of the true radical of ou-r with the same oo-ze. I have been at a loss what to say of that sound which is signified by oi and oy in voice and boy. It may be looked upon as a diphthongal tonic, consisting of the radical a-we and of the vanishing monothong i-n when the quantity of the element is short, and of ee-l when long. But from the habit of the voice it is difficult to give a-we without adding its usual vanish of e-rr; and this makes the compound a triphthong. If it is taken as a diphthongal tonic, this is the only instance in which the same radical has two different vanishes. And though this reason should not be conclusive against its classification, it suggests an examination of the subject. In case this sound should be considered as a true diphthongal tonic, and analogies seem in favor of it, it would make the number of tonics thirteen, and the whole of the elements thirty-six.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

"You cannot forget;" ballad, sung by Miss Dolby; the words from L. E. L.'s popular novel, "Ethel Churchill"; the music composed by G. LINLEY.—CRAMER, BEALE, & Co.

A pleasing, plaintive melody Mr. Linley has found to set L. E. L.'s poetry. The composer has taken pains to avoid the general complaint made against ballads, viz. their being written too high. The highest note in the song before us is E flat, though an F may be used in the bar leading to the return of the subject, should the singer please. The accompaniment is simple and happy. We admire the song altogether.

"May Flowers;" duet, composed by BRINLEY RICHARDS.—CHAPPELL. We admire this duet much. The subject is tasteful, and neatly appropriated to the words, and the accompaniment handled like a musician. The voicing is excellent. We recommend this composition strongly as a drawing-room essay for two ladies. It will also prove a capital piece d'étude for practising duo singing.

"Friends and Home;" ballad, written by A. W. HAMMOND; composed by G. BARKER.—CHAPPELL.

THE merit of this ballad lies entirely in a certain popular expression, to speak mildly, which generally belongs to the compositions of the author. We cannot laud the song highly. It will surely find favorers among the multitude, who are devoted to such melting strains as "Mary Blane," and the like favorite compositions, but we cannot proclaim it the more on that account. In not eulogising the ballad, however, we would not deprive Mr. G. Barker of all the merit which rightly belongs to him.

"Fantasia" for the Piano-forte: on the most celebrated American airs, sung by the Ethiopian Serenaders, by E. STIRLING.—METZLER & Co.

A hearty, well-constructed, lively, and humorous morceau. The melodies introduced are "Ole Bull," "Old Dan Tucker," "Lucy Neal," "I'm going over de Mountain," and "A Life by the Galley Fire." We are quite sure this will prove a favorite piece, when it is once known, with all admirers of transatlantic tunes.

"Psalms and Hymns." Parts 1 and 2, by EDWARD F. RIMBAULT, LL.D., F.S.A.—CHAPPELL.

THIS is a work of much merit and great utility, and will be found of the greatest benefit to parish choirs, for which intention it has been especially produced. Part 1 contains a selection of Psalm and Hymn tunes, viz. thirty-four in Common Measure; eighteen in Long Measure; three in Short Measure; five in Peculiar Measure; and nine Hymn tunes. Part 2 comprises a selection of Chants, Sanctuses, Kyries, Services and Anthems, from the works of Tallis, R. and J. Farrant, Byrd, Child, Humphries, Flintoff, Boyce, Attwood, Crotch, Turle, Marbeck, Gibbons, Bryan, Rogers, Hayes, Arnold, King, Creighton, Richardson, Goss, and Beethoven. The work is printed in imperial octavo, and each part contains sixty-four pages of letter-press. The accompaniments are either for piano-forte or organ, and the editor appears to have paid every possible attention to the arrangement. For the editing of such a work the skill and experience of Dr. Rimbault renders him admirably adapted.

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.

MOST of our readers must be aware that the above society was instituted in 1843, for the production of a superior and standard edition of the works of Handel. Four volumes have been already delivered to the subscribers, viz.:—In the first year, The Four Coronation Anthems, "The King shall Rejoice," "Zadoc the Priest," "My heart is inditing," and "Let thy mind be strengthened," edited by Dr. Crotch; with L'Allegro, Il Penseroso ed il Moderato, edited by Moscheles;—in the second year Esther, edited by C. Lucas, with the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, edited by T. M. Mudie:—in the third year the Israel in Egypt, edited by Mendelssohn:—and in the fourth year, The Dettingen Te Deum, edited by Sir George Smart. The motives which directed the society were shown in the prospectus, issued after its formation, which set forth, "that the larger portion of the works of Handel having been written in this country, and the most important of them being set to our language, entitle them (the society) to claim them as national property; and the circumstance of their immortal composer having lived and died and left his manuscripts in England, seems to render it a sacred duty to transmit his texts, pure and unimpaired to the world and to posterity." With this true nobility of intention the Handel Society has spared neither time, pains, nor expense in producing the works of the composer in the completest form as regards the text, and in the utmost splendour as regards the printing, paper, &c. &c. The publication is entirely worthy the great name which originated it, and the age of improvement in which it has been produced. The subscription list already numbers upwards of seven hundred names, and is increasing with every year. We need hardly say that this magnificent work deserves a truly national support. The care and labour which have been expended in procuring the text in its original purity, the editing being entrusted to the first musical men in the country, and in one instance to the greatest living musician; the completeness and beauty of the work itself; and the mighty name of Handel must ensure for it, when its publication is made known, a universality of success surpassing that of any production of modern times. We call, therefore, upon all musicians to whom, perchance, the works of the Handel Society may as yet be unknown, to all amateurs and lovers of music, and to all who worship at the shrine of mighty intellect, to support the institution in, what we have entitled above, without any refinement, the nobility of intention.

The fifth issue of the Handel Society has been just sent us for review. It contains the Acis and Galatea edited by William Sterndale Bennett. To criticise this exquisite, most exquisite pastoral of the author is not required here. With its charms and its graces who is not conversant? It is a living, translucent fount of inspiration from beginning to end. It stands in the same regard to Handel's sublimer works, as Milton's Comus does to his Paradise Lost and Samson Agonistes. It is not the essay of genius towering in its loftiest flight on eagle wings, but the spontaneous effusion of less fiery moments, when intellect lay brooding with dove-wings in hours of serener contemplation. The Acis and Galatea is the most beautiful, as the Messiah is the grandest of Handel's compositions. To no fitter musician in existence could the present work have been submitted than Sterndale Bennett. This gentleman unites in himself every qualification requisite for such an undertaking. To the deepest and most devout reverence for the great author, Mr. Bennett adds in his own person, discrimination the most acute; an intuitive perception of the beauties of Handel, founded on his own consummate taste no less than his knowledge of the master; an untiring perseverance, necessary, when many copies are to be consulted and compared, and all closely examined; and a confidence in his own powers, without which judgment must waver, and research prove fruitless.

Mr. Bennett supplies in his preface a historical account of the Acis and Galatea, principally taken from Dr. Burney's "History of Music," which we extract in a compendious form for the gratification of our readers. "The Acis and Galatea, a Masque, written for his Grace the Duke of Chandos, was first performed at Cannons in 1721. There are no dates on the MS. to indicate the precise commencement and completion of the composition. There is considerable doubt as to the original shape of the work, some asserting that it was composed in the first instance to Italian words, and afterwards adapted to the English text of Gay and others; but I think that the fact of Handel having written an Italian opera on the same subject, entitled Galatea, Acis e Polifemo, and to be found in Her Majesty's Library, has led to this confusion; and from the general appearance of the manuscript, I am of opinion that it was originally written to English words, as it now stands, although some of the pieces have doubtless been introduced since its first performance at Cannons. Amongst such pieces I may include the chorus, "Happy, happy we," at the end of the first act, which is not found in the MS., and which, unlike every piece in the work, includes a viola in the orchestral parts. The only reference to this chorus is to be found on the last page of the preceding duet, where Handel has written, "Il Coro, la seconda volta." The chorus in the Appendix, now, I believe, printed for the first time, must also have been written for some special occasion, and probably sung at the close of the performance. The chorus includes more characters than are previously introduced in any portion of the work; the orchestral parts are more numerous, and the principal solo singers are made to assist in the performance."

Mr. Bennett supplies other matter in the preface equally interesting, to which we beg to refer our readers. It will be seen that the editor had no small difficulty to contend with in the revision of the Acis and Galatea. Manuscripts of several pieces could not be found, and in the principal manuscript from which the text is taken the last page is wanting. Nor has Mr. Bennett entered on his undertaking without some responsibility devolving to him. "The usual performance of this work," he says, "must have been with a small chorus, and a small orchestra, and the Cembalo, or Harpsichord, which latter instrument had several important services to perform. The very meagre accompaniment in many places in the score was doubtless balanced by Handel himself, or some competent person, presiding at the Cembalo and filling up the harmony." He adds, "the Pianoforte arrangement which I have made is, of course, to be chiefly considered as an adaptation of the instrumental parts; but in many places, where I consider Handel entirely relied on the 'Cembalo' for accompaniment, I have filled up the harmony at my own discretion." This was unavoidable; but Mr. Bennett very properly has these parts engraved in smaller notes than those ordinarily used for the pianoforte, which can be either adopted or omitted at the option of the conductor.

We are also supplied by the editor in the preface with the following piece of interesting information. "It is, perhaps, not generally known that Mozart has put additional accompaniments to this work: a copy of his score (I believe his autograph) is in the King's Library at Berlin; another copy is at Vienna; and a third in the possession of Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy."

We cannot close our notice without a strong word of eulogy in favour of the publishers, Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., for the splendid form in which the series of works has appeared. It is truly in every respect one of the most magnificent publications of this, or any other age.

MADAME BISHOP IN AMERICA.

THE American journals transmitted to us for several months past are filled with the most lavish eulogies on Madame Bishop, who is almost unanimously asserted to be the greatest English singer ever wafted westward across the Atlantic. Her success has been really immense ever since she made her American debut, which took place at the Park Theatre, New York, on the 4th of August. Following the English absurdities in the case of Jenny Lind, the Yankees have Madame Bishop's likeness on handkerchiefs, cigar-cases, tobacco-boxes, clay pipes, &c., &c., and one of the omnibuses in the city is called ANNA BISHOP. All the press are strenuous supporters of the artiste, with the exception of the writers in the Courier and Enquirer, the self-same critics who so strenuously attempted to run down Ole Bull, Herz, and Sivori. We shall take an extract from one or two of the most moderate of the newspapers, which will give the reader a fair estimate of Madame Bishop's popularity in America:—

"(From the New York Age, August 8.)—The great musical event of the week came off here on Wednesday evening, on which occasion Mde. Anna Bishop, in whose praise the press of this city has been busy for some time past, made her debut as Linda in Donizetti's opera of Linda of Chamouni, and had every reason to be perfectly satisfied with the reception she met with. Mrs. Bishop is rather above the medium height, and has a purely English face and figure. Her hair is black, her eyes (we believe,) dark blue, her complexion beautifully clear and fresh, her mouth large, and her bust well moulded. The likenesses we have seen of her give no idea whatever of the original. She is more youthful than Mrs. Wood or Miss Stephens were in their zenith, and her face strongly reminded us of those ladies, more especially while singing. So lavish and hyperbolic had been the praises of those who had heard Mde. Bishop sing, that we confess we entered the theatre with a fear that our expectations were raised by these laudations to so high a pitch, that although her talent might be great, we should be disappointed; but she surpassed even our most sanguine imaginings—and as a finished vocalist of the best and most modern school, she stands pre-eminently above any English prima donna we have ever listened to; and with the exception of such transcendently talented artists as Pasta, Malibran, and Grisi, (we have never heard Jenny Lind,) we know of no rival she need fear among the continental singers of Europe. Let it be perfectly understood, however, that we are now speaking of her talent, her skill, her wonderful execution, and the surprising controul she possesses over her voice—we speak of these, not of the voice itself; for, despite the raptures of some, and the elaborate arguments of others to prove her voice splendid, and that the sforzato or veiled quality, as they style it, adds to its beauty, we do not hesitate to differ with them on this point, and declare this very mistiness a defect; that the sforzato in this instance arises from nothing less than a want of body or tone in the middle notes of the voice, while the moment she runs into the upper part of the scale, every tone and semi-tone is as brilliantly clear, ringing and metallic as if struck from a silver bell—there is no sforzato there—but a delicious, natural, healthy, musical voice which tells upon the ear electrically, whereas in the lower passages, while you listen enraptured to the wondrous trills and runs and daring efforts of vocalism which are made without an apparent effort, and achieved with a certainty and precision almost miraculous, you feel as if the voice came to you through some intervening medium, as if the singer were separated from you by a vapour, a gauze, or thin glass—and you wish the medium were away, that you might hear the voice more clearly. In a word, we believe that if Mde. Bishop possessed such an organ as nature bestowed on Mrs. Wood, she would have been entitled with full justice to the rank of the greatest English singer yet known, but as much as she excels Mrs. Wood in style and execution, just so much does she fall short of that artist in body of tone. Her opening scena in the first act was sufficient at once and alone to satisfy the most sceptical of her great abilities—this was still strengthened by her singing in the duet with Sirval and again in the ballad with which the second act commences, which, great as it was, did not excel her splendid singing in the finale to that act. This was beyond comparison, better than anything sung by the Italian prima donna while here, but for extraordinary execution and brilliantly elaborate embellishment, the grand finale was her chef d'œuvre, and was an effort that could not fail to call forth the most enthusiastic applause from the most critical audience in the world. As an actress Mde. Bishop is much better than the majority of the syrens, and in one or two instances displayed considerable dramatic skill. Her costumes were appropriate and excellent, especially that worn in the second act, which was as correctly designed and artistically complete as it was magnificent. Mde. Bishop was called for, two or three times and received several bouquets, and applause enough to satisfy even the greatest gourmands in that article.

"(From the Sun, New York, August 6.)—PARK THEATRE.—Madame

Anna Bishop, the prima donna of the San Carlo Theatre at Naples, made her first appearance at this house on Wednesday evening, and her reception was the most brilliant and enthusiastic we ever witnessed. In Linda of Chamouni, she had created a great sensation in Europe, and the beautiful music of Donizetti, seemed as it were a new creation in her hands. There is an exquisite finish in the vocalization of Madame Bishop—the qualities of her voice are admirable, and the development artistically perfect. There is but little apparent effort, and the effect is surprising. Her singing is the perfection of the art, full of warmth and glowing in pulses and fraught with earnest and graceful action. No wonder she sang the part of Linda fifty nights at the San Carlo Theatre, and charmed with her beautiful delineation of the Swiss girl, the most impassioned and critical audience in the land of the song. Nor has Naples been the only field of her triumph in that role. Its deep interest, the simplicity of the story, the touching melodies so exquisitely sung and with so much feeling, have given it in her hands an indescribable charm everywhere. It is destined to elicit her the greatest enthusiasm in its frequent repetition, as it has already done on two successive nights. We have not space for an elaborate notice, suffice it to say, never was success more brilliant and decided; never were tones listened to with more thrilling interest and admiration. Never did the achievements of science and nature combined, exceed those she has produced. Her voice is a rich soprano of extended compass, of highly finished and brilliant execution, with great flexibility, and at times throwing out tones of the most exquisite sensibility and delicacy. We repeat, Linda, in the hands of this great artiste, is one of the most brilliant triumphs our stage has ever seen."

"(From the American Literary Gazette, Aug. 12.)—PARK THEATRE.—Madame Bishop has achieved at this house the most brilliant triumph. In Linda, the beautiful opera of Donizetti, she has given a most signal display of her powers, and produced alternately the most pleasing and startling effects. While she has charmed the ear and thrown a spell on the senses, she has disarmed alike prejudices and criticism. She stands alone on the pedestal of scientific excellence. Our stage may have witnessed equal power, and more impulsive action, but never the same musical perfection. Nothing can be more exquisitely sung than the fine ballad, 'On the banks of Guadalquivir,' from the opera of Lorella; it is a fine flowing melody, beautifully adapted to her silver tones; the style throughout the most impressive and graceful; the shakes she introduces in this air, on three successive semi-tones, were the most perfect and delicious we have ever heard—a wonderful effort of articulation which could not be surpassed by the human voice. For two past nights one of the leading features of the evening has been the celebrated recitative from Rossini's Tancredi, 'O Patria,' and the splendid aria, 'Di tanti palpiti.' Nothing can exceed the brilliant execution and chaste expression she gives to this scene, so admirably adapted to her style, and so fraught with all the charms of song. It was enthusiastically received, and the whole house rising unanimously called for an encore. But of all her triumphs here that in the scene from the Love's Spell was the most dazzling. It was written for her at Naples expressly by Donizetti, and suited to her varied and peculiar style. Here the rich tones of her pure, flexible, and melodious voice, were admirably displayed; her power of execution, sustained with so little apparent effort—her graceful embellishments in such exquisite taste, and never obscuring by their redundancy the passages they adorn; the unerring certainty with which she seizes the most distant intervals and bursts on you with surprises sudden and resistless—in short, never were these more displayed, nor received with greater enthusiasm—never was the wreath of song more gracefully worn, more bright and full of sweets than her's. Her style is the perfection of art, and her tones breathe the most bewitching melody."

The above extracts we have selected because they appeared to us more reasonable, more argumentative, and by consequence, the nearer allied to truth than many others, which from their very extravagant praise and intumescence of phraseology, were calculated to convey anything but conviction to the mind. With most of the strictures of the writers, whom we cite, we are inclined to agree, and cannot think but that the encomiums bestowed are merited on one side, and conferred without prejudice on the other. When praise is given, even though it verge on the hyperbolic, and is counteracted by the expression of faults detected and blemishes pointed out, it is not irrational to conclude that the writer is swayed by judgment alone, and that he shifts, examines, and discriminates only to arrive at the truth. The bribed or prejudiced critic cannot conceal the natural bias of his mind.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

SURREY THEATRE.—On Monday Mr. Bunn commenced his operatic and dramatic campaign at this theatre with Balfe's chef d'œuvre, The Bohemian Girl. The company, orchestra, and chorus were nearly the same as those which performed last season at Drury-Lane. We have already given a list of the principal artistes engaged. The doors of the theatre were besieged for hours before they opened, and five minutes after the visitors were admitted there was not standing room to be obtained inside. There was much disturbance during the earlier portion of the opera, and, until it was announced to the audience that those who felt incommoded might retire and have their money returned, and until the theatre was partially thinned by those who availed themselves of the privilege, there was scarcely a single note of the music heard. The cast of The Bohemian Girl at the Surrey, differed in one respect materially from that of Drury-Lane: Miss Romer taking the part of Arline, a character which had previously been undertaken by Miss Rainforth, and in which that fair artiste won a most fair repute. It may be readily conceived that Miss Romer's version differed in toto from that of Miss Rainforth; that it gained in energy and power, but lost in elegance and delicacy; that although it might be more striking and telling with the audience, it was scarcely so natural or truthfully appealing. Miss Romer's acting and singing, nevertheless, produced a powerful sensation on the Surrey visitors, that lady having obtained an uproarious encore in all her solos. Mr. Harrison was received with immense cheers, and won, as a matter of course, an enthusiastic encore in the popular ballad, "When other lips," which he gave in his usual effective manner. Mr. H. Horncastle's Devilshoof was, dramatically, better than Stretton's, but, vocally, inferior. This gentleman's voice lacks weight in such parts. Miss Rebecca Isaacs made an excellent Queen of the Gypsies, and was received with great favor. Borroni was heard to advantage in Arnheim. The chorus was striking and effective, and the orchestra, though somewhat less in number than that of Drury-Lane, under the able direction of Mr. J. H. Tully, left little to be desired. The scenery and appurtenances exhibited the same regard to splendor and completeness that has always distinguished Mr. Bunn's management. Some of the scenery was extremely beautiful, and elicited great and lasting applause. After the opera Mr. Bunn was called for, and after some time made his appearance amid hearty and continued cheers from all parts of the house. From the place we occupied, and the frequent interruption to the speakers, added to the prevailing hubbub, every body calling "silence" as loud as he could, we could not catch three words of the speech; nor do we think the words reached the ears of any persons in the house who were further removed from the stage than the proscenium boxes, or the first row in the pit. The speech, notwithstanding, was vociferously cheered, and Mr. Bunn's unheard appeal was as well received as though every syllable had been audible. The entertainments concluded with Mr. Bunn's popular and amusing farce, My Neighbour's Wife, in which Messrs. F. Vining, Oxberry, and Attwood, and the Mesdames H. Hughes, R. Hughes, and Miss Rebecca Isaacs performed. Between the opera and afterpiece a Pas de Deux, by Les Sœurs St. Louin, and a Pas de Caractere, by Miss Annie Payne, were introduced.

Mr. Bunn has commenced his campaign with spirit, and under the most favorable omens. He has brought a company, a chorus and orchestra together, that certainly were never heard previously within the Surrey theatre; and he has had a success on his first nights unparalleled in the annals of that establishment. We are bound to aid Mr. Bunn in his endeavours to disseminate the works of our best English writers on the other side of the water, where, it is acknowledged, the taste of the people is as different from that of the Middlesex side as though they were removed hundreds of leagues from the capital. Mr. Bunn has therefore a new world to exhibit his energies in, and a new audience to indoctrinate. We are bound, we repeat, to aid the manager in his new musical mission. The theatre has undergone some repairs, alterations, and re-decorations, and is in course of undergoing more. Among the principal improvements, a distinct entrance to the private boxes will be recognised as that which was most desirable. The Bohemian Girl has been played every night during the week, and continues to be as great a source of attraction as on the opening night. A new domestic drama is announced for Monday next.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The public interest in the experiment for restoring the plays of Shakspeare to the stage, in their original form, was manifested in an extraordinary degree on Monday evening, on the revival of Macbeth at this theatre, the house being literally crammed in every nook and corner before the curtain rose. Whatever may, in many cases, be urged against the practice of having altered versions of Shakspeare for the stage, as, for example, in the case of changing the catastrophe of King Lear, a gross profanation of the poet's genius, the desirableness of a close adherence, on all occasions, to the original text, may be reasonably doubted. The alterations on Monday evening were not very important, the chief one being the introduction of the short scene of the murder of Lady Macduff and her child. The zeal and ability shown in getting up the piece are deserving of all praise. From the most important down to the most minute of the scenic arrangements, the same care and attention were visible which have ever characterised this theatre. The vanishing of the witches is admirably done by means of gauzes brought in quick succession before the objects. This contrivance, with the stage darkened, gives as accurate a picture of the "vanishing into air" of the weird sisters as it is perhaps possible to produce. The grouping also, throughout the piece, is especially worthy of notice. Thus, in the gathering of the retainers of the castle immediately after the murder of the King, they appear first singly, then in twos and threes, and finally in groups, the whole exhibiting the taste and confusion of a midnight summons to arms. The banquet scene was very splendid, but it would have been better had the usual method been followed of bringing Macbeth's chair to the front instead of putting it between the tables, which were placed across the stage. In consequence of this arrangement, Mr. Phelps was compelled to deliver his first speech to the Ghost with his back to the audience, while in his second address to his unearthly visitor, which he spoke from behind the table in the midst of his guests, he was so far back, that the effect was again materially injured. Mr. Phelps's Macbeth is well known for its spirit and energy. The Lady Macbeth of Miss Addison was an uneven performance, at times exhibiting great force and truth, and occasionally sinking to the level of mere mediocrity. All her scenes were of this mixed character. The Macduff of Henry Marston was excellent throughout. The very trying scene, in which he hears of the murder of his wife and children, elicited a well-merited tribute of applause. Macbeth, in his encounter with Macduff in the last scene, is, according to the original version, killed off the stage, and his head brought in on a pole, which latter incident should have been omitted. On the appearance of the head it evidently required all the reverence of the audience for Shakspeare, to restrain an open demonstration of disapproval. At the end of the play, Mr. Phelps was called forward amidst a hurricane of applause; after which Mr. Marston and Miss Addison stepped forward to receive their share of applause.

MUSIC AT MARGATE.

MARGATE.—Our correspondent, Harmonicus, informs us that Mr. Gardner, director to the promenade concerts, at the Royal Hotel, took his benefit on Friday evening, which, we are glad to hear, was very numerous attended, by a highly respectable company. The vocalists were Miss Felton, Miss Chambers, and Mr. J. L. Hatton, who sang several compositions with great success. Mr. Hatton performed a prelude and fugue of Handel's on the pianoforte, excellently; and he also took part with Messrs. Bradley and Gardner (violin and violoncello) in a trio by Beethoven. A solo on the violoncello was performed with great taste by Mr. Gardner, and loudly applauded. The performances concluded with a selection of popular quadrilles, waltzes, polkas, &c., played with great spirit by the band. The rooms will be closed this evening (Saturday, Oct. 2nd), after being open for two months. Mr. Gardner is entitled to great credit for the highly respectable manner in which the concerts have been conducted. Harmonicus says, that the renowned Phillpott, begins to make a long face, when he cries, for most of the summer birds have taken wing. Still the muses do not desert their devotee; he called on his old friend the other day, to show him his parting address; which, after much coaxing, he permitted our correspondent to copy, for the amusement of "The World,"—here it is—

A month ago,
As I well know,
In scarce a vinder could you see
"Lodgings to let,"
But now I'll bet,
'That you will meet
In ev'ry street
Vith nothing else, but L. E. T.
The season's o'er,
So, now no more,
From your humble servant—T. P.

A few seasons ago, the erudite Dolly Dubbins, with her pa and ma, paid Margate a visit, and on leaving, she sent a classical poem (?) to a local paper, entitled "Farewell to Margate," concluding with the following expressive and elegant lines—

"Farewell to the Steamers, the Pier, and the Jetty,
Where folk (as the Scotch say) so often got wettie,
Farewell to the bathing, the walks, and the rides,
Farewell to the donkeys, and all friends besides."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

MILAN.—(From our own Correspondent).—My dear — Dieu merci, we are once again quiet, and one can reach one's house without the chance of being maimed by a set of ruffianly militaires. You will be surprised at my remaining here so long, and I fear that I shall get no World this week, so must make up my mind to wait for English musical gossip until I get to Venice. To-night we have Linda di Chamounix for the re-appearance of the Hayes. You shall have some account of it in a postscript to-morrow morning before post time. Jullien went from this to Bergamo to engage her for Drury-Lane, such was the furor she had occasioned here, but the fastidious director thought she was not sufficiently perfect for his troupe, which all the world are raving about. They could not come to terms. A report was raised here that Alboni was engaged by Lumley to appear with Lind; I at once contradicted it, and offered to back my assertion by a bet. By the bye, after dinner at the café yesterday, I saw a little knot of idlers very much amused at something in a newspaper, and on my approach they showed me an article in Galigiani, copied from a Manchester paper, stating that "Jenny Lind manifested great emotion while regarding the casts of Weber and Malibran." I was jokingly reproached for belonging to a country where such absurd means were taken to procure notoriety for an artiste. You can have no idea of the ridicule to which this talented lady is subjected by the hyperbolic articles which are put into circulation to render her notorious. The charming Fanny Elssler is engaged here for the Carnival, with Perrot; she has 35,000 francs. Miss Noble, the daughter of the dancer, many years at Drury-Lane, has had great success in some of the Italian theatres. She was offered a lucrative engagement at Lisbon but she feared disturbances in that country, so will, in all probability, accept an engagement which has been offered her at the Teatro Re, for the Carnival. La Parepa is gone to Sienna, where she has created a great furor in Beatrice di Tenda. I saw Favanti and her sister at the Scala on Thursday; she is engaged to sing at Varese, to strengthen the troupe, which is now at Verona. Miss Bingley, an English lady of great talent, is gone to Parma as prima donna; she has to find all her own costumes!! The gossips say that Covent Garden is to have several additions to its already efficient troupe next season; but it appears the director is difficult to deal with, and will listen to none but those of undoubted reputation and talent. The fortunate director, Mr. Lumley, was rather more easy last season, for he engaged people who had never sang out of a village in Italy. The agents here (there are only two of any repute) find Mr. Beale a very difficult person to deal with.

P.S.—The Linda went very well, and the reception of the Hayes was tremendous; but, alas! the end of the first act showed that the size of the Scala had sadly deteriorated from the quality of her voice since last season, and I am inclined to think Jullien was right in not engaging her. The Milanese will not tolerate a defective note, however great a favorite the artiste may have been the year before. This was clearly proved last night, for painful indeed was it to hear how gradually the applause lessened towards the end of the opera. Gruitz, who sings in Don Sebastiano, is decidedly better; she has more compass and strength of voice. I enclose the caste, so you can make what use you like of it. It was as follows:

Il Marchese di Boisfleury	Soares Cesare.
Il Visconte di Sirval	Musich Rugenio.
Il Prefetto	Derivis Prospero.
Antonio, alfittajolo, padre di Linda	Corsi G. B.
Pierotto, giovine orfano savojardo	Poppi Amalia.
L' Intendente del feudo	Marconi Napol.
Maddalena, madre di	Ruggeri Teresa.
Linda	Hayes Catarina.

N.B.—Learti and his wife (late Miss Hobbs, who sang at Varese last year), are engaged by Jullien for concert singing; they are both first rate.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "The Musical World."

SIR,—Perhaps an account of Jenny Lind's visit to Norwich may not be unacceptable to you. She was expected on Saturday, the 18th ult.; but owing to the postponement of the Edinburgh concerts, from her illness, she was not able to reach here till the 21st; she was expected by the four o'clock train, when a very large concourse of persons came to meet her. She did not arrive till eight; when she immediately proceeded to the palace of the Bishop, having been invited by his lordship to take up her stay there during her engagement. She sang at these concerts on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and Saturday morning; the concert on the latter, being the result of the success of the former two. These entertainments took place in St. Andrew's Hall, which was handsomely fitted up as at the festival; with the exception that the orchestra occupied the site of the patron's gallery. This orchestra was well filled on the two evenings, and crowded on Saturday morning; and it is impossible to describe the enthusiasm with which Jenny Lind was received. Her singing excited the most intense feeling of wonder and admiration; the close of every song was marked with repeated rounds of applause, and there were several encores each night. Her voice has some qualities, which no other singer, as far as I am aware, possesses. Her echoing the notes of the Swedish melodies, is one of the most beautiful things I have heard, and the way in which she executes the different passages in the opening scene from La Figlia, and those in Con Pazzienza, is astonishing. Then her style is so pure; her intonation so perfect; her feeling so intense; there is so much sweetness in her voice, and her shake is so exquisite, that I can scarcely imagine any singing more perfect. Here she has created a perfect furore, the people are all Jenny Lind mad; and her noble generosity in giving up to the managers of the concerts (Mr. C. F. Hall, leader at the Surrey Theatre, a young man of talent, and Mr. G. Smith, late manager of our theatre), £200, because she thought, the prices of admission being reduced at the suggestion of one of the patrons, that the profits of the managers were not so large as they ought to have been, and also presenting £200 to our charities, has won for her most deservedly, "golden opinions." She consented to pay £50 towards the expenses of the extra printing, advertising, &c., rendered necessary by the postponement of the concerts: this, however, Mr. Hall positively refused, much to his honor, to accept. Much has been written of Jenny Lind, but not too much. I was delighted with her in London; but almost feared she would not be so attractive in a concert-room. I am agreeably disappointed. She enchanted every one—or nearly so, for there will always be some discontented mortals. Gardoni, and Madame and Signor F. Lablache accompanied Madlle. Lind. They all sang very charmingly. The latter was extremely happy in "John Anderson, my Joe," and in Balfe's beautiful ballad of "Chide not." The band was selected in London by Mr. C. F. Hall, and included W. Thomas, violin; W. L. Phillips and W. Reed, violoncelli; Percival, double bass; Willoughby, bassoon; King, flute; Handley, cornet-a-piston; Horton, oboe; W. Rochester, trombone; Kleibach, horn; Wright, ophicleide; Maycock, clarinet, &c., &c., &c. These artists, Mr. Balfe conducting, and Mr. C. F. Hall leading, played admirably. The overtures went well, and the accompaniments to the songs, &c. were, as they ought to be, made subservient, as helps and sustainers to the voice; and not controlling that organ by an overpowering noise. This band played at several promenade concerts, (Mr. C. F. Hall, conductor, Mr. W. Thomas, leader), and rivalled the excellence of Jullien's celebrated troupe. If you think the above worthy inserting, I shall be happy to see it in the columns of The Musical World.

I am, dear sir, yours truly,
MUSICUS.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

SIR,—Being a constant reader of your periodical will I hope be some excuse for my now troubling you. A gentleman, who is a great advocate for congregational singing, (which is a very desirable thing) gave me a letter to read, which is published in the church newspaper, "Toronto." The following I have copied, and I hope one of your many correspondents will be able to give some explanation. It says, "Whence comes it, that even in our largest churches, where there are both choirs and organs, the voice of congregational melody is hushed, and no one seems to think he has any part to perform in singing the praises of God?" The solution of this enigma will, I am confident, be found, not so much in any natural want of devotional feeling, as in the fact that our church choirs sing the melody of their tunes in the triple instead of the tenor; and in place of singing in unison, as was formerly the practice in the ancient song of the churches, make it a point as much as possible to sing in harmony. This, I am convinced, is the chief cause of the present indecent silence of our congregations, whilst the praises of God are being sung. The melody of the tune, whether it be chant or metrical psalm, is led off by the choir in the triple; it is expected the congregation will follow, but how is it possible? not one man in a hundred can sing a tune in the triple; and the consequence is, that the majority of every congregation are dumb—not willingly, but of necessity. I am no opponent of singing in harmony, quite the reverse, I readily admit that harmony is the perfection of music; but I contend that it is impracticable in congregational singing, and that unison singing in the tenor is the true and proper ecclesiastical mode of singing, and the only mode in which a body of musically uneducated worshippers can be expected to join heartily, and with joy, in singing the praises of God.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

SIR,—Hoping that this may reach you before the next Musical World goes to press, I take the liberty of requesting you not to pass over without notice the shabby way in which the audience were treated at the Gloucester Festival, by the curtailment of Beethoven's magnificent symphony in B flat, on the Thursday evening concert: At the end of the slow movement there was a most ominous pause, and great was our astonishment that no more of it was to be performed, (as we were told afterwards) by order of the Stewards, who actually considered it too long. Hoping you will excuse this liberty, I have the honor to be,

Sir, your obedient servant,

Bristol, September 30th, 1847.

THE CLOSING OF COVENT GARDEN.

A Lay à la mode de Marmion.

(From the "Man in the Moon.")

Through Covent Garden's brilliant halls,
The crowds from boxes and from stalls,
Are hurrying o'er the polished floors,
And pressing to the outward doors;
In cabs and broughams borne along,
The parting guests the highways throng,
And murmuring still some well-known air,
In broughams couched, the happy fair,
Speed homewards to their rest;
And issuing from the portals wide,
With joyous sounds, the living tide
Rolls gaily to the west.
But, backward many a glance is cast,
The Opera season's o'er at last.

The war, which since the spring has raged,
By rival Opera's fiercely waged,
Now draws towards its close.
Retiring into private life,
And gathering strength for future strife—
The managers repose.
A gallant fight they both have fought,
With many varying chances fraught;
But had not Lumley Jenny caught,
His fate had long been sealed,
For Grisi still as Queen would reign,
And Persiani fought amain,
And brave Alboni not in vain,
Swore she to none would yield;
But both sides now from strife forbear,
And calmly for the Spring prepare.

Let Grisi then with Mario come,
Let Persiani not be dumb,
Nor young Corbani mute—
Let Tamburini's voice ring out,
Marini with his deep-toned shout,
With him the palm dispute.
And thou, our latest, dearest prize!
Alboni, let thy notes arise
In varied tones of joy or woe,
Now echoing loud, now whispering low—
As softly breathing wind.
Ronconi, too, shall lend his aid,
And spite of all the efforts made,
Costa shall yet his bâton wield,
And Beale's fine Theatre keep the field
'Gainst Lumley and 'gainst Lind.

PROVINCIAL.

CHELTEMHAM.—The Annual Concert for the benefit of Mr. Julian Adams, the eminent pianist, took place on Saturday evening last, in the Pump Room. A considerable degree of interest was excited, not only from the high esteem in which Mr. Adams is held as a musician and conductor of the concerts held in this place of fashionable amusement, but also from the announcement that the Collins' family would take part in the performance. Although the room was not full, yet the attendance was very good and highly respectable, many of the distinguished families at present sojourning in Harrogate being present. The programme was well chosen, containing selections from some of the first masters. The Programme was well chosen, containing select ones from some of the first masters. The concerted pieces were performed with the utmost skill and precision; and the execution of the solos reflected much credit upon those who took part in them. The auditory frequently testified their approbation of the performers by bursts of applause. The song, "Then you'll remember me," given by Miss E. Collins, with cornet obligato, by H. Kohler, was encored; and we much admired a fantasia on the piano, by J. Adams, and a solo on the flute, by S. Saynor. The manner in which the violin was played by Miss Rossini Collins, and the violoncello, by Miss Victoria Collins, drew forth unequivocal expressions of admiration. The concert did not conclude till ten o'clock, and the audience separated much gratified with the entertainment.—Harrogate Paper.

WORCESTER.—The second concert of the Worcester Harmonic Society for the season took place at the Guildhall on Monday evening. Handel's Athalie was given almost entire: and as the oratorio was a novelty to the people in Worcester, (never having, we believe, been before given here,) it attracted a full and highly respectable company, the whole of the seats in the assembly-room being occupied at eight o'clock. The band was led by Mr. J. H. D'Egville, and Mr. Done was the conductor. Taken as a whole, the performance was excellent. Mr. T. Williams, brother of the talented ladies of that name, who have on more than one occasion delighted a Worcester audience, and pupil to Mr. T. Cooke, took the principal tenor parts. Mr. Whitehouse was encored in the air, "Ah, canst thou but prove me." The part of Joad, the high priest, was sustained by Mr. J. Jones, who also presided at the pianoforte. Of the band we can speak in terms of high praise. The choruses were, with perhaps one or two exceptions, sung with precision and effect. Handel's oratorio of Jephtha will form the subject of the next concert of this society.—Berrow's Worcester Journal.

BRISTOL.—(From a Correspondent.)—The fact that Jenny Lind's appearances at Bath and Bristol would be her last in England added no small impetus to the excitement which her engagements originated. The prices of admission were increased at both places, nearly seven-fold, yet the theatres of Bath and Bristol were crowded on the evening of the two evenings almost to suffocation. At the concert on Monday evening at the Bristol theatre an apology was made for Madame Solari, and Madame F. Lablache on the score of illness. But nothing was considered, or cared about save the "Swedish Nightingale," and so she could sing, the audience cared not one rush if the orchestra, accompanist, and pianoforte were labouring under indisposition. The reception of Jenny Lind was of course tremendous, and her singing excited various sentiments among the listeners, the majority being certainly among her admirers. I, for one, felt quite charmed, and though I would not rank her with such vocalists as Grisi, or Alboni, I must say she is a very superior artiste. The quality of her voice is I think over-rated. There is an unpleasant guttural sound in her singing, which I have never heard in the Italians. I take it her art is her all in all. Her execution is sometimes surprising, and pleases me as quite as well as Persiani's, though it may not have her astonishing flights of fancy, or self-dependencies which seem to make Persiani's singing so spontaneous. I was disappointed, I must confess, with Jenny Lind's "Casta Diva." Comparisons naturally suggested themselves, and I could not help feeling that the "Swedish Nightingale" had not power to usurp the throne of "La Diva." In the buffo duet from the Il Fanatico per La Musica, with F. Lablache, she was much happier, her singing being characterised by great beauty and expression. In the final aria from Sonambula, she was also excellent, and vocalised with great precision. The throatiness of her voice, just mentioned, injured, occasionally, the effect of this very brilliant display. The air was heard amid a tumult of acclamations. In the "Quando lascia la Normandia," from Ritorno il Diavolo, and in a canzonet of Haydn's, with German words, she sang with great purity and taste. Her greatest impression of the evening was the Swedish melodies. In these and like national airs which require purity of tone, and facility of execution, I do not think she can be surpassed, now that Madame Stockhausen is gone; and Jenny Lind certainly surpasses that delightful vocalist in warmth and energy, for Stockhausen was as cold as ice. Most of the Swedish melodies were repeated by uproarious request, and the concert concluded to the delight of nearly every one present. I need not allude to the concert which took place on Tuesday evening at Bath, which was almost in every respect a fac-simile of the one held the previous evening in Bristol. Mr. Balfe deserves the highest possible praise for the masterly manner in which he officiated at the piano and conducted. Mr. Balfe at the piano is really an orchestra in himself.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MADMOISELLE ALBONI.—This vocalist is engaged at the French Opera-house for a short period, after which she will proceed to fulfil an engagement in Hungary.—Times.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—A correspondent, in noticing the letter of E. D. C., which appeared in our last number, very prudently enquires, what would become of the Philharmonic and Ancient Concerts, were the operas at Covent Garden to take place on Mondays and Wednesdays; and, what is of the utmost importance, what would become of the band; for most of those who play in the orchestra at Covent Garden, are engaged at both the Ancient and Philharmonic, and have been so, for many years, "It winna do, E. D. C."

DEATH OF MADAME ALBERTAZZI.—We regret to announce, that this talented vocalist died on Saturday last, aged 33, after a protracted illness. In Vol. VII. of the Musical World, page 103, may be found a memoir of Albertazzi, whose maiden name was Hewson; daughter of a teacher of music. She was married to Albertazzi when only fifteen years old. She went abroad, and remained there for many years, performing with great success at various theatres. In April 1837, she made her debut at Her Majesty's Theatre, in the Hay-market, in Cenerentola, with decided success. She sang both at the Ancient and Philharmonic Concerts; and, in 1840, appeared with great success at Drury Lane Theatre. Her health began to fail; and when she appeared at the Princess' Theatre last year, her voice became visibly weak and uncertain; she has suffered severely for several months, and a rapid consumption ended her days in the prime of life, leaving a husband and a family to lament her loss.

MR. FRENCH FLOWERS is, we understand, composing an oratorio; we have not heard what subject the founder of the "Contrapuntists' Society" has selected.

MR. WETHERBEE has accepted an engagement to deliver a course of six lectures on the Italian and German schools of vocal melody, at the Royal Institution, Manchester, in February next.

ROSSINI has been appointed Captain of the National Guard at Bologna. The grand maestro, it is said, already takes great interest in his military avocations, and threatens to indite a National Hymn, the very sound of which will rouse all Italy to frenzy, and affright Austria back to her capital.

MADAME DULCKEN gave pianoforte matinees this week, at Weymouth, Southampton, and Ryde, with very brilliant success; and her performance elicited the greatest applause. She was accompanied by Mr. John Parry, whose buffo songs were rapturously encored, especially his last new one, "Harriet and her Governess."

THE HAYMARKET THEATRE will open this evening with the School for Scandal, and The Invisible Prince. The comedy will include in its cast Mrs. Glover, Mrs. Nisbett, Mrs. W. Clifford, Mr. W. Farren, Mr. Webster, Mr. Henry Farren, (his debut), Mr. A. Wigan, Mr. Creswick, Mr. H. Vandenhoff, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Brindal, &c. Miss Helen Faucit will make her appearance on Monday in the Lady of Lyons; and Mr. and Mrs. Keeley will perform the same evening in Twice Killed. Several novelties are in preparation, among which we may mention a new five-act comedy by Douglas Jerrold.

THE MESSRS. DISTINS gave concerts at Scarborough on Friday morning and evening last; at Whitby on Monday the 27th; at Stockton-on-Tees on Tuesday evening; at North-Shields on Thursday; and at Sunderland yesterday.

FREDERICK SOULIE, the celebrated French litterateur, died last week in Paris from chronic gout. He was one of the most brilliant and popular of the French novelists, and enjoyed a great reputation for many years. His Memoires du Diable created a greater sensation on its first appearance than any work that had preceded it since the Notre Dame of Victor Hugo. Frederick Soulié died in the thirty-eighth year of his age.

THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE commences its winter campaign on Monday with Macbeth very strongly cast, Macready and Miss Cushman playing the principal characters. Mr. Maddox has brought together as capital a tragic company as could be well procured in the present state of the dramatic market. We perceive that Madame Anna Thillon is also engaged; but with her, who are to form the operatic corps we have no means of fathoming. The only vocalists' names we perceive in the list of singers in the Macbeth choruses are—Mr. Bodda, Mr. Barker, Miss E. Romer, and Miss Emma Stanley. But doubtless the manager has something more in reserve.

VIARDOT-GARCIA.—M. Jullien, during his late tour, ff^o red this celebrated vocalist the enormous terms of 100 guineas per night, to appear 40 nights at Drury-Lane theatre, the money to be deposited at Rothschild's bank. This offer, liberal as it was, was declined by Mad. Viardot. Negotiations, however, are still pending, and it is hoped that M. Jullien will eventually succeed in obtaining the services of this wonderful artiste for his new speculation.

ALBONI.—The renewal of this popular artiste's engagement has been certified for the Royal Italian Opera next season, at extravagant terms,—five times the amount of what she received for the season just expired. Alboni may not only say that she sang one night and found herself famous, but that she sang one season in London, and found herself a millionaire.

BALFE has gone to join Madame Balfe and his family in Paris. Gardoni and Costa have also arrived in Paris.

MDLLE. CORBARI makes her rentrée, with Grisi, Persiani, Mario, and Coletti to night, at the Italiens in Paris, in Mozart's Don Giovanni. Her part is Elvira. Mdle. Corbari is re-engaged at the Royal Italian Opera next season.

MRS. NISBETT will appear for the first time in Helen, in The Hunchback, on Wednesday next. Miss Helen Faucit as Julia, Mr. Creswick as Master Walter, and Mr. Webster as Lord Tinsel, will render the cast unusually strong.

M. JULLIEN arrived in London on Tuesday from the continent. The admirable chef has returned from his experimental tour, furnished, we understand, with various musical novelties, to be forthcoming at the Promenade Concerts, which commence on Friday next. One of the musical novelties is the real Swiss horn to be played by M. Kœnig. Mr. Jullien has made sundry engagements during his sejour in Italy, of which we shall give due notice by and bye.

DRURY-LANE.—Two hundred workmen are employed daily in the alterations and decorations of this house. The hangings, we learn, are to be scarlet and gold, and the ornamental portions are to be on the lightest possible scale. The theatre, fashioned after the French Opera-house, will no doubt be extremely beautiful.

ACTORS AND SINGERS.—(From a Dublin Paper.)—"It has been invidiously alleged, by a certain class of men, more celebrated for their egotism than their judgment, that the salaries of singers are ridiculously disproportionate to those of actors; in short, that the least deserving are the most paid. They who are led to this consideration either wilfully blink their eyes on the naked truth, or are, from their vanity, so obnubilated in their mental optics, that they cannot distinguish rationality from inconsequence. There are three reasons, good and true, why the singer should be better paid than the actor. First, the singer must be brought up to his profession and requires a specific course of education which involves an expensive outlay. The actor is the offspring of chance, one of Nature's pettings, and his education is always independent of his following—he may, or may not be taught—the profession involves no necessity. Secondly, the singer necessitates the abilities of an actor conjoined with his own. He that would aspire to be a great vocalist cannot dispense with the possession of the highest dramatic powers. On the other hand music is little, or no aid to the great actor. It is no recommendation to a tragedian that he has a brilliant tenor, or a splendid barytone, or that his intonation is faultless. The third cause why vocalists should necessarily be paid more than actors, is, that the voice is a precarious organ, and that the singer's livelihood is ever at the mercy of temperature and the weather, and that a catarrh or deafness will, in one moment, subvert the acquirements of study and experience, and nullify the finest efforts of genius. To this last, as a corollary, may be added that the ravages of time on the voice renders the singer's remaining on the stage, after the prime of life, a matter of infrequency. A great vocalist demands the possession of more abilities than a great actor, and spite of what may be urged by the class of men alluded to at the beginning of this paragraph against singers being paid immoderately, we pronounce that the singer is only paid proportionably to his circumstances and fortune. If Tamburini receives more money for singing and acting than Macready does for acting, it is only natural to pay one artiste more for doing two things well, than another for doing one thing well."

ADELPHI THEATRE.—A new and original five act drama of domestic interest entitled The Willow Copse, from the enjoined pens of Dion de P. Bourcicault and Charles Kenney, has been read and accepted by the fair manageress of this theatre. Report speaks in the highest terms of the new drama, which is written to include the entire strength of the Adelphi company.

THE JENNY LIND MANIA AT EDINBURGH.—"A Correspondent of the Daily News at Edinburgh, in a letter, dated Sept. 28th, descanting upon the abuses to which the inhabitants are exposed makes the following statement:—"A slighter but more ludicrous annoyance to which the fair inhabitants of St. Mungo's are exposed, consists, in such of them as are of Scandinavian appearance, being mistaken for Jenny Lind. The times have been that when a player left a town there was an end to him, but although Jeuny's doings at Norwich have been duly chronicled so as to put her alibi beyond doubt, a light-haired, blue-eyed maiden in Buchanan-street, was yesterday mobbed, from her supposed identity with the "Nightingale," and had to take refuge in a shop. And the trick of so hunting young ladies, either as a joke or for collecting a crowd to favor thieves, seems to have been resorted to more than once.

MR. EDWARD LODER is writing a new opera for the Drury Lane company to a libretto, founded on Sheridan's play of Pizarro, by Charles Rosenberg. Mr. Loder is also far advanced in an opera for the Princess's; the subject is The Last Days of Pompeii.

CHRISTOPHER TADPOLE.—(From the "Ten Towns' Messenger.")—By Albert Smith.—To sustain the interest required in any serial publication, it is necessary that the author be a man of acute observation as well as of general information, that he should be acquainted with the proceedings of every grade of society, and have seen life in all its shapes and hues. Very few men have had these advantages; those who have can scarcely fail to make the dullest tale interesting, and those who have not invariably are unsuccessful in investing their works with even the smallest atom of humour or of wit. Mr. Albert Smith evidently belongs to the former class; he has made the ascent of Mont Blanc, and been professionally initiated into the mysteries of dissecting-rooms, as "Ledbury" will testify; occasionally he has peeped behind the scenes and penetrated into the sanctity of the green room; he has steamed it up the Rhine and down to Gravesend; visited Rosherville as well as Vauxhall; he has seen the Bridge of Sighs at Venice as well as paid the toll to its contemporary at Hungerford; and judging from his writings, it would be a matter of considerable difficulty to say what place the author of Christopher Tadpole has not visited, or what region he has not explored. The reading public have, however, been the gainers. His works have been stored with well-told anecdotes and comical reminiscences of travel. The "gent" has been somewhat robbed of his glory by the disclosures of this clever humorist. The ballet girl has reason to thank him for the good word he gave her in his little brochure of the name. "Stuck-up People" will feel an arrow from his shaft; public nuisances and private cant have received most effectual reproofs from his pen, calculated to be more serviceable in silencing either their imposition or hypocrisy than any other device invented by ingenious humanity. We like the writings of Albert Smith; in them there is no ill-placed sentiment nor false commiseration. No telling us that we are upon the eve of some social misery; no engaging our fears by pointing out an imaginary deplorable state, but a blithe and hearty good humoured style of writing, full of real wit and humour in every sense of the word—writing that will make you shriek with laughter despite your efforts to restrain it; not the stereotyped, conventional, aristocratic sort of laugh, but an unmistakable one that makes the walls ring again with its echo, and plays no inconsiderable part in aiding the digestive organs in the due exercise of their proper functions. His writing is natural; he sketches characters with amazing precision; Ledbury, as an instance, will strike home to many who have ambitiously attempted the continental tour business; and Jack Johnson, inimitable Jack, is nature itself. The present tale, Christopher Tadpole may not, perhaps, prove so interesting to the general class of readers as some of Mr. Smith's former works; although the characters themselves are drawn with life-like accuracy. Nor are the incidents of the plot commonplace or devoid of spirit; there is not, by any means, so wide a field for display as in Ledbury. Our author has not, however, neglected any opportunities to make his tale amusing. Christopher Tadpole is in no way an unnatural character; there are many such. Sprouts, a well-meaning shop-boy, figures prominently, and, notwithstanding the evidence of the accuracy with which the character is depicted (for we regret to say there are too many of the Sprouts' genus in the world), we think that all must give way to the characters of Gudge and Mrs. Hamper, to us the best drawn in the whole tale. The lawyer, a sordid-minded, ignorant man, incapable of a generous action, and untroubled with any ideas but those designed to entrap some of his less artful fellow creatures into his insidious snares; and Mrs. Hamper, one of those women whom, under any pretence, you cannot shake off; who will follow you with the perseverance of a starved spaniel; who cannot conceive that an addition of one to your small circle will be a formidable difference, and who, of course, always travels without her purse—ergo the expenses of the said one must be defrayed out of your own pocket. This work of Albert Smith's is like all the works of this author, a perfect copy of life; each character is sketched with fidelity; the plot is skillfully drawn; the interest is well sustained. We consider it one of the most attractive publications of the day, and it adds to the reputation which Mr. Smith has so deservedly gained.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received, on several occasions, letters from various Correspondents, requesting to know why certain numbers of the Musical World could not be procured. The only answer we can return is, that these numbers of the journal had a greater attraction than others, and that they were all bought up.

T. S.—The poetry cannot be made available for more reasons than one.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator;

"Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases."

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S
ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS, FOR ONE MONTH ONLY!

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that, emboldened by the great success which has attended his several musical undertakings in this country, he has been induced to become the lessee of the above national establishment, in which, possessing a more permanent interest than he was enabled to hold in the Theatre Royal, Covent-garden, he will have the power of carrying out those alterations and arrangements which he conceives to be desirable for the proper accommodation of the public, and at the same time to secure to himself a suitable field for his future exertions.

M. JULLIEN is fully aware of the arduous task upon which he has entered, and of the very serious responsibilities he has incurred in becoming the permanent lessee of an English national theatre; but, by providing during the year a variety of entertainments, and by producing each with the same excellence and completeness which he trusts have characterized his former works, he hopes to secure that approbation and consequent success which will well compensate him for all his labours and anxieties.

M. JULLIEN leaves for future advertisements a detailed exposition of his general plans, and in this begs merely to announce that his

ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS FOR 1847

Will commence

ON FRIDAY, OCTOBER 8th, and continue for one Month.

The orchestra will, as heretofore, be complete, and include the most distinguished members of the orchestras of the Ancient Concerts, the Philharmonic Society, the Royal Italian-Opera, and Her Majesty's Theatre.

The Selections of Music, in addition to that of a lighter character, will embrace the Grand Compositions of the Classical Composers, the gradual introduction of which at these concerts, and the masterly manner of their performance, have, it is generally allowed, contributed in some measure to raise the general standard of musical taste in the metropolis.

During the recess, M. JULLIEN has spent some months in Switzerland, and has there composed a

NEW DESCRIPTIVE QUADRILLE,

To be entitled

THE SWISS QUADRILLE.

In this will be introduced several purely National Swiss Melodies (many quite new to this country), and also the celebrated RANS DES VACHES; some of them will be performed on the Alpen-horn and other rustic instruments of the mountains, collected by M. JULLIEN during his tour. His REPERTOIRE of MUSIQUE DE DANSE contains various other novelties, which will be produced during the series.

Many important alterations have been effected in the building, with a view to afford increased accommodation to the visitors: the Dress Circle has been considerably enlarged by the addition of an open Amphitheatre, and the Private Boxes and Galleries have also been rendered more commodious. A new and substantial flooring has been laid down, and the former centre chandelier replaced by one more suitable to the theatre. These arrangements, as well as an entirely of the whole of the interior, have been made from the Designs and under the superintendence of Mr. FREDERICK GYE.

The prices of admission will be as usual, viz.:

Promenade and Boxes.....1s. 6d.
Dress Circle.....2s. 6d.
Private Boxes 10s. 6d., 21s., and 31s. 6d.

The Box Office is under the superintendence of Mr. O'Reilly.
The Refreshment-rooms under the management of Mr. Payne.
The Illumination of the house under the care of Messrs. Patrick and Co.
The Mouldings and Ornaments employed in the Decorations are executed by Mr. C. Bielefeld, of Wellington-street, by his new patent machinery.
Full particulars will be duly announced.

M. JULLIEN begs respectfully to state that the CONCERTS can continue but for the theatre being required for the rehearsals of

ONE MONTH ONLY,

THE GRAND OPERA,

The first representation of which will take place on December 1st.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

(No. 3.)

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.

MY DEAR RYAN,—I have only time to write you a few hasty lines, into which I must compress all the news I can gather, on the Boulevards and elsewhere.

My journey from London offered little worthy of remark. The weather was fine and the passage from Folkestone delightful. N. B. When you take a trip to Paris, if you are not in a hurry, divide the distance from Boulogne to Paris into two parts—from Boulogne to Abbeville, and from Abbeville to Paris. There is much worth seeing all the way, and greatly as I was pleased with the department of the Seine and Oise, which I attempted to describe in my last letter, I was still more charmed by the hills and valleys of the Boulonnais, which I shall not attempt to describe in this. Among the remarkable objects, however, must be cited the chateau of Pont-de-Brique, an old edifice, in which Napoleon resided, with his marechals, when he had an army of observation near Boulogne; the little town of St. Mer, situated on a lofty prominence, overlooking a large tract of country, the Basin du Boulonnais, one of the finest bits of plain hill-and-vale scenery I ever saw, presenting, literally, the appearance of a gigantic basin, formed by a ridge of hills bounding, amphitheatrically, an enormous valley; the forest of Montreuil; and last, and best, the ancient fortified town of Montreuil, with the still more ancient Basseville adjoining, one of the most interesting objects in the whole of France. All these present themselves successively, in the order in which I have placed them, and all are well worth inspection. Sterne, you may remember, alludes to Montreuil, in his Sentimental Journey. Therefore don't fail, as I have hinted, to divide your journey from Boulogne to Paris into halves, and take both routes by daylight—or you will miss much worth seeing, both in respect of fine scenery and historical interest. Also, mind you get a seat in the banquette, or you lose the best part of the views, together with the society of the conducteur, who (I speak of him from the Messageries Royales—not Lafitte's) is a very well-informed and advantageously loquacious person, who, to make up for the slowness of his horses, tells you all he knows of the country, and a great deal more besides. But beware putting what he says into a book, or you may chance to be rebuked by the reviewers as Baron Munchausen the second.

I reached Paris at five o'clock on Tuesday morning. On arriving at Abbeville we stopped at an hotel, to partake of what was styled, in courtesy, a dinner, which consisted of nine or ten different preparations of sundry tough and ill-flavoured fowls, with some spinach, some fruits, and some egregiously unpalatable vis ordinaire. This refecton occurred at nine o'clock in the evening. I have forgotten the name of the hotel, but I remember we paid three-francs-and-a-half per head for "the dinner," with something extra to the garçon. If you ever travel by this road, avoid entering the hotel at which the diligence stops—which might be called Le Poulet varié—and go to a café hard by, where you will get something to eat and drink, more palatable and less expensive. A fellow-traveller informed me that the horses, dogs and cats belonging to the hotel were all fed with the same dish, and that "toujours fowl" was so much the motto of the landlord that he never ate anything else himself, nor would he allow his family or his servants to nourish themselves with aught besides. At Abbeville the diligence was attached to the convoi on the railroad, by a mechanical process, which occupied more than half-an-hour in the performance, during part of which time, we were, like Mahomet's coffin, swinging mid-way betwixt earth and heaven. This contrivance is curious enough, but redounds more to the glory of the mechanic who invented it than to the personal comfort of the passengers who are obliged to submit to it. However, maugre the fowls of the landlord of Abbeville, and the ingenuity of the railroad mechanic, we arrived safely in Paris at the hour I have mentioned, and were extricated from the convoi, by a process similar to that by means of which we were previously attached to it.

Paris is filling gradually; the season will soon commence, and the great personages return from the chace and the other "pleasures" of a country-life. Yesterday it was raining all day long, and it was useless attempting to explore the town—for Paris, you must know, on a rainy day, is dirtier than all the towns and cities of England put together. Your only resource is the Passages, which are covered in, like Burlington Arcade, and these are numerous enough; besides which they are little towns of themselves, consisting of a number of arcades joined together in groups, like constellations, where, if you be a stranger, you may very easily lose yourself for half-an-hour at least. In these, and in the Palais Royal, you may find amusements to suit every taste—cafés, reading-rooms, billiard-rooms, shooting-rooms, coiffeurs, restaurants, guingettes, cabarets, grisettes, boot-cleaners at all the thoroughfares, and many other resources, combining pleasure and convenience. But, blasé to all this kind of thing, I contented myself by walking about, and as I observed the motley crowd of passers-by, constructing an imaginary physiologie des passages de Paris, until the time for dinner arrived, when I dined very agreeably, in society the most agreeable, and forgot altogether the inclemency of the weather and the filthiness of the streets, paven or unpaven—for there is little to choose between them in the rainy time—in the comfort and sociality of the moment. With whom I dined I shall not tell you—if you cannot guess, you must remain in ignorance.

To-day the weather is totally changed—sunshine bathes the houses and the streets in golden hues, and everything looks gay and brilliant. Walking on the Boulevards, ~~near the Rue Richelieu~~, the first person I met—and on the Boulevards you meet all the world—was the fair and buxom Alboni, looking very handsome, and saucier than ever. I got some news from her, at least—and not the less welcome was it, inasmuch as it concerned herself. On Saturday* a representation—extraordinary will be given at the Opera (the Académie I mean), to be divided into two parts:—the first part will consist of a ballet; the second of a miscellaneous concert, in the course of which Alboni will sing the grand duet from Tancredi with Duprez, the grand duet from Semiramide with Alizard, an air from L'Italiana, and the rondo from Cenerentola. Should this representation prove attractive—and how can it be otherwise, when Alboni is concerned?—it will, I am told, be followed by a second on Monday or Tuesday, and subsequently, it is possible, by several others. The engagement of Alboni was made, in the names of MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan, by M. Marie Esoudier, one of the proprietors of La France Musicale, who went to Brighton, where Alboni was singing at a concert, expressly for that purpose. It is not true, as the London journals have stated, that Alboni is engaged to perform in the operas at the Académie. But it is possible that, in January, after her engagement at Pesth is concluded, that she may be persuaded to come to Paris and appear on the French stage. I doubt the result, however. The Parisians are all on fire to hear Alboni, and there will be no standing-room at the Opera on Saturday.

The affairs of MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan, who have succeeded M. Pillet in the direction of the Opera, are proceeding prosperously; the recettes, since the re-opening of the establishment, have been splendid. Duprez, has so well profited by his six months holiday, that he is all his former self again. I have heard him in La Juive, and La Favorite, two of his great operas, and was delighted both with his singing and his acting. It will be indeed difficult to fill up the vacancy that must be left when this extraordinary artist retires from the stage; there is at present nothing that approaches, or is likely to approach him, in his own walk. M. Poultier has been recalled from Italy, by the new management, and made his rentrée, the other night, in La Muette, which magnificent chef d'œuvre has been reproduced with the splendor and care that marked its performance when it was first brought out. If you want to judge the quality of the chorus and orchestra of the Académie, you should hear them in La Muette, the square and stilted instrumentation of Halévy gives but poor occasion for displaying their powers. In La Juive you will say that the reputation of the Académie orchestra is prodigiously overrated, but in La Muette you will say that it is full worthy of its celebrity. Poultier was successful, but I shall take another occasion to speak of him more at length. By the way, he sang your favorite song (while Fenella is sleeping) with very great feeling. Maria (whom Mr. Bunn once introduced to London) played Fenella, and your little Plunkett danced the Manola, which was rewarded (as in London) with an encore. The women here, at present, are Mdlles. Dameron, Nau, and Masson. The first I heard in La Juive; she is a clever singer and a graceful actress; her voice is a soprano of moderate power, which she manages with considerable skill, her person is prepossessing, if not decidedly handsome; but she has none of the elements of greatness. With Mdlle. Nau (who is engaged by M. Jullien for Drury Lane) you are already acquainted; Mr. Maddox introduced her to the London public three or four years ago. Mdlle. Masson made an immense hit in La Favorite. She is a very young person, with, in my opinion, very great talent. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, the middle and lower notes of which are of delicious quality. She sings well, and is equally effective in passages where force and energy are demanded, and in those where grace and tenderness are required. She acts, moreover, with much judgment, and has a large amount of passion at command, which she always uses with effect, and in the proper places, avoiding exaggeration and inflated expression of all kinds. To conclude, Mdlle. Masson is a handsome person, and, as Jules Janin graphically expresses it, "Sa robe fait des beaux plis,"—which insinuates that she moves upon the stage with the ease and grace of one long accustomed to it, and that her garments are not embarrassments to her motion. Mdlle. Masson has since appeared in La Reine de Chypre of Halévy, and in Charles VI. of the same composer; but I have not seen her in either of these operas. By the way, there is a great out-cry against MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan, on account of the undue partiality they have hitherto shown for the works of Halévy. The Académie re-opened with La Juive, and already, in less than a month, we have had two more "grand" operas of the same calibre. If the new managers persevere in dosing the public with these tremendous opiates, the public will begin to think that they have gained nothing by the abdication of M. Léon Pillet, but two directors in the place of one.

Signor Bettini has appeared twice in Lucie, and has been favorably received; if he could manage to check his enthusiasm he would sing much better—but I believe you have observed the same thing in one of your Royal Italian Opera notices. The other singers now at the Opera are Paulin, a second-rate second tenor; Alizard, a bass, with the finest voice in the world, and a manner of singing by no means devoid of expression; Porte-haut, a bass, who sometimes reminds me of Borrani; Barhoilhet, whom you recollect at Her Majesty's Theatre singing very indifferently, and who at present does not sing differently; and some others whom I have no time to mention now.

The ballet is in high feather. Carlotta made her rentrée in Le Diable à Quatre, and was received with enthusiasm. Lucie being the opera, the house at the beginning was not very good; but Carlotta, one of the idols of the Parisians—who place her before all the dancers in the world, Taghioni and Ellsler included—proved such an attraction, that before the curtain drew up for the ballet there was no standing-room in any part of the house. With the exception of Duprez, Carlotta Gisi is the only artist whom I have seen applauded by the audience, independently altogether of the claque de lustre, a company of gentlemen who occupy the fourth, fifth, and sixth rows in the pit, and annoy the rest of the audience with their boisterous and incessant demonstrations of unfelt satisfaction. But Carlotta, like Duprez, is one of those talents d part that require no such artificial aid; she moves the audience to the heart, and the audience waits not for the claque to point out where and when they should applaud. Carlotta's rentrée was a new triumph.—(she must be tired of triumphs by this time)—and after the grand pas of the last scene the stage was covered with more bouquets than the charming artiste could hold in both her arms. Carlotta has also danced, several times, the Pas de deux in La Favorite, in which she first debuted at the Académie, five years ago. This is one of her most graceful and finished efforts, and is always an attraction to the Parisian public. On Friday she will dance in La Giselle.

* To night.—D. R.

Cerito and St. Leon make their appearance on Monday, in a new (yes, a new) ballet, called La Fille de Marbre, the music, with the exception of the waltz from Alma, composed expressly by Pugni for the occasion; the ballet and the music are both spoken highly of, and great things are anticipated of Cerito.

Miss Birch will, it is expected, make her début in about a fortnight, in Guillaume Tell, which is to be reproduced expressly for her with great splendor.

The Italiens opened on Saturday with Don Giovanni,—Grisi, Persiani, Corbari, Mario, Lablache, and Coletti, taking their usual parts. M. Vatel has been blamed for opening with this chef d'œuvre, because it has no prominent part for one artist to distinguish himself before all the rest—a very good reason, in my opinion, for selecting it. What a difference between the orchestra at this and that of Costa at the Royal Italian Opera! But more of the Italiens in my next. Meanwhile I may tell you that Castellan makes her début on Saturday, in Lucia, and that Ronconi and his wife (who have not been to Berlin, in spite of your correspondent) have arrived in Paris.

Donizetti, who left Paris, with his nephew and brother, a doctor—for Bergamo, was taken very ill, ten days ago, at Brussels, since which no news whatever has been heard of him, and his friends here are in the greatest state of inquietude. Balfé has just arrived from his country tour with Jenny Lind, who has gone off to Berlin via Hamburg. The post-time is at hand, and I must conclude. Good bye.

DRURY-LANE AND ITS PROSPECTS.

MR. JULLIEN has commenced his campaign in reality. The Promenade Concerts may be said to constitute the helical rising to the operatic dawn of the new Academy. Drury-Lane Theatre is renovated and redeccorated; has doffed its foul and wrinkled ugliness, and has donned the aspect of youthful and smiling beauty. The interior of the house is hardly recognisable. Its appearance is extremely splendid, yet nothing gorgeous offends the severest taste. The prevailing colors are scarlet and white; the ornaments are all in gold. The ceiling is remarkably handsome, and presents the appearance of the sky as seen through a dome. The curtains, scarlet and gold, profess the hues of the Royal livery. An extreme lightness pervades the house, and gives it a more capacious appearance than it was wont to wear. The circle above the dress has been transformed into private boxes. The change appears judicious. The new chandelier is chaste and beautiful, and diffuses a charming light throughout the theatre. The purest taste seems to have directed all the arrangements and alterations connected with Drury-Lane. It is now certainly one of the most elegant theatres in Europe. As we shall speak elsewhere of the Promenade Concerts, we shall overlook them here. Let us in a few words, now that Mr. Jullien's company is established, and his orchestra completed, speculate on the prospects of the new Academy. A priori, one thing is certain, that an equal amount of vocal talent has seldom, if ever, been congregated within the walls of this house. The new tenor, Mr. Reeves, has obtained in Italy the greatest reputation of any English singer since the days of Braham. We only heard him one night in a concert at Drury Lane last year, when we were immediately impressed with the beauty of his voice, and exquisite purity of his style and method. A gentleman, and no mean judge, who heard him at Milan, and knew the estimation in which he was held, declared to us that he was considered the greatest tenor on the Italian stage since the retirement of Rubini. From what we have heard, and from what we learn, we are inclined to think that Mr. Reeves belongs to the Duprez, rather than the Rubini school. His Edgar in the Lucia di Lammermoor, we know from authentic report, created a furor with the Milanese. We believe Mr. Reeves will make his début in an English version of the Lucia. Of Pischek we need hardly say a word. Although his dramatic powers are unknown in England, his vocal qualifications have been sufficiently tested in this country, and have won for him a great repute. In Vienna, Berlin, and other cities of Austria and Germany, his histrionic capabilities have been spoken of as something wonderful. His performances of Faust, Don Juan, Zampa, and other characters, have placed him, with his own countrymen, among the first barytones in Europe. His first appearance may be reckoned upon in either of the three operas just named. Of Mr. Whitworth Jones, we can only speak from report, which gives him a splendid voice, and a fine, manly style. Of the ladies, the three principal prime donne are Miss Birch, Mademoiselle Nau, and Miss Susan Hobbs. The first-named vocalist has for several years held the position of first soprano in England. Miss Birch's high talents are too well known to require any comments in this place. Mdlle. Nau, who has lately been transplanted from the Opera Comique at Paris to the Académie Royale de Musique, is one of the greatest established favorites in the French capital. She was announced last season as engaged by Mr. Maddox for the Princess's, and was to have made her début in Howard Glover's opera, written expressly for her; but from some cause that has not transpired, the negotiation was broken off. Mademoiselle Nau is a singer of the brilliant school. Both as a vocal and histrionic artist she stands very high in French estimation. Miss Susan Hobbs we have heard on sundry occasions, some seasons since, at concerts. Her voice, a high soprano, appeared to us at the time to possess great compass and flexibility; but the organ was evidently unformed, and required a severe course of education. She has been studying in Italy for two years under the best masters, and is pronounced, in a late letter from our Milan correspondent, to be a first-rate vocalist. Notwithstanding this great display of talent, M. Jullien appears to us to require one very necessary component of a complete operatic company, a contralto. M. Jullien has announced in his recent advertisements the engagement of Miss Dolby for his concerts. If the manager could contrive, by any possible means, to obtain the assistance of this talented and highly popular artiste for his operatic corps, he would not only add to its intrinsic strength and efficiency, but the engagement would create a feeling of unqualified delight in all true lovers of music. Miss Dolby is one of the most—if not the most—popular female vocalists in England, and her engagement at the Drury Lane Academy would be one of the most politic acts of the new administration. We are much mistaken in M. Jullien's keen-sightedness, and his diplomatic talents, if he endeavour not to obtain, by might and main, Miss Dolby for his theatre. With such an array of talent, with the splendid chorus promised, and which no doubt will be made available, and with his magnificent orchestra, of which we had a good foretaste in last night's performance, it will be M. Jullien's own fault if his success be not triumphant. Several difficulties, doubtless, appear in prospectu, as when do they not, in a gigantic undertaking like that entered upon by the enterprising manager. We shall have more to say of the Drury Lane doings by and bye, when M. Jullien issues officially his operatic prospectus, which we expect directly the Promenade Concerts are concluded.

EVEN independently of our declaration in the first section, Luciana, as the most abstract opposition to Ottilia, would most aptly follow the description of the latter. But with us there is the additional circumstance that we have placed her in that group which is given to us by the sight of those natures, which stand external to the collisions, and with which therefore our glance is averted from the struggle of the heart. Hence with us Luciana took the lowest place, because she represented a point at which such a conflict between the natural force of feeling and morality cannot take place. Luciana announces herself as an individuality entirely lost in surface and outward show. As Ottilia is quite internal, and everything with her is only an occasion for a return into her sensitive thought, so, on the other hand, Luciana is completely cast into worldliness and averse from all the still-life of feeling. With very good talents, an over vivacious temperament, and a very advantageous exterior, she is in possession of all those qualities which secure her a brilliant part in society. But her whole being has regarded the diffusion of brilliancy as the highest goal of life. Completely directed towards the external, Luciana shews herself throughout utterly incapable of understanding a character completely opposed to her like Ottilia. Charlotte had already judged of Luciana that she was born for the world, cultivated herself for the world, and strove, by an innate domineering character, to make herself queen of that little circle to which she yet belonged.

The testimonial of the Governess, and especially the brilliant commendation which she gives at the public examination, so much the more confirms in our eyes that grasp at acknowledgment and at enjoyment of outward show, as in Ottilia's disposition, we at once perceive the greatest contrast to this tendency. The feeling of the triumph she had gained had made her even supercilious, and against whom could this feeling of victory rather be turned than against Ottilia, who in the sight of Luciana is nothing but a scantily endowed being, very subordinate to herself.* These traits, which were already shown to us during her residence in the boarding-school, and which of themselves have brought her into opposition with Ottilia, soon, on her actual appearance, came forth with much more decision, and cultivated to perfection. The elasticity and liveliness of her nature has almost reached the moveableness of a whirlpool, taking delight in the most noisy, restless impetuosity, and carrying others along in its course.† The endeavour to distinguish herself above others, and to riot in this feeling, has become heightened into a vain desire for brilliancy, which encompasses her entire nature, into the most bare-faced ambition to make herself, in every respect, the centre of society, and everything dependent on her own will and humor. But in this every relic of "internalness" and deep feeling is naturally lost, having yielded to an activity which is always directed towards outward show alone.

Since nothing is done by Luciana for the sake of the thing itself, and she is never able to forget herself in any one of her acts, so even the good which she does makes no pure impression, and the various benefits which she lavishes extravagantly enough, are marred by the character of ostentation, which always accompanies them. Hence it is never in her power, even to avoid afflicting a wound, nay, becoming cruel by her beneficence, because in everything she has only herself and her most subjective satisfaction in view, and never understands how to adapt herself with delicacy to the particular cases. Nay, to delineate such a character the poet has purposely exhibited a trait, in which this longing recklessly to obtrude her beneficence, her care for others perfectly fails on the moral side, and changes itself into the greatest pain for the person for whom it was designed.*

Since Luciana is entirely deficient in depth of feeling, and rather, being impelled by a restless disquiet, an eternal grasp at change, plunges into the noisiest life,† and calls it forth when it does not already exist, it follows that we never see her turn her glance inwards and seek a quiet resting-place of hearty feeling and unostentatious intercourse. The self-will and extravagance of Luciana not proceeding from humor are even without the basis of love, and therefore act with no vivifying power upon the feelings, but rather cause pain and uneasiness. While a self-will, which bubbles up out of humor, always has a reconciling effort, because in the production of contrasts in the extravagant aimless binding together of the heterogeneous, it allows a feeling to shine through which reveals earnest in the midst of jest, so on the contrary Luciana's self-will is more strained and monotonous. Very characteristically for her nature, which is destitute of all feeling, it confines itself to a rapid attempt to seize every circumstance only on the ridiculous side, and always to perceive an occasion for ridicule. Humbleness is completely wanting to this selfish self-will.‡ A recklessness which brings out the ridiculous in things, and is only bent upon discovering this, appears to us much more as the product of an unfeeling understanding, which takes delight in apprehending far-fetched contrasts, and is not un frequently practised at the expense of others. Such an understanding is wanting in the element of a real humor, which does not pause at a one-sided grasp at the ridiculous, but everywhere, even when it good naturedly scoffs, exhibits a love which sees and brings out in everything a connection with the Idea. While to Luciana everything appears ridiculous, because her selfish self-will only considers things as isolated, and traces them from their internal connection, so with genuine humor the exhibition of the merely ridiculous is generally absorbed into the contemplation of an idea which is everywhere present. The morbid desire to trace the ridiculous everywhere therefore gives an evidence of internal coldness, just as genuine humor in its harmless operation reveals to us the most beneficent warmth of the heart.¶

As the deep nature of Ottilia strives against the wordly individuality of Luciana, which merely calculates on outward brilliancy, nay, even awakens in the latter a real dislike to this charming being,§ so are the more ideal persons generally repelled by Luciana's manner, as the poet has admirably signified to us in the cold, almost frosty deportment of the noble Architect towards her.|| For even her great endeavours to gain a homage from the Architect, and to count him in the number of her adorers, fails through the quiet equilibrium, which the natural aversion of the ideal youth from Luciana's worldly conduct opposes to her efforts. Neither was she able to make the poet an admirer, but on the contrary, is obliged to receive from him a painful sensation.

* We here remind our readers of the narrative how Luciana endeavoured to restore to society a young girl, who because she had the misfortune to occasion the death of a younger brother, had entirely secluded herself. But this violent attempt produces the most frightful effect on the young girl.—Dr. Röscher's note.

† According to the poet's expression, "Luciana always lashed before her the storm of life in the social whirlpool." Ibid.

‡ This unpleasant combination of "selfish" and "self-will" does not belong to the original, but arises from a difficulty in finding a good word for "Muthwille." I do not like "self-will," but still less do I like "petulancy," or "wantonness."—Translator.

¶ This desire of Luciana to seek the ridiculous everywhere, had manifestly given Ottilia occasion to express in her diary, the profound thought: "The sensual man laughs, when there is nothing to laugh at. Whatever excites him, his internal feeling of satisfaction is made apparent," and quite especially is the weighty word called forth: "The man of understanding finds almost everything ridiculous, the man of reason scarcely anything." We have endeavored also, to exhibit the sense of the expression with relation to Luciana's individuality.—Dr. Röscher's note.

§ This dislike had increased on Luciana's side. "A real bitterness had arisen in her relations towards Ottilia. She looked down with contempt on that quiet uninterrupted activity of the dear girl, which was observed and praised by everybody."—Ibid.

|| Here belongs the very masterly description of Luciana's representation of Artemisia, in which the Architect has to co-operate, as the builder who sketches the grave of Mausolus, but is not to be brought out of his tranquility and stiffness by any effort on the part of Luciana.—Ibid.

* In the Governess's letter it is said of Luciana, "she jumped about the rooms with her prizes and testimonials, and shook them in Ottilia's face. 'You have come off badly to-day,' she exclaimed. Ottilia answered very quietly, 'It is not yet the last day of examination.' 'But you will always remain the last!' cried the young lady, and bounded away."—Dr. Röscher's note.

† She scarcely allowed the oldest person any rest at the card-table. Whoever was in any degree moveable was forced, if not to the dance, at any rate to a lively game of forfeits, penalties, and puzzles."—Offered by Dr. Röscher.

It has always appeared to us a very refined trait for characterizing Luciana, that the poet makes her interested with especial vivacity and zeal for a class of artistical exhibitions, which is both subordinate in its nature, and is particularly adapted to shew forth one's own personality, and gratify one's vanity without trouble. We mean the representation of tableaux vivans, which completely occupies Luciana, and which she everywhere calls at once into life, certain that she will thus succeed in making herself a natural centre of society, and in being admired by the spectators. We have called this class subordinate, because it is completely destitute of all real ideality, and is only directed to a show of it, since it can make use of no other means than the form and personality of a few persons who chance to be brought together, which must be always relatively deficient.

Since in this region the mind can bring forth no product of its own, not being able, as in sculpture and painting, to elevate the given material into a sign and expression of the Idea, but must confine itself to artificially decking out that which is presented by chance—a common reality, so that it may have a show of the Idea, the tableau vivant always remains a poor substitute for the real art, which it imitates. It always leaves us in a state of contradiction between artistical illusion, ideal show, and common reality, since the last cannot be truly overcome and transfigured. At the same time this sort of exhibition gives great room to show one's self to advantage in every way, and by various means to turn all the attractions of form to account. Hence there will be no want of an effect upon the largest portion of the spectators, because people in general require a strong spring, and are by sensual illusion excited to a much higher degree than by a beautiful ideal appearance, which also requires an ideal tendency for its appreciation. This sort of artistic activity everywhere, as in the case of Luciana, owes its origin to vanity to an endeavour to produce strong effects with the least possible expenditure of art and technicality, and without any of that mastery over material which is gained by serious labor, and in the most allowable manner to make one's self an object of an universal attention,—nay, admiration, which can express itself without restraint at the charms of the form and the entire personality; while, on the other hand this acknowledgment can be received without blushing under the veil of art. Hence, it may be said, one reaps in sport without sowing. Hence Luciana is just as much inspired for the exhibition of tableaux vivans, as, on the other hand, Otilia, who is excluded from them altogether must feel a secret dislike to them, which, on the subsequent representation of the Madonna, she with difficulty overcomes. It is, therefore, an excellent thought that Luciana, who is so completely plunged into the world, is even in art seen to elevate herself only to a lively interest for tableaux vivans,* which are as worldly as herself, and only in the service of vanity. The deeper ground has been developed out of the nature of this class in harmony with Luciana's personality.

The figure of Luciana will certainly have awakened in us the conviction that in this soil a collision between inner powers cannot thrive, because such a collision always pre-supposes a certain depth of feeling and an endeavour directed inwardly. This is still more confirmed in us by the want of all heartiness and of all ideality in Luciana's relation to her bridegroom, this being so thoroughly external and superficial, that it completely removes all notion of capacity for depth and a warmth of genuine feeling.

As Luciana, on account of her nature being wholly lost in externality, cannot admit the possibility of this collision, so does the Teacher and the Architect raise us above it from an opposite cause. We will begin with the Assistant.

* To prevent misunderstanding, it may be stated that the copyright of this translation belongs solely to the translator.

* Luciana's whole nature is altogether closed to true art. Everywhere the effort is alone considered. Thus, it is said of her very characteristically: "Luciana, like all persons of the kind, who always mingle together, what is advantageous and what is detrimental to them, wished also to try her fortune in recitation, the memory was good, but to speak honestly, her delivery was spiritless, and vehement without passion." The want of depth is very definitely expressed in another place: "Luciana thought she understood everything better, and as her feelings were common, so to carry them out, the skill of a dear soet-de-chambre seemed quite as well, as that of an eminent artist. Further than an altar for sacrifice and a wreath, her imagination could not ascend if she thought to make a festal compliment on every one's birth-day.—Dr. Richter's note.

SONNET.

No. LIV.

THINK'at thou I'm happy?—There is scarce a day
That passes, but a lurid light it throws,
Making my heart some secret wound disclose,
Which in it unobserv'd, but rankling lay.
And all is self-inflicted. 'Tis the play
Of mine own thoughts,—the stream which ceaseless flows
From my soul's centre, pois'ning as it goes,
Which scatters wounds with its corroding spray.
The world is kind to me; but still—but still,
That bitter stream is ever onward rushing,
O'erwhelming ruthlessly each thought of bliss:
My soul itself is curs'd; I may not feel
That joy which flows for others, full and gushing;
For me there's venom in the fondest kiss.

JENNY LIND! JENNY LIND!! JENNY LIND!!!

WE have yet, once more, the last time, to offer our readers a few extracts respecting the Swedish Nightingale. As Jenny Lind is, while we write, departing from our shores, we give them as a parting salute in honor of the accomplished vocalist.

No. 1.—(From the Bath Gazette).—Being as well pleased as most people with our own performances, we have the conceit to imagine that in our last paper we awarded her full due to Jenny Lind, and spoke quite as highly of her vocalization as the facts warrant. But while entertaining no prejudices hostile to the pretensions of the lady in question, we cannot be blind to the species of Lindolatry which prevails to the North, South, East, and West of us. Except on the old principle of "one fool making many," we can see no reason for any such ridiculous feeling as is exhibited towards the "Swedish nightingale." Neither do we deem it reasonable, because this fair lady has well-tutored vocal organs, can sing marvellously well, and produce a shake so pure as to be only comparable, in the ears of a neighbouring critic, to two notes rattled together, that therefore her name should be imported into every pastry cook's, halter's, or tobacconist's, shop in the empire. Surely we may concede that she equals all living singers, without being obliged to munch "Jenny Lind" comfits, wear Jenny Lind hats, or treat our adolescent friends with Jenny Lind cigars! We have no means of knowing to what extent this folly has intruded into those temples of vanity, drapers' shops; but doubtless shall soon find the "weaker sex," as they are unpolitely called, bedecked with "Jenny Lind" plaids, silks, and muslins. The "gents" are always the foremost in the march of folly and senility: and speedily will these exhibitants of their tailors, shall be found luxuriating in outré neck-ties and unexampled wrappers, dignified by the above common combination of alphabetical digits. We should be surprised at this amusing madness, did we not know, that if England be infected with a monomania, its sway is always right royal. Madden the English people about anything,—whether political, literary, or musical, and the result will be amazing. Inspire them with a penchant for a statesman, for a novelist, for a cantatrice, and it is wonderful how unanimous they are. They have not the enthusiasm of Germany, the ardour of Italy, or the levity of France, and it is therefore only by extreme good fortune on the part of an inventor of projects that they are aroused; but their pertinacity is marvellous. Once raised the clamour,—once obtain the sweet voices of the multitude,—and they are boisterous and untiring beyond example. Popular fame is proverbially transitory, but nowhere less so than in England. Thus it is, that at present we are blessed with a very fine and flourishing musical mania. The three kingdoms are wild about Jenny Lind. Cities, towns, villages, solitary farm-houses, are continually resonant with the name of the renowned songstress. People of all ranks, stations, and dispositions, crowd to hear her tones in alissimo, and profess themselves delighted. Any other opinion is pronounced rank heresy. The Queen graces her by the regal gift of a bouquet; young men commit dishonest acts to raise money in order to hear her. She is overwhelmed by encores, bouquets, ecstasies, testimonials; and last of all, provincial managers purchase her services at five hundred pounds a-night. As seven cities contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer, so there is contention as to the locality of Jenny's matrimonial predilections. Half the journals of the kingdom are wild on this topic. Cutlers, newspaper editors, clergymen, iron-founders, military Lotharios, Swedish peasants, simple "gentlemen," are named as future proprietors of the hand of this mistress of "linked sweetness." It is quite a fortunate hit for those journalists whose columns are usually dreary when Parliament is not sitting. The present season would try their resources terribly, but for Jenny Lind. One cannot get a French ducal murder or a Thames steam-boat explosion every week; yet on the feats, the connections, the intentions, the triumphs of the "queen of song," it is possible to ring innumerable changes. We need not repeat that all this is wretchedly absurd, especially as all musical critics declare the superiority of Jenny's present rivals, Grisi and Alboni. Whether this opinion be right or wrong, every good judge of such matters must smile at the hack-writers, the empty connoisseurs, the praters, whose qualification is wealth of technical words, whose "valiant voices" have led to this universal uproar. We know that JENNY LIND sings well,—that her voice is limpid, clear, and constant,—but there is no foundation for this astonishing hubbub. It tends to degrade us in the eyes of sensible foreigners, and to deprive the nation of its reputation for possessing more than average sobriety, wisdom, and "common sense." Surely the lady's admirers can pay fitting respect to the musical abilities and artless demeanour of their prodigy, without losing their senses in an intoxication of delight. The truth is, that, sagacious as we English esteem ourselves, we are more easily than any people galled by overweening pretence, and its success is generally proportionate to its exaggeration. We reverence what we style respectability, and have great faith in the respectability of a good suit of clothes. We declare our contempt for quackery; and yet swallow tons of rubbish in the shape of universal panaceas. With us, men who effect profundity are esteemed profound, and pedantic smatterers are considered learned. And we greatly incline to the opinion, that JENNY LIND's successes, the noisy acclamations of her thousands of idolaters, and the accumulated store of pluvial gold are owing quite as much to this self-deluding spirit as to the eloquent music of her voice.

No. II.—(From the Bath Gazette).—At the Bristol theatre, on the occasion of Jenny Lind's late performance, the élite of the light-fingered gentry had a few pickings. Capt. Talbot, whilst passing along the lobby was relieved of his purse, containing about 7l. Another gentleman from London, lost his purse, containing six sovereigns. A lady for better security as she thought, gave her purse to her husband, when, hey, presto, it disappeared most mysteriously, and was found soon afterwards by a gentleman in his coat pocket, quite empty, the contents having been carefully removed by some expert thief.

No. III.—(From the Glasgow Constitutional).—THE LORD JUSTICE CLERK HOPE AND JENNY LIND.—The Inverary Circuit fell this year to be holden upon Thursday the 16th current. Could any of your readers inform me, whether the Lord Justice Clerk was present in the City Hall, Glasgow; having Madlle. Jenny Lind, upon Friday, the 17th? The object of this, apparently is to account for his lordship's haste to leave Campbellton without waiting for the jury, at the late circuit.

No. IV.—(From the Daily News).—JENNY LIND APPEARED at Exeter on Friday and Saturday, exciting the enthusiasm which has now become a matter of course. The prices of admission to the subscription rooms were £1 1s., 15s., and 10s. 6d. Some expert thieves were busy in the throng on the first occasion, and several robberies were effected. One gentleman lost nearly £2, another £3 10s., and a lady upwards of £100. Certain parties, it is said, speculated to the amount of £300 worth of tickets, which they were ultimately glad to dispose of at 6s. each.

No. V.—(From the Bath Herald).—We should like to make the acquaintance of the man who, after hearing Jenny Lind, could sit down coolly and write you all about it: speak in calm professional tones of the quality and register of her voice; anatomise the trills and cadences, the arpeggios and fiorituros with which she embellishes her song; discuss gravely the cast and expression of her features, and deliberate methodically upon her claims to beauty. Such a man's acquaintances, we say, we should be glad to make; we confess to a taste for monstrosities; such an unfeathered biped would have a charm for us, equal to Tom Thumb, the Swiss giantess, the Man-monkey, and the Bosjesmans; we should like to see him—behind the bars in his cage; but we should be sorry to shake him by the hand as our friend. Although yet young in the most sweet service of the public, a tolerably familiar acquaintance with the stage and the concert room has made us prematurely callous; we flattered ourselves we were proof against emotion; we can sit out the deepest of tragedies or the most pathetic of melo-dramas without winking, and have listened to the dulcetest of dulcet voices without being raised from our seat. Until we saw and heard Jenny Lind we did labour under an impression that we were indifferently self-possessed; from and after that time (as the lawyers say in the deeds) we have been abundantly convinced that that impression was a delusion and a snare. To fix the gaze upon Jenny's earnest eyes, and listen to the music which breathes forth as if from every feature in her gentle face, is at once to abandon all thought and remembrance of individual existence, and to yield up the imagination unconditionally to a charm more potent than that of the fabled syrens. And then to criticise her features! We have an innate respect for those strong-minded individuals who will undertake the execution of difficulties only just within the bounds of possibility; but we regard the man as a maniac who will attempt that which, in rerum natura, is not to be compassed. Were we a practitioner duly qualified, we would give without compunction an order for admission to the strongest room of the securest lunatic asylum, of that individual who should be proved to have attempted anything so desperately hopeless as describing the face of Jenny Lind when lighted up with the fire of genius and animation. The task would be more easy to convey to a blind man, by verbal description, an idea of the prismatic colours. No! the face, the voice, the action, the expression of Jenny Lind, are things to be seen, and heard, and thought of, and dreamt about, and gloated over, but not to be described. With this negative exordium, then, let us proceed to note down some few circumstances connected with the charming Jenny's visit to Bath!!!

And so we bid adieu for a season to the fair Jenny, the far-famed Jenny, the overwhelmed-with-praises, the universally-sought, the great-curiosity-exciting Jenny. We wish her well, albeit we have labored hard to pull her down from that pride of place, where we were satisfied judgment and sober conviction could never have placed her. We wish her well, and trust she may return to us next season, with powers unimpaired and reason untouched by the frantic eulogies of her English admirers.

THE seven radical sounds with their vanishes, which have been described, include as far as I perceive, all the elementary diphthongs of the English language. The term diphthong denotes the transition of the voice from one tonic sound to another; forming thus the impulse of one syllable by a continuous gliding, without a perceptible change of organic effort in the transition. By the term elementary, as qualifying a diphthong, I mean to point out the inseparable bond of its constituents; the nature or the habit, whichever it may be, of the voice having so decreed the series of the two sounds, that the first or radical cannot, in unpremeditated utterance, be given without terminating in the second or vanish. The remaining five tonics are monothongs, and have one sort of sound for both the radical and vanishing movement, they are—oo-oo, ee-l, e-rr, e-nd, i-n. When the element ee-l is deliberately uttered, in the mode of asking a question with earnest surprise, one unvaried sound of ee-l is heard rising from the radical outset to the top of the vanish. This concrete rise in interrogation will be described hereafter, as being the interval of a radical and vanishing octave; but the homogeneous course of ee-l may be heard through the fifth, third tone and semitone. These modes of displaying the course of the unchanged concrete in ee-l, show an analogous result in the cases of the four other monothongal tonics. Whereas if the diphthongal tonics are uttered with the interrogative intonation, the difference between their radical and vanishing portions is at once perceptible. The nature of the tonics as here described, may be otherwise plainly shown. We learned in the last section, the distinction between the equable concrete of speech and the protracted radical, and protracted vanish of song and recitative. Now the use of these protracted forms of intonation will exhibit the structure of the tonic elements. For an attentive ear may perceive, when the diphthongs are sung with a protracted vanish, that the voice quickly leaves the radical, and dwells in continuation on the different sound of the vanish. The protracted note, in the vanish of the monothongs, will be the same in sound as their radicals. The words of an ordinary melody in slow time, or any church psalm, will afford proof on this point. Another mode of illustrating the real diphthongal character of seven of the tonics, may be drawn from the phenomena of rhyme. Rhyme is that peculiar relationship in the sound of syllables, which consists in a difference between the first sound of each, the compared syllables, and an identity between all the subsequent sounds, each to each; the agreeable effect of rhyme depending chiefly on the particular relation between the tonic sounds. The first condition is that of identity in the tonics, as dame, came. The second degree of relationship is made by tonics which have a different radical, but the same vanishing movement, as cars, wars. The third consists of those tonics that differ both in their radicals, and vanishes, yet are of nearest resemblance in their sort of sound, as, good, blood. The use of the second kind of rhyme shows the composition of the diphthongal tonics. In the following lines the correspondence of oo-ze in doom, with o-ld, in home, and of a-le, in obey, with ee-l, in tea, is admitted as canonical, from the identity of the vanishes of a-le, and o-ld, respectively with the monothongs ee-l, and oo-ze.

Of foreign tyrants, and of nymphs at home;
Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey,
Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea.

The assimilation of the sounds of a-le, and ee-l, by the identity of their vanishes, produces the monotony of the four following lines,
Swift to the Lock, a thousand sprites repair,
A thousand wings, by turns, blow back the hair;
And thrice they twitch'd the diamond in her ear, Thrice she look'd back, and thrice the foe drew near.

"PUFFING."

Oct. 6, 1847.

SIR,—In this century, "puffing" has made so immense and ingenious an advance that it has become a very giant in its power and resources. It has ceased to be the pigmy thing it was of yore, a thing of ridicule and contempt, the exclusive property of the tradesman,—the special attribute of the counter and the barber's pole: it is now an organ of formidable grandeur and importance, capable of the greatest achievements, stretching forth its mighty, hydra-headed, branches far and wide, into every corner, an engine, most mysterious in its machinery, most wonderful in its works. In this century, "puffing" has ceased to be a trade, it has become a science,—an intricate and deep seated science! Let those who account this a misnomer, study the advertisement columns of our newspapers, the pamphlet forms presented us by the Hebrew tailors, the placards on our walls, the vans and boards perambulating the metropolis, the windows of the London shopkeepers, the nicely worded eulogiums that appear in the auctioneers' announcements, the poetical flights of fancy indulged in by the "Bed and Bolster Marts," the modern play bills, the —, but I shall go on until doomsday; let those who doubt study and ponder on but one of these things and they will be convinced, that puffing is a science!

There is a very striking example of the power, the mightiness, the grandeur, of this same science of "puffing," more prominently before the public. I approach the theme however with fear and trembling, for the subject is one, of which the world has heard, with which it has been bored, (the one is a sequitur naturally following the other) ad nauseam.

Jenny Lind—the very name so oft repeated begins to possess ennuyants properties—is the forcible example to which I refer. The reputation of the Swedish Nightingale, is based almost altogether upon puffs. The importance attached to her name is one of the greatest deeds of the science of "puffing," for it is through its medium, that she has attained the high position she now holds. For it is through its medium that her whole career has been one of triumph,—brilliant triumph. For it is through its medium, that she has been called "the prima donna of prima donnas," "the greatest singer in the world," "a phenomenon," "a vocalist unequalled by past or present artists," "a better singer than Malibran and a greater actress than Rachel," &c., &c., &c., that she has been magnified and praised till the force of puffery could no farther go,—when she is, in truth and fact,—a poor actress, and not a first-rate singer, with a very brilliant but far from a perfect organ.

The first appearance of the Nightingale in this country was the signal for the grand headlong outburst,—the gigantic display of the "puffing" in all its glory. The puffs previous to the arrival of the songstress, had been great, very great, but they sank into utter insignificance, before the grandeur of the storm which hailed her on her first appearance in this country. But it was, as we say of a storm of rain, "too violent to last." The effect was wonderful, unprecedented, because it was the grandest effort the science of "puffing" had ever undertaken. People were at first so panic struck,—so totally overwhelmed, by the immense force with which the torrent swept down, that they became, as it were, intoxicated with its tremendous fury, and were carried along with it, in spite of themselves joining and swelling the force of its hyperbolical cry. Indeed, it seemed heresy to be silent. Few beyond an isolated number of tough old musical philosophers were found powerful enough to resist the immense might of the opposing current. With time, however, reason returned, and the world has now commenced slowly but surely to retrace its steps, wondering at its own weakness and determined as speedily as possible altogether to reverse a judgment so madly and heedlessly given.

The furious outburst of the science of puffing is now pretty well over. The direct system, the flying in the face of all truth and reason,—the out-heroding Herod course that had been pursued, in raising Jenny Lind so high above all the rest of humanity that other artists sunk altogether into pigmies in comparison with her, is a style of "puffing" now gradually dying off—becoming small by degrees and beautifully less. We now but seldom hear of it. The science of "puffing" has now (to use a hacknied nautical phrase) altered its tack.

If you meet a fierce Jenny Lind maniac, at the present time, he will scarcely venture to pronounce on his goddess, (internatia) the high sounding titles, quoted above, as of yore. No, another ramification from the puff-trunk is extended. Tell him that the Nightingale's voice is husky in the lower notes, and feeble and uncertain in the upper. He does not now directly contradict you, nevertheless he does not leave you unattacked in possession of the field. He will say, "Perhaps so, but then what a dear good moral creature she is!" Tell him that in your opinion Jenny's Norma cannot be better defined than in the words "frozen milk and water." He will reply, "That may be but then how kind, how amiable she is!" Tell him that her Susanna is worse than her Norma, he will answer, "Very likely, but then how heavenly pure she is—how noble—how charitable!" One is met no longer with opposition on musical grounds! The maniac no longer objects to your attacks but defends her moral character—which no one ever ventured to say one word against. The science of "puffing" unable any longer to keep up the delusion that Mdle. Lind is a musical phenomenon and superior to all other vocalists in a musical point of view, is now determined to make her a moral phenomenon—a paragon of virtue, an angel of piety—and therefore better than other vocalists, who does not profess the same qualities, and more deserving the public regard!

Heaven forbid that I should cavil at her morality or sneer at her piety. But still, I must say, that in my opinion these are matters, with which the musical public have nothing whatever to do. Mdle. Jenny Lind does not appear upon the stage of Her Majesty's Theatre to be examined touching her moral views, her amiability, her correctness of life, or her charity; but to exhibit and to have criticised her musical powers, her style of vocalisation, her voice, and her acting. What has the critic whose duty it is to judge and chronicle her musical talents, to do with her morality and the rectitude of her virtue, off the stage, in her private career? With what wild amazement would the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench stare, were they called upon to eulogize instead of condemning a felon, because he happened to be a splendid vocalist! And yet it is no less absurd to gloss over and praise Jenny Lind's musical deficiencies because she happens to be a very virtuous and pious young woman! By the way, the critic of The Morning Post will have it that she is a girl! I always gave the critic credit for very strange notions, but if girlhood is not passed at twenty-six or twenty-seven years of age I should like to know when it is? However, I do think that with the private life and actions of singers and actors the public have nothing whatever to do. They cease to be public property when they are off the stage, and to question or examine into their private career is neither more nor less, than an impertinent and disgraceful intrusion.

For my own part I would believe more about Mdle. Jenny Lind's good deeds and charitable actions, were I to hear less about them. I am not inclined to think very highly of charity, when it is followed by a trumpet, when it is the talk of everybody, when it is so puffed and reported in the newspapers and periodicals of the day, that its good actions become mere advertisements, mere vehicles to keep a name and reputation continually before the public eye. It appears to me to be, to say the least of it, a very equivocal virtue. It is not the charity of those, who "do good by stealth and blush to find it fame." Tales about Jenny Lind's refunding money to managers, with fears that they have not profited by her engagement, her terms being so enormous, make pretty paragraphs in newspapers, but it appears to me that much trouble would have been spared if those terms had been less exorbitant in the first instance, and the difficulty of refunding would have been obviated. But then the newspaper paragraphs—the advertisements—the "puffing," for it comes to that after all, would be done away with—mischief! Indeed, that would be, to such superficial musical merits as Jenny Lind's!

When I look back and see the immense length to which my dissertation on "puffing," has extended, I feel how many apologies are due to you for thus trespassing on your patience, and with the knowledge that every additional word but adds to my fault. I hastily subscribe myself,

P. S.—My suggestion for changing the opera nights at Covent Garden to Mondays and Wednesdays has been met by, I fear, an insuperable objection, in the fact of the Philharmonic Concerts taking place on those evenings. It appears to me that my poor plan is in that respect entirely obviated, and I have only left me to regret I so encroached on your space to no purpose.

SIR,—Will you have the kindness to recommend to me, in an ensuing number of the Musical World, some songs that will suit the register of my voice, which is a barytone, ranging from F natural to D natural, or E flat, thus embracing nearly two octaves? It is very difficult for me to sing several flat E's, and I prefer going no higher than D natural. Henry Russell's style of songs is one which I like much, especially the more spirited of them. I can use the lowest notes of my voice without difficulty. I like songs the best that contain great contrasts of forte and piano. I have few means of choice among songs, which I trust you will consider an apology for writing to you on the subject. You criticise one of this week's World, by Linley, which I shall procure.—With much esteem, I am, Sir,

A LOVER OF SONG.

[We are not sufficiently versed in modern ballad writing to recommend the songs required by our correspondent. Nearly all the bass songs reach the E flat, or E natural. Our correspondent had best apply at the publishers.—Ed. M. W.]

To the Editor of The Musical World.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Can you inform me whether your talented correspondent, Mr. Flowers, has ever turned his attention to, or composed anything for the accordion? I feel confident that a judicious arrangement of some of his organ fugues, which I have at present in my possession, would suit the instrument admirably. This beautiful and soul-thrilling sound produced only wants the patronage of some talented and energetic gentleman, like the one I have named, to bring it to its proper position, and make it truly a national instrument. I mention Mr. Flowers' name because, as an admiring reader of your journal, I have been frequently struck with his great perseverance and untiring energy in the cause of our beloved art. I have the honour to remain, dear Mr. Editor, your constant reader and subscriber,

A PROFESSOR OF THE ACCORDION.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

DEAR SIR,—Your numbers of the 2nd have only just reached me. I am obliged by your insertion of my letter relative to Jenny Lind's Concerts there, but there are a few errors owing, no doubt, to my bad writing. Will it be too much trouble to ask you to correct them?

Col. 2, p. 638, line 5 from bottom; for "these concerts," read "three concerts."

Col. 1, p. 639, line 1, for "this orchestra," read "the hall."

Ditto, line 9, and for "opening scenes," read "singing tenors."

Ditto, line 30, for "the latter," read "the second."

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—The season commenced on Saturday evening, with The School for Scandal and The Invisible Prince. The house was crowded in every nook and corner. The comedy on the whole was finely performed. Of Farren's Sir Peter Teazle, Mrs. Glover's Mrs. Candour, and Mrs. Nisbett's Lady Teazle, it would be superfluous to speak. They were as excellent as ever. Of the other characters, Mrs. W. Clifford's Lady Sneerwell, Mr. Webster's Moses, and Mr. Brindal's Trip, demand nearly the same praise. We thus behold a comedy supported, as regards six of its characters, in capital style. But this does not make the performance perfect. There are other parts as prominent which require to be conceived and embodied with equal life and strength, or the comedy must necessarily lose as a complete performance. The parts of Charles and Joseph Surface, for the first time at this theatre, by Mr. H. Farren and Mr. Creswick, demand a little consideration before we can arrive at their real value. The appearance of Mr. H. Farren is much in his favour. He is tall, well-made, and his deportment is gentlemanly and easy. He is a good stage tactician and has evidently studied in the Farren-school. Nevertheless with these qualifications we cannot think that Nature ever intended Mr. H. Farren for a light comedian. His voice is deep, almost solemn: his look serious; he is totally devoid of that mercurial spirit so necessary to the impersonations of the Charles Surface class, and which characterised the performances of Elliston, Jones, and others. With all this we are inclined to believe Mr. H. Farren to be a young man of much ability, and have no doubt that by and bye he will find a part more in unison with his sympathies and powers. Mr. Creswick's Joseph Surface was heavy and monotonous. This gentleman has talent, but it is not always under the best governance, or the best judgment. His conception of Joseph Surface was certainly a mistaken one. Miss E. Messent made a most favourable debut in Maria. She is quite a novice to the boards, but played with as much ease and propriety as though she had been stage born. The comedy was received with much favour, and all the performers were summoned at the end. It was repeated on Tuesday evening.

On Monday Miss Helen Faucit re-appeared after an absence of three seasons. She played her own—absolutely her own—part of Pauline Deschappelles in The Lady of Lyons, one of the best and most finished original impersonations of modern times. Miss Helen Faucit was received with immense applause. Her performance of Pauline was characterised by all its former grace, elegance, feeling, and power. It would be no easy task to find its superior as a piece of acting on the English stage. Mr. Creswick played Claude Melnotte. He looked the part well, and in the earlier scenes exhibited no mean power as an artiste. In all the latter portions of the play we could discern but little indications of tragic ability. An entire want of intensity rendered the passionate scenes cold and ineffective, nor was his judgment always to be commended. Mr. Creswick, in secondary characters, may be entitled to eulogy, but at present his position at this house is somewhat elevated beyond his merits. On Monday evening Mr. and Mrs. Keeley appeared in Twice Killed with the usual effect. Mr. Keeley is, we understand, engaged to supply Mr. Buckstone's place.

On Wednesday The Hunchback was performed with, positively, one of the best casts we ever witnessed. Miss Helen Faucit was the Julia; Mrs. Nisbett (first time of performance), Helen; Mr. Creswick, Master Walter; Mr. H. Farren, Modus; Mr. A. Wigan, Lord Tinsel; and Mr. Howe, Sir Thomas Clifford. We repeat, The Hunchback was better cast than we ever saw it before, aye, even in Fanny Kemble's heyday. Miss Faucit's Julia is a great, very great performance. It is hardly possible to fancy a representation more exquisitely conceived, or more perfectly developed. We have seen multitudes of Julia's, from Fanny Kemble downwards, in the race of time, and confess we have witnessed none at all comparable to Helen Faucit's. Not only do ease and grace, which are Nature's free gifts, belong to her, and consummate art, which is the offspring of study and experience; but that innate faculty of imagining with truth and beauty, demonstrated by outward signs akin to that imagining, which is the rarest bestowal of Heaven, and which mortals denominate genius, appertains to this artiste. For power, truthfulness, and artistic finish, Miss Helen Faucit's Julia is equal to any performance we have seen in modern times. To select scenes in the play for particular eulogy would prove a task of no small difficulty. Perhaps the scene with Master Walter, after she discovers Clifford to be the steward of her affianced lord, and ultimately uses entreaties, reproaches, and threats to move her seeming hard-hearted guardian; and that in which she acknowledges, after many struggles her love to Clifford himself, were the most transcendent parts of her acting. These were incomparably fine. There was not a single look, attitude, or utterance which did not exhibit the tentings of a wounded heart. We have endeavoured, in our feeble way, and briefly as we could, to do justice to this performance, but all we have said falls far short of the reality. Mrs. Nisbett's Helen, it may be well imagined, was admirable. This delightful actress could hardly be seen to greater advantage than in this character, which suited her vivacious and arch style to perfection. Her scenes with Modus were most excellent, and in her advances to her timid lover she displayed the greatest propriety in not outstepping the limits of feminine delicacy, a fault we have had frequently to lay to the charge of sundry modern Helens. In this newly undertaken part Mrs. Nisbett has added another shining leaf to her wreath of laurel. Mr. Creswick's Master Walter was a careful and effective impersonation. The character, as it demanded neither great tragic power, nor variety of phase in its embodiment, adapted itself well to the actor. Mr. H. Farren was infinitely better in Modus than in Charles Surface. The quaintness and humorous repose of the part were capitally conceived.—The performance obtained immense applause. All the principal actors were called for at the end. The Hunchback was repeated last evening with, if possible, greater applause, than on Wednesday. After the Hunchback, on Wednesday, The Romantic Widow was performed, and introduced Mr. Ranger in the same character, the Marquis St. Croix, in which he made his debut eight years since. He was received with great favor.

SURREY.—The Bohemian Girl, with the after entertainments varied, has been played nightly during the week, and on each occasion attracted overflowing houses, several nights hundreds having been turned away from the doors, not being able to obtain admission. Mr. Bunn's campaign promises great things.

PRINCESS'S.—The announcement of Macready and Miss Cushman's conjoined appearance in Macbeth drew a full and curious audience on Monday, the opening night of the winter campaign. It was the first time that these two celebrated artistes had played together in this country. Miss Cushman obtained a great and universal reputation from the moment she played Romeo at the Haymarket. Previous to that her claims to be considered a first-rate artiste were not conceded generally. There were many who argued, not without good grounds of reason, that her intellect was better adapted to melo-dramatic displays than to the loftier exhibition of pure tragedy. Her somewhat masculine conception of character, her want of grace, redundancy of action and frequent striving after effect induced us to coincide with this opinion. It was only when we had seen her in Romeo that we were induced to allow her the possession of the highest capabilities demanded in tragic impersonation. On Monday night her performance of Lady Macbeth threw us back once more upon the conviction that she was unsuited to the loftiest efforts of the histrionic muse. It was a performance unequal and inadequate, and failed to realise to sober judgment the grandeur, power, and intensity of the character she portrayed. Some points she certainly made which were new and striking, but these were opposed by so many errors, inconsistencies, and improprieties, that we arose from the performance thoroughly satisfied that the Lady Macbeth of Shakspeare was out of the pale of Miss Cushman's intellect. When last we beheld the actress in this character we viewed it far more favourably: our change of opinion may be attributed either to a falling off in the artiste's conception, or to the fact that by being placed in contact with Macready her performance was more exposed to critical judgment, her faults and deficiencies being thereby made more manifest. Certainly the contrast, or comparison was anything but favourable to Miss Cushman, and though she obtained great applause, we are convinced the general impression of the performance was that of a comparative failure. The reading of the letter in her first scene gave the audience a foretaste of Miss Cushman's melodramatic conception of Lady Macbeth. It displayed neither taste, nor propriety; and the awful speech that follows was deficient in power and vitality. The banquet scene was good, and at the close, where the guests were dismissed, her looks and attitude of agony were conceived with great truth. Her answer to Macbeth's question, "How goes the night?" simple as the words were in themselves, in their tone and apparent abstraction, convinced us that Miss Cushman has moments when she is swayed by the most admirable judgment. The sleep-walking scene, which we admired so much on a former occasion, displeased us entirely on Monday night. She fell precisely into the same error into which Jenny Lind fell in the sleep-walking scenes in the Sonnambula, viz: illustrating every phrase, or word by a corresponding action. It strikes us that Shakspeare's notion was, that under such influences as pervaded the mind of his heroine one great idea would be paramount, and that however busy, or irrelevant the tongue might be, the absorbing thought of blood upon her hands, would be exhibited by a continued attempt to wash the stains therefrom; and the text, as it appears to us, explains it clearly. In Miss Cushman's variety of action, and essays of illustration, the whole scene lost its unity and its sublimity. Independent of this, the actions and attitudes of the actress were divested of all grace, and this, in no small degree, subtracted from the dignity of the representation. We are bound to admit that Miss Cushman was received throughout her performance with the greatest applause, but this does not alter our conviction one jot. Macready's Macbeth appeared to us grander than ever. It is indeed a most wonderful performance. We need not descant here upon what has occupied our pen so frequently upon former occasions. Mr. Cooper was not equal to Macduff. This actor is entirely deficient in power and pathos. The terrible scene in which Macduff receives information of the slaughter of his wife and children was rendered by Mr. Cooper so tamely that it degenerated into absolute burlesque. Mr. James Vining's Rosse was played with great propriety. A Mr. Conway, from the Edinburgh Theatre, made his first appearance in Malcolm. Having little to record favourable to this gentleman, we shall forbear criticising him on the present occasion, trusting that another opportunity may bring him before us in a better light. The chorus was altogether inefficient. Mr. Bodda was tolerable in Hecate. In the present epoch of stage reformation, in the prevailing reverence for Shakspeare, and the universal feeling gone abroad to give his works to the public in their naked integrity and purity, we are absolutely astounded at the retention of Lock's puny music fitted to words never written by Shakspeare. In reading the written "Macbeth," the mind receives a feeling of awe and horror, when perusing the congregation of fearful items that make up the magical ingredients of the cauldron. But how much is this feeling dissipated and turned into laughter, when in the acted play we find the following line tagged to the end of Shakspeare's awful catalogue:—

"Three ounces of a red-hair'd wench."

Is it possible that Macready, with all his adoration for Shakspeare, could have allowed so filthy and unmeaning a line to have lived by the side of the author's verses? It may be said that the music, being set with these words, required their retention. Most futile reason. Then cut away the music altogether.—

"Three ounces of a red-hair'd wench."

Every component named by the witches to charm the metaphysical agents of evil, is particularised and circumstantiated.

"Eye of newt, and toe of frog,
Wool of bat, and tongue of dog,
Adder's fork, and blind-worm's sting,
Lizard's leg, and owlet's wing.

Scale of dragon, tooth of wolf,
Witch's mummy; maw and gulf
Of the ravin'd salt-sea shark;
Root of hemlock digg'd i' the dark;
Liver of blaspheming Jew;
Gall of goat, and slips of yew
Sliver'd in the moon's eclipse;
Nose of Turk, and Tartar's lips;
Finger of birth-strangled babe,
Ditch deliver'd by a drab, &c., &c."

To this list of horrors, so perfectly in consonance with the hellish operations of the weird sisters, must be added an ingredient so low, vague and meaningless, as to convert the author's seriousness into the hyperbolical absurd. And such is the modern reverence for the works of the great poet. Nor is this all we have to complain of in the acted version of Macbeth. To give place to Lock's music, which occupies a considerable space of time in the performance, several scenes are omitted, and some of the finest speeches in the play expunged. Take that, for instance, when Macbeth seeks the witches in the cavern, and conjures them to answer his questions.—

"Though you untie the winds, and let them fight Against the churches; though the yesty waves
Confound and swallow navigation up;
Though bladed corn be lodged, and trees blown down;
Though castles topple on their warders' heads;
Though palaces and pyramids do slope
Their heads to their foundation, though the treasure
Of Nature's germains tumble all together,
Even till distraction sicken, answer me
To what I ask you."

The words in italics only are spoken; and this is what is called the restoration of Shakespere. Mr. Phelps deserves the lasting gratitude of all lovers of the poet, for being the first to rescue Shakespere from this foul emasculation, and rendering him in his full integrity. The fact is, that Lock's music should be omitted entirely, with the exception of the choruses, "Come away, come away," and "Black spirits and white," which alone the author intended to be sung; and even then, we should demand music something superior to that of the over-lauded Lock. Macbeth, in its modern guise, has too much of a melodramatic show, and all this musical podder tends to detract considerably from its grandeur and sublimity.

On Tuesday evening Miss Cushman played Mrs. Haller in The Stranger. This was an excellent performance, and the actress pleased us as much in it as we disliked her in Lady Macbeth. With the exception of Miss Cushman's Romeo, and perhaps her Meg Merrilies, we have seen her in no part which wins from us so much admiration. Her acting was natural, and extremely touching, and was unmarked by those extra endeavours at making points, which we have found fault with in noticing her Lady Macbeth. Mr. Cooper's Stranger was dolorous, and over-strained. The rest of the characters demand no particular notice. After the play a new afterpiece was produced, under the title of A Romance of the Rhine. It is apparently taken from the French and is tolerably translated. The piece is amusing, and was well acted by the Misses Emma Stanley and Villars, J. Vining and Compton, Compton had a good part, and made it as efficient as it could be made. We are glad to see Miss Villars on the boards of the Princess's. She is a worthy addition to the corps dramatique. The Romance of the Rhine met with the greatest success.

On Wednesday Othello was played with an entirely new cast, if we except Macready in the hero, and J. Vining in Roderigo. Miss Cushman performed Emilia, and Miss Emmeline Montague made her début at this theatre in Desdemona. Macready's Othello never wholly gratified us. It is, to our thinking, an erroneous conception altogether. It appears, however, to be one of the parts in which the great tragedian is most favourably received by the multitude. For the actor's sake we wish we were of the mob. Miss Cushman played Emilia with a degree of fire and earnestness we have never seen surpassed on the stage. The scene in the bed-room, where Emilia taunts Othello, most deservedly drew down thunders of applause. Miss Emmeline Montague in Desdemona produced a most favourable impression. There is a natural grace and gentleness of deportment in this lady that befits her for such parts as Desdemona. We admired Miss Emmeline Montague some years since when she played Juliet at Drury Lane. Since then we have lost sight of her, saving through occasional provincial reports in which she generally obtained high praise. The part of Desdemona does not tax the highest capabilities of an actress, nevertheless there is sufficient in the acting to call for some of the rarest qualifications of a tragic artist. Our verdict is certainly in favour of the débutante, and we do not hesitate to pronounce her a decided HIT. Mr. Cooper's Iago was a powerless performance. We can say so just much for Mr. Conway's Cassio. This gentleman's nasal voice is much against him. He speaks as if he had a cold in his head. He has tact and experience in his business, but he has as yet given no indication of tragic genius. The performance was received with raptures by an over-thronged house, and all the principal actors obtained the usual re-calls.

Romeo and Juliet was produced on Thursday with Miss Cushman and Miss Susan Cushman as the hero and heroine. We have already overstept our limitations, and must postpone our notice of the performance until next week. Macbeth was repeated last evening. The Romance of the Rhine is played nightly.

MANCHESTER.—HARGREAVES' CHORAL SOCIETY.—The sixth annual meeting of this society was held at the Albion Hotel, Piccadilly, Manchester, on Thursday evening, John Owen, Esq., (one of the executors of Mr. Hargreaves) in the chair. The report of the committee was read by the honorary secretary. The treasurer then read the financial statement, from which it appeared that the total receipts (including £50 19s. 5d. from the Hargreaves bequest) were £1,488 10s. 8d. The expenditure amounted to £1,481 0s. 8d., the principal items being: musical fees, £1,023 5s.; purchase and hire of music £79 7s. 6d.; printing and advertising, £76 19s. 6d.; rent, £125 14s.; leaving a balance in the bank of £7 10s. The usual routine of resolutions having been passed, a conversation took place upon the importance of a more strict enforcement of the regulation respecting the admission of non-subscribers; and a resolution was passed unanimously to the effect that "the committee be instructed to enforce a more strict observance of the regulation respecting the admission of non-subscribers, by a more careful examination of the tickets on entering, to see that they are correctly filled up, according to the instructions printed thereon,—by requesting the instant retirement from the Concert Room of all parties found there in violation of the regulation,—and by adopting such other measures as they may deem necessary; and this meeting pledges itself, on behalf of the subscribers at large, to co-operate to the utmost with the committee in carrying out the proposed arrangements." It was announced that the committee intended to commence their seventh season on the 28th of October with the oratorio of "Elijah," which was received with so much approval when performed in April last. Herr Staudigl would have been engaged for the part of the prophet, but his continental engagement would not allow of his presence in England at the time. Miss Birch had also been written to, but her engagement at the French Opera, would detain her in Paris. In consequence the Misses Williams have been engaged in the place of Miss Birch, and Miss Doty and Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips are to resume their former parts in the oratorio.—Manchester Courier.

THE SONGS OF SCOTLAND, ENGLAND, AND IRELAND.—A musical treat of a rare character was afforded to a Croydon audience, on Monday last, in the selection of Song, Duets, &c., given by Mr. H. Phillips and Mr. Land. These gentlemen have united their talents for the purpose of giving a series of vocal entertainments, with, occasionally, an instrumental performance, and judging from the enthusiastic manner in which their efforts were received they will doubtless have a most prosperous career. Both gentlemen were warmly greeted on their entrance, when Mr. Phillips addressed the audience by saying that on the present occasion he felt unusual gratification in appearing associated with Mr. Land, whose talents as a pianist whilst connected with Mr. Wilson had been universally acknowledged and appreciated; he was unwilling to allude further to Mr. Land's merits in that gentleman's presence and would merely add that his vocal abilities had too long been suffered to lie dormant: in conclusion he ventured to hope by their combined efforts to be enabled to present music of a higher class than had hitherto been attempted at similar entertainments. Mr. Phillips, in the delivery of the remarks and anecdotes introducing each song, and in his address, was frequently applauded. Mr. Land, in his first song, abundantly proved how equally he is at home either as a singer or an accompanist; he possesses a well-trained tenor voice, singularly sweet and full in its upper register and capable of deep expression; he sang the morceaux allotted to him in a style that literally took the audience by surprise. His rendering of "Auld Robin Gray" was chaste and pathetic in the extreme: equal praise, too, must be awarded to "My bonnie Mary," and "The Lass of Gowrie," both of which were deservedly encored. In the duet from Donizetti's Belisario with Mr. Phillips he was no less happy in the florid Italian school: it was highly applauded. Mr. Phillips was in fine voice, and gave Calcott's scene, "The Last Man," in his usual manner, proving himself the only man that can do it justice. He was encored in a beautiful MS. song "Mine be a cot," taken from Rogers' Poems, also in Tom Moore's capital song "To ladies' eyes," and "The Bear Hunt." His chaste style of singing Dibdin's song "The Lads of the Village," afforded great delight to the lovers of English Melody. It may truly be said that "honours were divided" between the gentlemen, and the pleasure of their audience doubled by their auspicious co-operation. We consider this a union of great advantage to the public as a means of diffusing music of a certain character throughout the three kingdoms. A hearty burst of applause took up the closing strains of this decided musical treat which we venture to prophecy will be loudly echoed wherever it is given.—Surrey and Sussex Standard.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS.—OPERA.—The chief features at the Academy during the week past has been the reprise of the Muette de Portici, and the debut of Poulitier in Masaniello, after an absence of several years from the Opera. The engagement of Mademoiselle Alboni is spoken of as a certainty. This announcement has created a great sensation in musical circles. It is said she will make her debut at the latter end of the present month. Cerito and St. Leon will appear in a new ballet, written expressly for them, with music by Pugni, about the same time. Verdi's opera is in rapid progress. The third act has been rehearsed.

—THEATRE-ITALIEN opened on Saturday with Il Don Giovanni. Grisi, Persiani, Corbari, Lablache, Mario, Tagliafco, and Polonini were the chief executants. All were excellent, except Coletti, whose Don was very indifferent. A great concourse of visitors attended.

—TAMBURINI is in Paris, having arrived some days since. He would have departed last week for St. Petersburg, but for the sudden indisposition of his son.

—ROGER, the celebrated tenor of the Opera Comique, intends to set out for Italy after the expiration of his present engagement.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

"Emigrant's Farewell;" Ballad. Composed by N. J. SPORLE.—B. WILLIAMS, Cheapside.

MR. SPORLE's ballads are remarkable, in most instances, for a certain felicity of tune, which is sure to have captivations for lovers of simple song. The ballad before us has that degree of merit that appertains to the best compositions of the author. It is written in A, three sharps, and requires a voice of moderate compass to sing it, extending from E on the first line to E in the fourth space. The song will be found useful in indoctrinating beginners.

"Cathedral and Church Chants." Composed by JOHN HENRY MACFARLANE, Organist.—CHARLES JEFFERY'S.

THIS is part first of a work with the above title. It contains seventeen double, and eight single chants. They appear to have been indited by one thoroughly conversant with compositions of this class, and well versed in arranging for voices. The title-page is splendid, being printed in gold and illuminated colors.

AN EPISODE IN THE LIFE OF SEBASTIAN BACH.

(Translated from the "France Musicale.")

SEBASTIAN BACH was indisputably one of the most splendid geniuses which Europe produced at an epoch so remarkable for the reproduction of letters and the fine arts. Sebastian Bach played a character in Germany, analogous to that which Palestrina played in Italy; he contributed powerfully to the regeneration of music. By his original and vigorous compositions, and by his didactic works, he opened a novel and unexplored road-way to art.

In the retreat, where he had made his abode, the illustrious composer was visited by persons of the highest rank and consideration. Nevertheless, in the midst of all the homage which was rendered to him, Sebastian lived after a fashion the most simple and patriarchal. Luxury was banished from his establishment; order and propriety reigned his household gods; and a wife, who was truly a model for woman-kind, directed all as the presiding genius.

Sebastian had but an only daughter in the wedded state, a charming girl, full of intelligence and candour. He gave her the name of Cecilia, after the patroness of music, and lived in hope that she would resemble, by her virtues and her talents, her illustrious homonym.

We have said that Sebastian Bach was accustomed to receive frequent visits from those who revered art. The Baron de Norberg, a young man distinguished by his wit and by the good qualities of his heart, was one of those who mostly frequented his house. Springing from a noble family, the youthful baron enjoyed a high position and an independent fortune. In addition, he possessed, in an extreme degree, a love for the arts. He was a distinguished musical amateur. He used to pass hour after hour in the society of Sebastian Bach, and the master loved to converse with the young nobleman, and at last conceived for him a very lively affection. One day it happened that Sebastian was in the gallery, where he used to work during the warm days of summer, when the Baron suddenly entering, approached him, clothed as for a ceremonial visit, and before he had time to salute him, demanded of him his daughter's hand in marriage. At this unexpected offer, the illustrious master rose, lifted his hat from his head, and said, after a moment's reflection: "My dear Baron, I cannot be otherwise than highly flattered at the demand you have made to me; but I must add, nevertheless, that it is impossible to accept of the honor you wished to confer upon me." "How is that?" inquired the baron confounded. "Hear me, my dear friend! I am sometimes odd, and act on occasions like one distracted. Very well, it is my humor. I have taken it into my head not to give my daughter in marriage even to the most illustrious man, unless he cultivate that art to which I have devoted my whole existence." "But consider" "Nothing on earth," interrupted Sebastian, "can alter my resolution in this respect. However, although it is impossible that you can become my son-in-law, I hope that will not hinder us from being as good friends as ever; but it is necessary that not the least word should transpire to my wife, still less to my daughter; and let you and me avoid all allusion to the matter from this time forward. It also appears requisite to me that your visits, however agreeable they may be to us all, should become less frequent, if, indeed, they should not cease altogether." The baron de Norberg retired astonished and confounded. He had assured himself of the mother's consent; and had received from the daughter's lips a confirmation that she would present no very great obstacle to his desires. He had never entertained a thought that he would have met with opposition from the father. The refusal, therefore, seemed to him more cruel as it was unexpected. He was overwhelmed and afflicted. After a moment's hesitation, he hastened to the mother and daughter, who awaited with anxiety the result of his mission. He related to them the reception he had met with. Sebastian's wife ran instantly to find her husband. She complained bitterly of the caprice that had carried him so far as to refuse so excellent an alliance for her dear Cecilia. The baron was rich, of high birth, and had great merits. What did he want more? Why refuse advantages so superior to what he expected? Such obstinacy was truly inconceivable. These arguments were enforced with as much force, as much heat, and as much eloquence as maternal tenderness and anxiety could inspire. But Sebastian was impregnable, and his wife, convinced that it was impossible to overcome his resolve, returned to the Baron de Norberg and her daughter, and related the ill-success of her enterprise. "My dear child," she added in conclusion, "you know that your father is the best of men; but his humor, however strange, we are bound to submit to. I know him long and well. It is absolutely necessary that his son-in-law should be a musician. When an idea once enters into his head, it is impossible to drive it away."

The Baron took leave of the mother and daughter; but before separating from Cecilia, he said to her: "I depart from you, because I cannot, at this moment, make or imagine any new attempt which could wear an aspect of success. Only I conjure you, do not banish me from your memory. I hope, some years hence to come back to you, and flatter myself, I shall then obtain the consent of your father." The Baron de Norberg departed without explaining himself farther. But a close observer might have remarked that a sudden change had taken place in his looks. The sadness and despondence, that had darkened his countenance had entirely disappeared. His voice was firm: his eye bright: his look assured. It was not difficult to see that he had conceived some sudden resolution, and felt that he had power to accomplish it.

Soon after the interview the Baron de Norberg quitted Germany. Four years rolled on, and still he returned not. During this long period, he wrote frequently to Sebastian and his family. His letters dated from Paris, London, Rome, Naples, or Florence, breathed the greatest enthusiasm for art. He related in these epistles, in a highly imaginative style, the impressions of his voyage, and spoke with admiration of all the great musicians he had seen, and all the grand works, the performance of which had filled him with wonder and delight.

It was at that moment an era of regeneration for Europe. Italy was at the head of that intellectual progress, and of that artistic movement which signalized the sixteenth century. The lyric drama, the splendour of which had disappeared in the chaos of the middle ages, had been resuscitated under the genius of Scarlatti. The elements of a new art were in a state of fusion. The burning and enthusiastic soul of the Baron was impressed in a lively manner by this spectacle, and his emotions betrayed themselves in a remarkable degree in his correspondence with his friends. His letters were replete with sparkling eloquence, information conveyed in an original and fanciful manner, and all that passed in the artistic world was analysed by ingenious and witty commentaries. Often in the midst of his interesting peregrinations, and his musical studies, the Baron would reiterate with all his poetical feeling the sentiments he had avowed for the charming Cecilia. Each of his letters was followed by a postscript, in which he renewed, in a respectful, and at the same time, a tender manner, the assurance of his unalterable attachment.

The correspondence of the Baron, however, after some time, grew less frequent, and at length ceased entirely. Sebastian Bach and his wife did not know how to interpret this silence. Cecilia was grievously afflicted.

One day that Sebastian had gone to Bonn on some business, his wife and daughter were seated in the large gallery which generally served for the studio of the composer. Cecilia was trying some new music on her harpsichord. Her light fingers were skimming over the keys, when the sound of footsteps made her pause, and turning round, she beheld—Judge with how much surprise—the Baron de Norberg. "Mademoiselle," said he "it is four years since I bade you farewell. I promised to return when circumstances would permit me, and I conjured you not to banish me from your recollection. It appeared to me then that I had it in my power, on some far future day, by dint of study and perseverance, to fulfil the condition that your father required as indispensable in a son-in-law. I put myself immediately to work. That art, which I only cultivated for pastime as an amateur, became, thenceforward the object of my constant studies; and love effected what neither fame, glory, nor the desire of popularity could effect. I have become a musician. Italy already knows my name and my works. Doubtless, there are many artistes more illustrious, and more deserving than I am; but your father will judge of my weak talents with indulgence, and render me credit for all my efforts—and now permit me, charming Cecilia, to make you judge of my progress," added the Baron smiling. He sat down and executed a suite de melodies of his own composition, written in an original form and character. In this work he retraced the emotions of his adventurous life, his visions of love and poesy, his aspirations towards goodness, his tortures in exile, his joy at his returning to his country, and the places made happy by the light of his dear heart's countenance. The style of the composition modified itself according to the different situations, and the songs, by turns lively and light, plaintive and melancholy, full of passion and tenderness, translated every varied impression of his soul.

Such was the work of the Baron de Norberg. In his case the merit of the executant equalled the talent of the composer. Cecilia and her mother listened with astonishment, with enthusiasm. But whilst they were spell-bound under the enchantment of this music and of this performance, they had not noticed a new auditor, who had glided imperceptibly into the room. It was Sebastian. The illustrious composer was himself seized with astonishment and admiration. He endeavoured awhile to suppress the beatings of his heart, and to lull the sentiments which agitated him, but in vain. He could contain himself no longer; and throwing himself on the Baron's neck, cried, "No, my friend, I shall make no objection to your marriage. My child is yours. You did not withdraw yourself from her society to obtain her, without undergoing long and painful labors: you have given an amiable and incontestable proof of your attachment. Here me, my friend: When I told you that I wished a musician for my son-in-law, that must have appeared strange to you. Do not pre-judge me, however, as a capricious man, or one half-déranged. What I desired above all things was, that he who would become the husband of my beloved daughter, should embrace a profession, a career in which he would obtain an assured independence. The most splendid fortunes are liable to sudden loss, especially in these times of agitation and civil troubles. Who can foresee the ills that to-morrow may have in store for us? But talent and merit are solid advantages, which no outward disaster can take from us. These principles, based on a long experience, dictated my conduct towards you, when four years since you demanded from me the hand of my daughter. I said to myself, "Mons. le Baron has good dispositions for music. He is young: has time to labour. Let us turn these faculties in a happy direction: let us trace for him the route which he ought to take, and if he love Cecilia, he will know how to triumph over every obstacle, and regain for himself a rank in the artistic world." This, my friend, is what I then said. I could not explain all that clearly and precisely. Judge of my joy when I found you had devised my intentions. Cecilia, Norberg, my dear children . . . I bless you."

The marriage of Cecilia and the Baron de Norberg took place a few days afterwards. It was celebrated with a noble simplicity. The principal vocal societies of Germany assisted at the nuptial feast. Sebastian exhibited foresight in exacting that his son-in-law should possess a profession. De Norberg was soon able to convince himself of his father-in-law's acuteness of judgment. In consequence of the wars which desolated Germany he was deprived of all his fortune. He supported this loss with resignation, and found in the exercise of his art pleasures surpassing those of goods and chattels,

MISCELLANEOUS.

DRURY-LANE.—Mr. Jullien's Promenade Concerts commenced last night. We have but little space left to describe the splendid appearance of the house under its new aspect, the huge crowd that attended, the performances given, or the immense encores demanded by the enthusiastic audience. It is enough to say, in this hurried notice, that the theatre was universally admired for the novelty and extreme beauty of its decorations, and that the orchestra gratified the most fastidious lover of instrumental music. The vocal essays were entrusted to Miss Dolby, who was greeted on her entrance with the heartiest applause, and obtained a unanimous encore in two songs. In consequence of our going to press early we must defer particulars till next week. It would hardly be fair in a hasty article like this, to comment on the many splendours of the new decorations, the completeness of the band, or to attempt to describe, in few words, the excitement of the vast crowd assembled. In our next number we shall give full and true particulars of the new theatre, and the performances of the week.

HERB STAUDIGL has left London for Vienna. It is uncertain whether he will be able to obtain leave of absence from the Imperial Chapel during the winter, so as to enable him to accept an engagement from M. Jullien for Drury-Lane.

MR. HENRY RUSSELL is giving his vocal entertainments with much success in the provinces, having visited during the months of August and September, Chertsey, Farnham, Winchester, Salisbury, Portsmouth, Chichester, Arundel, Worthing, Hastings, Norwich, Yarmouth, Ipswich, Windsor, Reading, Newbury, Northampton, Coventry, Leamington, Stratford-upon-Avon; and during the month of October the vocalist will pursue his flight to Warwick, Wolverhampton, Shrewsbury, Wellington, St. Helen's, Derby, Nottingham, Chesterfield, Huddersfield, Halifax, Blackburn, Carlisle, Preston, &c.

THE NEW DECORATIONS OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE are simple, although exceedingly effective. The ground of the whole is a faint blossom colour, approaching a white, and the ornaments, which are all appliqué, are gilt. The fronts of all the boxes are laced with a trellis of large mash, formed of an enriched moulding, gilt, and upon this festoons of detached flowers, very nicely modelled, and also gilt, are suspended. On the dress boxes the festoons are looped through wreaths; on the next tier, tied with a gilt riband, and on the front of the third tier the festoon consists of riband only. The fluted Corinthian columns which form the proscenium, two on each side, have their caps and bases gilt, and the flutes entwined by a continuous wreath of flowers, gilt, as have also the small columns which support the boxes throughout the house. The whole of the ornaments, fruit and flower work, are of papier mâché—the ornamental moulding which forms the trellis being of a new patent machine-made kind, and were made, gilt and fixed in five weeks by Mr. Bielefeld. The ceiling is painted to represent the sky seen from a roofless building, and much ingenuity is exhibited in the endeavour. A continuation of the trellis work, rising from the walls, forms an inclosure around the lower part of the circle; and the central glass chandelier, a new one, is made to represent, by masses of drops, six flags, with lines of the union-jack marked on each of them by light. It is kept close up to the ceiling, and is seen to be held by six flying cupids. For colour, entire dependence is placed on the draperies, in respect of which Mr. Frederick Gye has taken a bold step. Acting probably on the proverbial partiality of the fairer portion of the British public for a red coat, he has adopted nothing more nor less for his draperies than bright scarlet cloth with yellow edging, which must produce a brilliant effect. The boxes are lined with a yellow patterned paper on a crimson ground. The "family boxes" have been cleared away, so as to form an inclosed area for standing spectators.—The Builder.

SIGNOR COSTA has been unanimously elected a member of the Royal Society of Musicians. Charles Knyvett is the senior member of the institution, having been elected in the year 1784. François Cramer was elected the same year, but two months later than Knyvett.

R. B. PEAKE, the celebrated dramatist, died suddenly on Monday last, at his residence near Queen's Elms, aged 55.—Mr. P. was the author of several highly popular plays, melodramas, and farces, among which we may specify Amateurs and Actors, The Duel, Jonathan in England, Before Breakfast, £100 Note, Haunted Inn, Comfortable Lodgings, Bottle Imp, Master's Rival, Climbing Boy, Evil Eye, Blanche of Jersey, H. B., Middle Temple, Uncle Rip, Miner's Well, Three Wives of Madrid, Sheriff of the County, False Mr. Pope, Colombia, Title Deeds, &c. Mr. Peake has left a large family quite unprovided for. He accumulated some money by his dramatic writings, but lost it all, we understand, by an unprofitable speculation in the Lyceum—that most infelicitous of theatres. A subscription is about to be set on foot, which, we trust, will realise something handsome for the family.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—A second trial of new works by members of this society took place at Erat's Harp Saloon on Tuesday last. Among the instrumental compositions brought forward, we may select the following as deserving considerable approbation:—A Trio, in B minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, and a Sonata, in G, for piano and violoncello, by Charles Horsley (both musicianly works); a Sonata, in E, for violin and piano by Kate Loder (a pleasing specimen of this fair composer's talent); a Trio, in C sharp minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Walter C. Macfarren (an exceedingly clever composition); and a Sonata, for the pianoforte, by Haite. Several vocal compositions, by Kate Loder, H. C. Banister, James Calkin, and James Coward, were also tried, and deserved the applause they obtained.

JENNY LIND'S GENEROSITY.—We have been informed that one of the performances at Bristol was generously given by Madlle. Lind for the benefit of Mrs. Macready, and that the proceeds of this munificent act of the Swedish vocalist amounted to nearly 1900*l.*—Gloucester Journal.

DR. ESSEX.—This well known musician died last week, aged 83.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator: "Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

JULES SCHULHOFF'S CONCERT.

"M. Jules Schulhoff gave a concert on the 28th instant in the Hanover Square Rooms, before a vast concourse of amateurs and professors. The first piece essayed by M. Schulhoff was the Allegro from a Sonata dedicated to Chopin. The style of this composition is ambitious. The ideas are good, although the development is somewhat discursive, and the elaboration redundant. The next piece was of a wholly different kind. A "Caprice sur des airs Nationaux Bohémiens." The passages are very elegant, and there is a nice feeling for harmony and modulation, which, though sparingly developed, manifests itself most agreeably. A "Nocturne in A flat," (op. xi.) followed by an "Etude de Concert," (op. lii.) are deserving of still higher commendation. The Nocturne is expressive and graceful, and in its colouring occasionally reminds us of Chopin, although it has less vagueness of outline and less wildness of modulation than the majority of the effusions of the famous Polish pianist. The "Etude de Concert," a vigorous theme, developed with continuous power, is a composition of extreme difficulty. M. Schulhoff, however, executed it with consummate facility and grace, and the encore he forced from the whole room did not by any means surprise us. The last exhibition of M. Schulhoff's powers was devoted to a melody, without words, called "Le Zephyr." It is a gem of its kind, tuneful, harmonious, and graceful, and will in all probability find its way to the pianoforte of every amateur and professor in the united kingdom. On the whole, M. Schulhoff may be said to have achieved a triumph at his concert, both as a pianist and as a composer, and to have established his name in this country as one of the ruling spirits of his particular department in art. The concert was varied by other instrumental performances. The talented brothers, Helmesberger, played the Adagio and Rondo from Spohr's "Second Concertante," op. 88 (for two violins), with admirable precision and the most refined taste. M. Oberthur also gained distinction by a clever performance on the harp, of his "Souvenir de Londres," which he has appropriately dedicated to Parish Alvars. The Misses Williams were encored in Keller's pretty duo, "Spring is long since o'er," which they sang very nicely. Miss Bassano, in a lied by Proch, "Ah! mother dear," was graceful and unpretending. Kucken's pretty lied, "Thy name I whisper," and Weber's "Fair being! lovely as the Heavens," were both chastely rendered by Mr. Bodda, and his voice was favourably displayed in a simple lied by Krebs, "Loving, I think of thee." Macfarren's fine air, "Tintendo ingrata," one of the most beautiful of his vocal compositions, was sung with infinite passion and the truest expression by Madame G. A. Macfarren."—Musical World, No. 23.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.

MY DEAR RYAN,—Tuesday, October 12—The star of your favorite Alboni has shone with even brighter lustre here, in "the City of the Arts," than in London, the "City of Commerce." At eight o'clock on Saturday night, the Opera was filled from top to bottom, with an audience composed of the élite of Parisian rank, fashion, literature, and art. To describe the excitement that prevailed is altogether out of my power. Expectation was on tiptoe, and a breathless silence governed the whole of the vast multitude, as the heroine of the evening stepped quickly before the foot-lights, with that mingled look of composure and modesty which constitutes so great a charm in her deportment. She was received with a shout of applause that shook the roof of the building for about half-a-dozen seconds, and then died away into silence profounder than before. Every man, woman, and child among the audience was, in the words of Keats,

"As quiet as a stone."

People feared to breathe, so intense was the anxiety to hear that voice which had instantaneously sung itself into fame at the Royal Italian Opera. You may imagine that I was not less anxious than the rest; and I can assure you I trembled for the result. Not only was it the personal interest I felt in the amiable debutante that roused me into an unusual state of excitement, but I felt that the honour of English criticism, the judgment of the English public, which had been first to proclaim Alboni great, was here at stake. We should either be laughed at, as "gulls," or respected, as connoisseurs. On Alboni depended our reputation as a musical nation. This is no exaggeration of what I felt at the moment, although it might be termed an exaggeration of the sober truth; for music does not altogether depend upon singers for its manifestation; nor is Italian opera the loftiest order of dramatic music. The question was soon decided, however. Scarcely had Alboni opened her lips, than the whole crowd was in an uproar. A few notes uttered, with seeming unconcern, by the young singer, conquered the hearts and convinced the judgments of the French public; guaranteed the soundness of English taste; and established her own right to be placed among the great artistes of the world. It was the quickest triumph I ever witnessed, the easiest won, the most thoroughly maintained, and one of the most dazzling and incontestable.

I shall not trouble you with a dry heap of details about what you have so often described yourself much more eloquently than lies in my poor means. Suffice it, Alboni sang a cavatina from Semiramide; a duet from the same (with Alizard); an air from L'Italiana in Algieri; and the duet,

"Dunque io son," from Il Barbiere (with Barhoillet), in her best manner; was encored, or recalled, after every piece; and after each successive performance, made faster her hold on public opinion.

On Monday the press, in language of glowing eulogy, echoed the voice of the public, and the feuilletons of some of the celebrated critics went to such lengths of adulation, that had not the public been there to judge, the public would have put them down for ebullitions of "wood men." In the evening, the same crowd, the same enthusiasm, the same triumph attended the second performance of the new comer. The programme was enriched by the bacchanalian, "Brindisi," from Lucrezia Borgia, which created a tumult literally out of pale of description. In other respects it was the same. To-day the press again teems with feuilletons in honour of the great contralto, who has been persuaded to sing on one more occasion, which is fixed for to-morrow night. Although there is no change in the programme, every place is already taken, and the crowd will be immense. I have purchased the Journal des Debats, Constitutionnel, Presse, and Commerce, and shall transmit you some extracts from the articles of Berlioz, Fiorentino, Theophile Gautier, and Scudo, which will no doubt prove interesting to the admirers of Alboni among your readers. By the way, do not forget the admirers of Alboni from the number, and how many of them would you have left? MM. Duponchel and Roques are the lucky men; Fortune lavishes her favors upon them, and fills their coffers to overflowing. It remains to be seen whether the successes of Cerito and our clever countrywoman, Miss Birch, and the engagement of Alboni, to appear on the Opera boards, as an actress as well as a singer, in the month of January next, will put the seal upon their already unexampled good luck.

Wednesday October 13.—It is now four o'clock, and the post leaves at five; I must therefore content myself, and you must be contented, with a few hurried lines, as appendix to my dispatch of yesterday.

To-night is the third and last appearance of Alboni. I saw her this morning at her hotel, on the Boulevard des Italiens. She was reading the Feuilletons of Berlioz and Fiorentino, with a sort of childish delight. She seems perfectly unconscious of being, which she absolutely is, at the present moment, the theme of conversation for all Paris. She asked me, in the most unaffected tone of sincerity, whether she had sung "assez bien," on Monday night, my answer, "très bien pour une petite fille," seemed to amuse her exceedingly. Alboni is assuredly, for a great artiste, the most unpretending and simple creature in the world. She has not the slightest notion of her position in her art, and in the eyes of the public and the musical world. She leaves Paris at the end of the week, for Pesth, where she has promised to appear at the Theatre Italien. (At ~~Paris~~ there is a Theatre Italien, a Theatre Français, and in short everything but a Theatre Allemand! so national are the Hungarians!) Alboni has no written engagement; but having given her word—her accustomed mode of proceeding—she undertakes all risks, and thinks nothing of an expense of some five or six thousand francs, which she must inevitably disburse in travelling there and back and remaining for a month, in an affair which concerns her parole. In a month she is expected back to Paris, when, it is positively stated, she will appear upon the Opera stage, in L'Italiana in Algeri, Robert Bruce, Otello, La Favorite, &c. &c. Let us hope, for the sake of the Parisians, that this expectation, which I have from first-rate authority, may be fulfilled.

The success of Alboni has, it is said, driven M. Vatel furious. I hear that, by the advice of Lablache, he did not engage her for the Italiens, although he might have had her upon reasonable terms. You cannot imagine, my dear Ryan, anything more pitoyable than the Italian Opera here. You know my adoration for Don Giovanni (which has not been diminished since I have been lately reading Mr. Holmes' very entertaining memoir of Mozart)—you know that I regard it as the chef-d'œuvre of the human mind; nevertheless, I can assure you, it was played in such a manner at the Italiens, here, that it gave me positive pain to listen to it. The orchestra is very little better than what we have been used to at Drury Lane Theatre, and every year M. Vatel improves it by dismissing three or four of his violins; so that it is as much as M. Tilmant—a very excellent conductor, who for many years was the vice of Habeneck at the conservatoire—can do to make the accompaniments go, without coming to a stand still.

The chorus is equally mediocre, and the mise en scene would disgrace a barn. Although Grisi was as fine as ever—although Mario sang “Il mio tesoro” like an angel—although Persiani adorned Mozart's melodies with an infinity of meretricious ornaments—although Corbari was very modest and very charming—and although Lablache diversified the interest attached to the music of Mozart by an infinity of uncongenial buffooneries*—nothing would do. The opera went off as coldly as though it had been a cold and indifferent work, instead of the most glowing and passionate of inspirations. The Commandant, M. Rache, was detestable; and I sadly missed Tagliafico (who played Masetto), in the last scene. Coletti, for the sake of his well-deserved reputation as a careful and excellent barytone, should never attempt to play Don Giovanni, which is altogether out of his element. He is as heavy as lead, and as stiff as a poker—while his fun is sepulchral. Ronconi, who forms part of the company, who likes to play Don Giovanni, and can play it, in the bargain, ought to have been cast for this, the most important part in the opera—except Leporello, when he is devouring the maccheroni, and otherwise spoiling the effect of the last finale.

Madame Castellan's debut in Lucia was highly successful. I never heard her sing so charmingly, and the Parisians are quite in love with her. I was much pleased at this result, for there are few artistes at once more deserving and unassuming than Madame Castellan. Mario's Edgar was capital; his last scene was quite equal to anything I ever heard effected by Rubini in the same part. Ronconi has only played twice yet—both times in Lucia; talking of which, by the way, news has been received of the safe arrival of poor Donizetti, at Bergamo, his native place. He was expected to pass through Milan, on his route, and a serenade was prepared for the occasion, to be executed under the window of the apartment it was thought he would occupy in the Hotel de —; but, as it happened, he did not touch at Milan at all; or if he did, it was merely en passage.

One of the chiefest delights of Paris, to any one musically inclined, is the Opera Comique. Here you can have a real musical treat:—a good orchestra, good chorus, good principals, and good music. I have heard La Fiancée, one of Auber's early works, revived; L'Eclair, a very dull comic opera by Halévy; the Mousquetaires de la Reine, by far the ablest work of the same composer; La Dame Blanche, the most popular achievement of Boieldieu; and other operas. La Fiancée is certainly one of Auber's very best works. The second act is a masterpiece. It is exceedingly well done, on the whole. Madame Darcier, who plays the fiancée, is a charming actress, and a very excellent singer, albeit occasionally given to exaggeration, both in her acting and singing; and she also lacks power in the concerted music. Mocker is a capital actor, but his voice, a tenor, is weak, and he cannot execute clearly. Bussine, the new bass, I do not like at all; his voice is unpleasant in quality, his singing unfinished, his deportment ungainly, and his acting that of a novice; who does not, however, want for confidence. Audran, another tenor, is an actor of great feeling, and he sometimes sings with great energy and abandon; but he wants finish and certainty of intonation. The orchestra is excellent. The wind instruments were so perfect that I could not but think, with regret, of some of the deficiencies of our London orchestras in this particular. The chorus sang well, and the general ensemble was admirable. In the other three operas I had the opportunity of hearing Roger, who is justly vaunted as the glory of the Opera Comique, and who has quite enough in him to be the glory of the Academie Royale and the Italiens. Roger is not only a great singer, but he is an actor of first-rate talent, excelling equally in serious and comic characters. His performance of the hero in L'Eclair is one of the most pathetic and beautiful things imaginable; it affected me almost to tears. Scarcely less admirable is he in La Dame Blanche. You should hear him sing the fine old melody, “Robin Adair,” which Boieldieu has arranged with such consummate taste; you would be enchanted. Roger quits the Opera Comique in the month of May; how to replace him will puzzle M. Basset, the director, for there is nothing that can approach him at the present moment. After a short tour in Italy, Roger will pay London a second visit, when I trust you will have more frequent occasion of judging of his admirable and varied talents than you had last year. By the way, Mr. Mitchell, the spirited lessee of the Theatre in St. James's, has been here some days, making arrangements for the forthcoming season. He entertains some idea of an Opera Comique to begin the season, and has already, I believe, made several engagements. It would be a coupe de maître (nothing new to Mr. Mitchell) if he could manage to persuade M. Basset to grant Roger a congé of two or three months; but I fear this is impossible, since the excellent tenor is already studying new parts in the forthcoming operas of Reber (from which, judging from his instrumental music, I expect great things) and Auber. With his part in the latter Roger is enchanted.

Balfe is hard at work on two operas; one for Jullien, which is nearly finished, and will, I think, somewhat astonish you; and one for the Opera Comique, for which M. St. George has supplied the libretto. He has also been offered a book for the Academie Royale; but with all his rapidity it is impossible Balfe can compose three operas in four months (the duration of his sojourn here); only Mozart could effect such miracles. You are aware, I presume, that Balfe has renewed his engagement with Mr. Lumley for Her Majesty's Theatre.

* I have sent you an admirable article of Fiorentino, in the Constitutionnel, in which the writer has the courage to speak the truth about the error of the greatest of buffos.

Cerito's debut, owing to the success of Alboni, is postponed till Monday. The rehearsal of the new ballet took place yesterday; the music of Pagni seemed to please everybody, and although Cerito did not dance her part, she indicated enough to raise the highest expectations. Miss Birch's debut is not yet definitely fixed, but cannot fail to take place soon.

On Friday Theophile Gautier's delicious ballet of Giselle, with the charming music of Adolphe Adam, was performed at the Opera, after Lucie. Carlotta Grisi, in Giselle, was divine. I never saw her dance with more grace and legereté, act with more truth and feeling. Giselle is Carlotta's own creation, and will always remain one of her favorite parts. But bear in mind that Giselle at the Academie is a very different thing from the fragment you have been accustomed to see in London. It is worth coming to Paris to see it: it is a ballet in perfection. But with all its beauty, Giselle without Carlotta would be a triste affair—for Giselle is Carlotta, and Carlotta is Giselle.

I have been to many theatres, and have much more to tell you, but must, as "my hour is come," defer it, with a notice of Alboni's third concert (to-night) until my next. Adieu, meanwhile—Portez vous bien. D.

MUSIC.

(From the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette.)

Music transcends all graphic and verbal poetry. Rightfully, it is universal in its powers and influences; and it is for this reason that various authors have discovered certain analogies between music and painting, or between music and poetry. It is, in reality, analogous to all things. The beautiful and the hideous, the tranquil and the terrible, the harmonious and the discordant, all find musical expression. It surpasses all other modes of utterance; it will be the language of our spiritual futurity.

We have an enthusiasm for music. Not that we are, like the all-accomplished Dangle, "a decided critic in music as well as in literature;" not that we pretend to the authoritative position of connoisseurship, pronouncing musical decisions ex cathedra. There is nothing in the world so ridiculous as to see an amateur, possessed of mere rudimental knowledge, whose memory is stored with a quantity of useless technical jargon, picked up at concerts and operas, becoming a leader of opinion, simply by the influence of his solemnity and dogmatism. Such men, be assured, are as empty as they are vain; if there be any music in their souls, it is the mindless jingle of puerility.

A great musician is the greatest of poets. All true poets have within them the musical spirit, though mere manual and vocal skill may be wanting.

"Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard Are sweeter."

Death, which strips us of all worldly power and possession, will also divest our minds of their temporal acquirements; the skill, the science, the learning of humanity, are mortal as humanity itself. But genius was born with its inspired possessor, and will be eternal as its glorious giver. Genius, which could ever interpret the music of earth, will hereafter intelligently quaff the liquid language of Heaven. Pœta nascitur. The man who communes with those musical utterances that are inaudible to common ears, knows far more of our lofty theme than the most dexterous of modern triflers on the piano.

The prevalence of musical empiricism in these days is the consequence and the cause of the absence of all love for the "concord of its sweet sounds." Earth's music has fled. Noise is better beloved; the uproar of a monster band delights the populace amazingly. It was not so, even in this matter-of-fact country of England, two centuries ago. Charles Knight, who is one of the few lovers of antique speculation and inquiry who are not mere pedantic husks, says that then—"The people were the heirs of poetry as well as of music. They had their own delicious madrigals to sing, in which music was 'married to immortal verse,'—and they could sing them."

Does not this disgrace us! Our "minstrelsy is a matter of sixpences!" Who shall presume to number those who, born with musical imaginations, are paralysed altogether because their sphere of life is musicless? Both Mozart's and Milton's have been mute and inglorious; and thus coming generations lose by the fault of the now existent race of men.

But let us consider the analogies of music to other arts and influences. First, as fit preparative, we would seek some perfect solitude, listening for those "unheard melodies;" and feeling all the ecstasies of inspiration as our spirit drinks in wave on wave of musical—but noiseless—delight. Whence do distil these winged glories? Is it the music of the spheres? Are there voices in those filmy clouds? Yes, to the enlightened, world-forgetting heart, these beauties of the universe are all resonant with the song of Divine love.

"That strain again;—it had a dying fall;
Oh! it came o'er my ear like the sweet south,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing, and giving odour."

Can anything more perfectly and pregnantly express, than do these words of Shakspeare, the analogy between nature and music? The loving Orsino heard, in the utterance of those delicious lutes, the sighing of the southern breeze over violet banks. To him, music was then the food of love. He was far in the perfume-breathing recesses of some fairy Elysium, "discoursing most eloquent music" to the worshipped Olivia.

But Byron has also shewn us the analogy between music and the intelligent beauty of the human countenance. In one line, which some of the sapient critics quarrelled with, being unable to understand it, he has described the greatest possible height of female beauty.

"The mind, the music breathing from her face."

Have you not, O observant reader, most frequently noted faces of surpassing regularity and beauty, yet very insipid notwithstanding all, on account of their stillness, their tame placidity? Have you not, on the other hand, been charmed with a strange surprise, as some not uncommon countenance flashed into sudden beauty by the advent of a single smile? If not, we give you no credit for the proper exercise of your perceptive faculties.

Very beautiful is the analogy between painting and the "divine art." Looking on a landscape of Claude's, your spirit's ear will be saluted with a tranquil and mystic melody, such as "The daughters three Sang around the golden tree."

We have gazed on the Madonnas and her mighty Infant, until fancy has given us to hear the whispered songs of the ever-accompanying angels, and even the remote hosannahs of the jubilant choirs of heaven.

Years ago when there was life among the magazine-writers, we remember a beautiful conversation in Blackwood, on Keepsakes—on cherished memorials of deceased friendship or love. Christopher North declares his predilection for a lock of hair—"a soft, smooth, burnt, golden and glorious fragment of the apparelling, that once hung in clouds and sunshine over an angel's brow!" They talk of portraits—which should be exact and inspired resemblances,—and thus does the Ettrick shepherd speak thereon:—"There's aye something wrang, either about the mouth, or the een, or the nose—or what's warst o' a', you canna fin' faute wi' ony o' the features for no being like, and yet the painter, frae no kennin the delightfu' character o' her or him that was sittin' till him, leaves out o' the face the entire speerit—or, aiblins, that the portrait may na' be deficient in expression, he pits in a sharp, clever look, like that o' a blue stocking, into soft, dewy, divine een, swimming with sowle! or spoils the mouth a'thegither by puckerin' up at the corners; sa that a' the innocent smiles, mantlin' there like kisses, tak' flight frae sic prim lips, cherry-ripe though they be!" "And for this," says he, finally, "which he ca's a portrait, and proposes sendin' to the Exhibition, he has the conscience to charge you—withouten the frame—the reasonable soom o' a hundred pounds sterling!"

Most truly, it is so. You have a fine picture, but it is not your departed friend. It is valueless as a representation and unpleasing as a memento. But better than aught that can wake reminiscences of one whom death has taken,—better than a ringlet, or a portrait, or a ring, or a choice book of poems,—is a single strain of music; an old song, perhaps, very simple and beautiful, which you have a thousand times sung together. It is as the voice of the dead, speaking familiar phrases. It brings the presence of the loved one, perfect and vivid, before the mental eye. It verily rolls back the stream of life, and you are side by side with that dearest friend, of whom otherwise there was but a chill remembrance. It is no gross, tangible, commonplace, material relic,—a thing to be kept in the waistcoat-pocket, or hung against the wall,—but a spiritual and immortal keepsake, an inmate of the heart, a fragment of that absent mind, which remains with you ever. Has it not often, whether played by some skilled hand, or borne spontaneously upon a breeze that scarce ruffles the serene sky, moved you to joyous tears? Does it not bring a Lethæan draught to annihilate the weary interval, and to restore those happy times ere death has done his work of dread?

Music is the only mental solace. It alone "ministers to a mind diseased." It heals the insane, it cheers the melancholy. After wearying the soul with much study, how gratefully does it soothe and refresh, and obliterate from the brain the iron traces of deep thought. At such times, or after intercourse with the turbulent crowd, when wearied, and yet in some measure infected, with their worldliness, we would exclaim—

..... "Let my due feet never fail,
To walk the studious cloister's pale,
And love the high embowed roof,
With antique pillars, massy proof,
And storied windows, richly dight,
Casting a dim, religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced quire below
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes!"

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE SINGLE CHARACTERS IN THE "AFFINITIES."

THE appearance of the Assistant (teacher) gives us the picture of a man who, with his whole soul and a clear mind, fills a highly respectable calling, and in this sphere of activity, which completely enchains him, is removed from the influence of the natural force of feeling. Whom would it better suit to awaken the notion of a mind and character elevated above the power of mere feeling, than one charged with education, who must have accomplished in himself that which he would attain in others? Does not all education tend to a subjection of that natural force which revolts against the moral and the universal, and to such a purification of the feelings into rational knowledge, that the former do not lose their rights?

In the region of education our assistant is, in every respect, at home. Not only by his calm deportment and his clearness does he elevate us above every passionate feeling, every wavering position, so that in regarding him we remain free from every anxiety as to an attack from natural force which might throw him out of his equilibrium, but he shows himself throughout as a sensible man of refined understanding and superior education. Having, by his apprehension of Otilia's character, already given us a proof how well he can individualize, how far he is removed from a mere abstract mode of education, which does not regard individual peculiarity, he also confirms us in this impression by his personal appearance. For as often as he expresses himself on the subject of human positions, enters into questions of education and cultivation, he not only knows how to speak well and impressively, but he shews a fine sense for the differences of human nature and its positions, to which sense he can give a form with as much grace as earnest.*

But with all this we cannot be deceived as to a prosaic characteristic in our assistant, which makes him incapable of claiming a whole and full interest so that he may be recognized as a really plastic form,—nay, which, with all his aptness, moral earnest, and tact, betrays a certain degree of stiffness and insipidity. This is the want of all energy of feeling and imagination. No nature paying homage to moral ends, however apt it may be, can avoid shewing a certain insipidity when we cannot discover in it a treasure of feeling and intuition, or, at any rate, in single traits the possibility of a great heart-power. We shall not refuse such a nature our respect, but it cannot excite us to a resignation of our whole being, or even to an inspiration. This impression is made upon us by the Assistant. It is already characteristic that he is entirely deficient in an ideal sense for art and for the creation of the forming imagination,—as appears from his expressions about the church and chapel. While the elevation of such a building by the hand of artist is to him a mixture of the holy with the sensual, and the distinction of certain places that they may specially serve to awaken devotion, is thoroughly repugnant to him, since "even the most ordinary surrounding objects should not disturb in us the feeling of the Divine;" he here professes a point of view which is completely abstract, and which excludes all sense and inspiration for art.† For him, therefore, the infinite is only purely present in the sphere of the moral mind—in action—and this is the only region in which the Divine appears to him in a form worthy of itself. "That which is highest and most eminent in man is formless, and we should beware of exhibiting it otherwise than in a noble act."

* We here call attention to his conversation with Charlotte, in which the Assistant, when the lady has brought the garden boys before him, after a short examination highly praised by Charlotte, exhibits his mature views on the method of question and development, and afterwards makes very sensible and original remarks on the different points of view in educating boys and girls.—Dr. Röscher's note.

† "For my part this mixture of the holy with the sensual is by no means pleasing to me;—it does not please me that certain particular places are set apart consecrated and decorated in order to harbor and sustain a feeling of piety. No surrounding objects, not even the commonest, should disturb in us that feeling of the Divine which accompanies us everywhere, and even consecrate every spot to a temple. I should like to see divine service celebrated in the hall where one is accustomed to eat, to assemble socially, and to amuse one's self with playing and dancing."—Cited by Dr. Röscher.

We need not, therefore, at all hesitate to designate the region of the fine arts as one which is, in a certain degree, closed against him, which at least is unable to touch his inmost soul, and to reveal to him the Divine in a sensible form. But this want of ideality is not without influence on the nature of the man. We do not think we are mistaken if we discern in it a source of a certain Philistinism, which always involuntarily forces itself upon us while contemplating the Assistant.*

As he is deficient in warmth for art, and in general is without any romantic element his nature especially precludes the possibility of a full impassioned resignation to a beloved woman; nay, we must own, that the mystery of love, like art, appears to be closed against him. The whole individuality impresses us with the conviction that he has not combatted the natural force of feeling with great exertion, and is now enjoying the fruit of a great victory; much more has his natural temperament preserved him from passionate emotion, and from a conflict of feeling and morality, or has, at least, sportively elevated him above them. This prosaic side is again very definitely and clearly expressed in his relation to Ottilia. To his clear practised eye, and his pedagogical tact the excellencies and depths of soul in this wonderful being have revealed themselves, and the Assistant feels involuntarily rivetted by Ottilia. But in the whole development of his relation to her the prosaic understanding of a nature which always acts according to reasons, and circumspectly after certain aims, is much more apparent than the warmth of a deep overpowering feeling, or an impassioned resignation. Nay, his whole intention of uniting himself with Ottilia is a product of calm reflection, not of a feeling, which immediately draws him to this being and makes an union with it the vital wish which occupies his whole existence. Thus the beginning, as well as the maturity of this resolution is deducted from prosaic considerations and grounds which exclude a free unconditioned resignation.†

It is not that his moral nature is in the least contaminated by this, or that any suspicion of a selfish proceeding arises in us, but we perceive that even the sole being, on whom he bestows his affections, that even such a deeply feeling nature, as Ottilia, is not able to bring him a moment from his equilibrium, nor to change the cool sensible reflections, which represent to him her possession as so desirable into a pure expression of impassioned feeling. After this exposition we take leave of the Assistant to turn to the noble form of the Architect, who in the first place has this in common with the first, that in him also we perceive a nature which is sound in itself, and elevated above the natural force of feeling, but in which, at the same time, every shadow of a prosaic nature and of a 'Philistinedom' has given place to the most cultivated ideality.

* Solger, too, without going further into the ground of the phenomenon, has a similar notion, when he says, "The Assistant has a touch of pedantry. This relation to Ottilia is caught from our most peculiar every day life.—Dr. Röscher's note.—It should be observed, that "Philistine" (Philister) is a word originally applied by students to the towns: men, and generally designates an unpoetical person, with perhaps respectable virtues.—Translator.

† The Governor had made him the proposal "to continue the establishment with her, work in it as if it were his own, and after her death appear as heir and sole possessor. The chief matter seemed to be, that he must find a suitable wife. Secretly he had Ottilia before his eyes and in his heart; but many doubts arose, which were again counterbalanced by favorable events." Further, below, it is said: "If he wished to approach his end, a certain inner timidity always kept him back."—Dr. Röscher's note.

DONIZETTI.

DONIZETTI, in one respect, must be considered the most extraordinary man of his age. Without decided of genius he has become the most popular dramatic writer of the day. Mozart is neglected—Rossini forgotten—Bellini beginning to pall upon the taste; but the grand maestro, as some of the small journals of the Continent style him, has reached the topmost point of public favor, from which, so far from descending—the natural and inevitable concomitant of genius—he seems to rise hourly higher, heaping Pelion upon the Mount Ossa of his musical reputation. Donizetti has two reputations—the one as a great writer, the other as one of extraordinary facility. Leaving the former for awhile, let us examine how far this writer's facility extends; and what effect it would naturally produce on his reputation. It has been said of Donizetti, that he composed operas while journeying in his carriage from one place to another. We are not disinclined to give credit to this statement, at the same time it does not elevate him one jot in our opinion. We may allow that same readiness and aptness for writing to be styled facility, without ceding to it the award of eulogy. To write 'The Corsair' within a fortnight, or to compose 'Otello' or 'Il Barbiere' in eight or ten days, is an incontrovertible evidence of astounding genius; not because they were quickly done, but as they were done so well in so short a time. To write a thousand verses stans pede in uno is a greater instance of corporeal struggle than mental power. Facility per se is not genius; nor is improvisation perfection. If it were so, then the late Tom Hudson would be a greater man than Tom Moore; and Sloman bear the bell from Wordsworth or Southey. But, when this celerity in composition is evidenced in works worthy of endurance, it is, if not genius itself, a collateral proof of genius—its corroboration. The greatest musical effort of the human mind—'The Messiah'—was, comparatively, written in the shortest space of time. We have said enough to show that this faculty of facility by itself may be very astonishing without being at all an emanation from, or testimony of, the more elevated powers of the mind; but if compositions of the highest merit proceed from this quality, it must add another confirmation to mental capacity. It is like several bodies, which by themselves are inutile and inoperative, but acting in combination are powerful and useful ingredients.

Let us now consider what are Donizetti's claims to the highest name in the field of musical composition. If we view genius or talent by popularity, this composer must doubtless hold a superior place to Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, or Rossini; and, moreover, to all modern writers. There is hardly a theatre in Europe but boasts of his productions as the chief feature in its repertoire—hardly a singer of name who would not prefer displaying himself in Donizetti's music to that of any other composer who ever wrote. Until within a few years, when the hand of disease had stricken his powers, every journal had to record the enthusiastic reception of a new opera or the enraptured return of one already established. From Naples to Venice, from Vienna to Rome, from London to Paris, the chief successes of the lyric stages are attributable to Anna Bolena, Maria di Rohan, Don Pasquale, Lucia di Lammermoor, L'Elisir d'Amore, or some other of the fifty or sixty operas of this most miraculous composer. Is a new tenor, or soprano, or barytone, to make his or her début—let him or her choose his part—whose opera does he or she select? Donizetti's! Is a new fantasia or set of quadrille to be written, whose music supplies the themes to Thalberg, Liezt, Dohler, Moschelles, or any other notable pianiste? Donizetti's! Is a young demoiselle in painted saloon hot from the teacher's hand—Crevelli, Tom Cooke, or other professor—to exhibit in public her virgin essay at vocalization, whose pathetic cavatina does she select? Donizetti's!!!

It is always, Donizetti—everywhere, Donizetti—in all mouths, Donizetti. We have said this composer does not possess decided genius—we repeat it, not certainly genius. How then comes it, is the very natural question, that he has obtained a musical popularity that literally pervades the world? We shall endeavour to account for it. First let us suppose, always bearing in mind the decision of the prize comedy at the Haymarket Theatre, that Congreve had presented to any London manager “The Way of the World,” while at the same time was handed in a comedy such as “Who’s your Friend?” or “Grandfather Whitehead,” do you doubt for a moment which the manager, by preference, would select for performance? He might say, or he might not say, certainly, “‘The Way of the World’ is the production of a genius; but the public now-a-days does not require the productions of genius; they want that which they can all understand without any trouble. Give them plain, commonplace things a little varied; they desire no more. Let their senses be tickled with a feather, not searched with a probe—voilà tout.” And this is the secret—tact not genius is the qualification that certainly ensures the road to success. Donizetti has great dramatic tact, or the knowledge and appliance of tickling the senses of his audience with that which, upon consideration and examining, evidences neither profundity of thought, nor great musical knowledge. He has also infinite musical art; he measures with accuracy the general taste, and pitches his compositions to no higher flight than what may be within common range. We may be here attributing to method and design that which proceeds from a mind aptly consonant to the mental capacities of the great mass of his hearers, but the consideration leads to the same result. The composer has likewise a very superior tact in, and knowledge of, vocalization. He is the very tailor of singers, and can cut out an aria or cavatina to perfection to fit the crookedest and most puzzling capabilities, or exhibit excellences and endowments with the finest art. In this respect he is unparalleled, for which reason he is the idol of singers. As a scientific musician we should pronounce Donizetti clever; as a dramatic musician highly gifted. If we look over his most favourite operas, and consider the reputation they enjoy, we will be astonished at their paucity, or nearly total want of melody. No composer within our knowledge, who has gained a fair reputation, is so deficient as a melodist. Operas after operas have we heard of his, yet took no sweetness into our ears. We heard encores and grand effects and dramatic trous, but little or nothing to touch the heart. Sometimes he commences with great promise in an aria, as, for instance, in ‘Vivi tu,’ than which nothing at first can be more elegant, but soon the tenuity of his imagination is apparent, and the air is frittered into insipidity. But even these beginnings are rare, and his chief writing consists in phrases mostly common, but varied with sufficient tact and artifice to render them acceptable to the unstudied listener. How different from poor Bellini, of whom Donizetti is the very antithesis. The author of Puritani overflowed with tender melody; the author of Lucia overflows with matter, but not melody; the author of Sonnambula—but we intend, in a future number, devoting an article to Bellini, and as “comparisons are odorous,” so shall be silent here. Upon reviewing what we have urged concerning the composer under consideration, notwithstanding what we said of his capabilities generally, we confess ourselves astonished at his enormous success. We may allow him something on the score of his choice of libretti, in the selection of which he again displays his usual tact, but the pathetic and absorbing story of the Lucia di Lammermoor, the inimitable fun of Don Pasquale, or the high-toned feeling and interest arising from Anna Bolena, could not of themselves lift up an opera to the reputation these have enjoyed. We acknowledge, we find ourselves puzzled here. We have heard but few operas of Donizetti which we could endure a second time without some infliction. We pride ourselves upon our taste, have some musical knowledge, and lack not the susceptibility to sweet strains: we can sit absorbed with Fidelio and Don Giovanni; entranced with Barbierè, Guillaume Tell, or Freyschutz, excited with the Turco in Italia, Cenerentola, or Fra Diavolo; feel delighted with The Devil’s Opera, or pleased with The Mountain Sylph, but Donizetti’s music neither absorbs, entrances, excites, pleases, nor delights us. Of a verity we must needs be most dull, most stupid, thus to differ from so great a portion of the musical world! Well, we will natheless repose on our stupidity, and still uphold our opinions against the mighty mass. Time is the great approver of all things good, and time will test the author of Maria di Rohan.

It may, with a show of reason, be said that Verdi is the popular composer of the day. We cannot think it. We consider the Verdi-mania to be on a par with the Lind-mania, which a few seasons will dissipate, leaving not a rack of reputation behind to comfort the neglected composer. Who would calmly think of comparing Donizetti with Verdi? Donizetti is a musician. Our deprecation of him only refers to his genius, to the possession of the loftiest order of musical capacity, which we certainly deny to him; and to that overgrown reputation, which we consider should only follow the greatest genius.

No. LV.

How many are the aspects love can wear,
Now basking in a dim, unreal state,
Pleas’d airy forms around him to create,
And shunning all things that like earth appear:
Now bound to earth with mighty chains, which tear
And rend him, when he would emancipate
His soul from the stern bondage of a fate
That makes him sport of ev’ry hope and fear.
Then there are joys, when the fond heart is lost
Within the compass of a dear one’s eyes,
Deeming that those small orbs the whole world bound;
Then jealousies, when the rent heart is tost
Upon a sea, whose waves are agonies;—
And for all this the one word “love” is found.

RUBINI.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

THE most eminent tenor of our age, was born on the 7th of April, 1795, in Romano, a village in the province of Bergamasco. His father was a professor of music, and the young Rubini was initiated at so early an age in the national art, that we find him as a child of eight years, performing publicly on the violin, and singing as a church chorister. At twelve he made his histrionic débüt in a female rôle. The exceeding sweetness of his voice soon gained him a certain reputation; and on one occasion, after having sung with enthusiastic applause an air introduced into a comic opera, the manager magnificently presented him with four shillings! The progress of this triumph was somewhat arrested by the directeur of the Milanese Theatre refusing his voice in their chorus on account of its weakness. Thus compelled to join a strolling company, he starved through Piedmont, hardly gaining enough to purchase food. These misfortunes drove him back to Milan, where he thought himself most happy in obtaining an engagement to sing at Pavia, at a salary of £2 per month, during the autumn. His brilliant success in this place may be conceived when we find him in an engagement at Brescia, during the Carnival of 1815, for £40. for three months. This sum was doubled the following spring, when he engaged to sing at the theatre of San-Mosè. At last, Barbaja, the famous impresario, engaged him for the Théâtre dei Fiorentini, at Naples, at the rate of 80 ducats (£14) per month. After a year, Barbaja wished to get rid of Rubini, in spite of his increasing popularity, only consenting to retain his services on condition of reducing his salary to 70 ducats per month. The singer received higher offers, but he preferred remaining in Naples, where he was taking lessons of the celebrated Nozzari. Nevertheless, he informed Barbaja, although he agreed to his proposals, he was perfectly aware of the advantage he took of his situation. When he returned to Naples, after having produced in Rome a very deep impression, his salary was raised to a proper amount. In 1825, he appeared for the first time in Paris, in the character of Ramiro, in the opera "La Cenerentola," in which he ensured his complete success, by that sweetness and flexibility of execution so peculiarly his own. The title of "King of Tenors" was unanimously accorded to him by the press and the dilettanti, on his appearance in La Donna del Lago, La Gazza Ladra, and Otello. But, Barbaja, who had consented to lend to the managers of the Théâtre Royal Italien in Paris, his primo tenore, demanded restitution at the end of six months. From Naples, where he returned in 1826, the artist was sent to Milan, and afterwards to Vienna. During this period, Bellini, with Il Pirata and La Sonnambula, and Donizetti with Anna Bolena, had measured the power and character of his voice with more success than Rossini. Until 1831, Rubini had been paid direct by Barbaja, who had been compelled to raise his salary to £2,400. On the recovery of his liberty, he made 125,000 francs (£5,000) in one year, in Paris and London, where he played alternately every six months. His reputation stood unrivalled, and his riches far surpassed those acquired by any of the singers at that time, favoured by fortune. There was no Jenny Lind of the day to complete with his success. In some time his annual income amounted to more than £10,000, and the property he gained may be valued at £100,000. He married, in 1819, Madlle. Chomel, a singer, whom he met at Naples, under the name of La Comelli. She was born in Paris, in May, 1794; she accompanied her husband to London in 1831, where she sang at Her Majesty's Theatre in Il Pirata, for the last time. When Rubini bade adieu to England; he he departed with the most solid testimonials of admiration. He went afterwards to the south of France, and thence to his native Bergamo, which he subsequently left, on an invitation from the Emperor of Russia. There he contrived to organize for the Czar, at St. Petersburg, an efficient operatic company, to the enthusiastic delight of the Russian noblemen, who continued to greet with hospitality, in their chilly clime, the sweet warbler of the more genial south. After two seasons he quitted Russia and the stage, for ever.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

"Family Piano-forte Magazine," including classical, methodical, and drawing-room pieces, calculated for the improvement of pianist students, Part 2. By CHARLES CHAULIEU, 3, Alfred-place, Bedford-square.

This work is specially written for the instruction of English schools. The harmonic dial in the first page will be found an ingenious and easy method of explaining the major and minor modes, with their enharmonic changes. The number before us contains an exercise in C minor, followed by a prelude, and two improvisations, and a sonata. The sonata is written in a simple style, and is well adapted to the pupil somewhat advanced in tuition.

Mr. Chaulieu deserves credit for the ingenuity he has displayed in his novel attempt at instructions on the pianoforte. In a musical point of view, the work is commendable.

"O Nation, 'Christian Nation,' a Thanksgiving Hymn, for the Abundant Harvest of the year 1847, written by M. F. TAPPER, Esq. Adapted to a German air by the Rev. H. W. MAGENDI.—R. COCKS and Co."

The feeling which dictates this composition reflects much credit on the combined efforts of Mr. Tupper and the reverend gentleman above-named. The hymn is arranged for four voices, treble, counter-tenor, tenor, and bass, with accompaniment for piano, or organ. The arrangement must not be visited with too searching a scrutiny. Mr. Magendi is by no means devoid of musical acquirements, and has provided altogether a very pleasing musical homily. The words are praiseworthy.

"Loyal Divertimento, on the Airs of "Noble Race was Shenkin," "God Save the Queen," and "Let every British Heart Rejoice." Composed in honour of the Birth Day of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, by W. H. HOLMES.—WESSLE and Co."

Mr. W. H. Holmes's name is guarantee for the excellence of any pianoforte work from his pen. He is one of the most admirable of our native performers on the instrument, and as a musician he holds no second rank in public estimation. The work under review is written without any endeavor after lofty composition, being intended for the use of learners, and fulfilling that intention by its elegant simplicity far better than if he had expended all the resources of his talent by exhibitions of elaborate counterpoint and difficulties of execution. We can strongly recommend the Divertimento to the practitioner.

"Standard Lyric Drama." Part IV.—T. BOOSEY and Co.

As we foresaw in our first notice, the Nozze di Figaro will extend to six parts. To furnish the whole of the music, it was found impossible to restrict it to a less space. The six parts will form a handsome and convenient volume when bound, and though the entire work will cost more than the publishers at first anticipated, no lover of the great master's chef d'œuvre will grumble to pay a price for the opera less than what would be demanded for some half-dozen of the morceaux severally at the usual charges. A word must suffice to chronicle our continued commendation of the publication. The projectors are fulfilling their promises to the letter.

"Osborne House Quadrilles." Performed before Her Majesty and the Royal Court at Osborne House, by the Band of the 74th Highlanders. Composed and arranged for two Performers on the Piano-forte, by HANS HARTUNG.—WESSLE and Co.

A very pleasing and well-written set of Dances. The subjects of the Quadrilles are sufficiently varied, while the general character of the series is happily preserved. Independent of their suitability for dancing, Mr. Hartung's Quadrilles will be found no indifferent exercise for two young beginners on the Piano-forte.

"The Royal Polka," for the Piano-forte. Performed on the Anniversary of the Birth Day of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, at Osborne House, by the Band of the 74th Highlanders. Composed by HANS HARTUNG.—WESSLE & Co.

The composer is, we believe, Band Master of the 74th Highlanders. The Polka has more merit than Polkas in general. The tune is pleasing and effective, and the arrangement for the Piano handled with skill. The admirers of Polka dancing will find the above composition capably adapted for choregraphic displays.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "The Musical World."

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Having received an account of an Amateur Concert, given by Signor Brizzi at Plymouth, I should feel much obliged if you will insert it in your Musical World, as it may not only be interesting, from its novelty and the distinguished vocalists who supported it, but also give pleasure to the many pupils and admirers of this amiable and popular artiste.—Yours &c.

The choruses were sung with exceedingly great taste, and the other pieces were equally entitled to our warmest approbation, the whole forming a rich musical treat. The applause throughout the evening was exceedingly fervent. A higher compliment could not be paid to Signor Brizzi than to witness the approbation obtained by those whom he had had the honour of instructing, and, at the close of the performance, that master of song, Brizzi, was presented with a splendid diamond ring by his pupils as a token of their respect towards him and as a memento of the pleasant evening. After the finale the room was cleared for a dance and the happy party enjoyed themselves for several hours. The re-union of the evening called together a brilliant assemblage, about four hundred being present, amongst whom were all the élite and fashion of the county.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

SIR,—Accept my thanks for your politeness and promptness in inserting my letter signed "A Lover of Song," in last week's World. Perhaps some of your readers would oblige by giving me, through the medium of The Musical World, the names of some songs that would suit me, or of some that would bear transposition into a lower key, without losing their character or beauty.

I am, sir, your obliged and obedient servant,
London, October 12, 1847.

A LOVER OF SONG.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Feeling, as I do, great interest and delight in the works of Bellini, may I take the liberty of asking if you will be kind enough to send me an answer to the within stated questions, I shall esteem it as a piece of great kindness—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES INGHAM,

Questions.—BELLINI—Where, and when was he born?—Where, and when did he die?

[Bellini was born at Pisa, we believe, about the year 1806. He died at Paris in 1835.]

PROVINCIAL.

GUILDFORD CHORAL SOCIETY.—On the 12th instant a morning concert took place at the Public Hall, at which the major part of Haydn's Creation, with selections from his Seasons and Masses, formed a choice programme. Mr. Poole, Mr. Shoubridge, and Mr. Leffler were principals; and the local chorals gave the choruses, with assistance from Exeter Hall, effectively. At this meeting the conductor, Mr. Lemare, introduced, at the request of his patrons, his Seasonable Thanksgiving Harvest Home Hymn, the words of which, by Martin Tupper, Esq. of Albury, were primitively committed by that gentleman to his musical treatment. The arrangement was very effective and highly applauded, the author being present. Miss Poole's various solos; Mr. Shoubridge "In native worth;" and Mr. Leffler's well known portions, given with his wonted volume and depth of voice, were treats well appreciated. Mr. F. H. Lemare presided at the organ, and a most agreeable morning was enjoyed by every one present.

MANCHESTER.—A concert was given in the Athenæum Concert Room, on Wednesday night, by the Misses Holroyd, from the Royal Academy of Music, under the patronage of the mayor of Manchester, and Mr. James Heywood, M. P., but it was thinly attended. Miss Holroyd, and her sister, Miss Ellen Holroyd, were introduced to a Manchester audience last night week, at the concert given by the directors of the Athenæum; Miss Holroyd requires some practice before she attains to a high standing as a vocalist, the same may be said of the younger sister. Mr. Weiss has a good bass voice, and sings with considerable taste, but the room was considerably too small for his powers of voice, and the same may be said of the whole concert; the Free Trade Hall would have been far better adapted. Mr. Wrighton is a nice light tenor singer, and he gave the parts assigned to him with great taste. The whole went off flatly, and concluded a few minutes before ten o'clock. Mr. Wilkinson presided at the piano-forte, and a young man played some airs on the concertina.—Manchester Journal.

LIVERPOOL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The fourth undress concert for the season, held in the lecture-room of the Collegiate Institution on Monday, was, as usual, well attended. The pretty pastoral "Spring," from Haydn's "Seasons," formed the first part, the solos being taken by Miss Stott, Mr. Ryalls, and Mr. Armstrong. The voice of the lady seemed to be remarkably cramped, and Mr. Armstrong's singing, though in good tune, and correct, was quite destitute of energy and style. Mr. Ryalls's vocalism was of the most polished character, and the clearness and power of his voice completely proved the injustice of the wholesale condemnation recently indulged in by a section of the press on his performances at the Concert-Hall. The vocalist can discover, if the critic cannot, an immense difference in his capability of making his voice heard in a clear and open, over a close and confined atmosphere. The choruses, which for the most part are of a delightful and captivating character, concluding with one of lofty merit, were exceedingly well performed; but we did not exactly approve the time chosen by the conductor. The overture to Rossini's "Cenerentola," commenced the second part, and was admirably played. The selections of vocal music were from Spohr, Mendelssohn, Gabuzzi, T. Cooke, Beethoven, and Bishop, showing the cultivated and high taste of the directors. The best performances were Mendelssohn's beautiful chorus, "When the west with evening glows," which was most effectively given, and deservedly encored, and Bishop's glee, "Where art thou, beam of light?" The latter, however, required a male alto voice in preference to the female contralto. Miss Parsons, who took this part, gave a solo and sang with Miss Stott in a duet, "La Calabrees," by Gabuzzi, but her intonation was very thick, and apparently so difficult as to be quite painful to the listener. The concert terminated a little before ten o'clock.—Liverpool Mail.

HEREFORD.—Mr. Robert Carpenter's Evening Concert took place on Tuesday last, and the Assembly Room of the Green Dragon Hotel was filled with a fashionable and, above all, a music-loving audience. The concert commenced with Rossini's delightful overture to Il Barbiere di Siviglia; and though the instrumentation was not of the most powerful character, the work was executed with great precision, taste, and judgment. Bishop's glee, "O by Rivers," opened the vocal performances: it was given judiciously and in excellent harmony by the Misses Williams, Master Carpenter, and Mr. Robert Carpenter. Balfe's duet, "The Sailor sighs," followed; the duet singing of the Misses Williams is known and appreciated by the attendants at the concerts of our Musical Festival last year; on the present occasion, they discoursed most sweetly together. Miss A. Williams sang, "Casta Diva," if not with the brilliant and powerful execution of a Grisi or Jenny Lind, nevertheless, with purity and sweetness. A brother of these clever vocalists made his first appearance in a song by Severn, "Away, away, my angel love;" this song was not well chosen; it is, as we heard a judicious amateur observe, "a flimsy composition." Mr. Williams has a tenor voice of kindred character to the contralto of his sister, Miss Martha Williams; it is rich in quality; full in volume; and soft and flexible in texture; it is capable of vast improvement, and as Mr. Williams has industry as well as musical taste, we expect to see him a great acquisition to the concert-rooms of the metropolis as well as of the provinces. Mr. Willy now stepped forward, and to a judicious pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. Townshend Smith, performed some very clever variations on a sweet but simple theme. Master Carpenter, who although at first a little unsteady and timid—rather a commendable feeling than otherwise—sang Cook's pretty ballad, "Farewell to the nymph of my heart," with much sweetness of expression. Miss Martha Williams deservedly obtained an encore in Knight's ballad of "The Soldier's Daughter," a composition of feeling, though not of great musical excellence. The first part concluded with the overture to Zauberflöte, which, though executed cleverly, manifested the absence of instrumental power. The fairylike yet spirited Masaniello overture opened the second part of the concert, and its performance greatly delighted the audience. The vocal performance of the second part commenced with Horsley's trio, "When shall we three;" though this is not one of the most popular compositions of this composer, it is undoubtedly one of the happiest of his compositions; the way in which the trio was delivered elicited heartfelt applause. After Miss M. Williams had afforded much gratification in Mercadante's "Semi abbandoni," Mr. Willy again delighted the audience with his playing. The genuine applause must have been very gratifying to Mr. Willy. A pretty ballad, by G. Linley, was sung very sweetly by Miss A. Williams. Benedict's clever duett, "Midst waving trees," was admirably given by the Misses Williams, their voices blending in that manner for which they are famed. A fairy-like song, "I love the merry moonshine," by Glover, was delivered elegantly by Miss A. Williams, and received a deserved encore. A glee, "Come see what pleasures," by Elliott, admirably given, closed the vocal performances, and the concert concluded with Weber's overture to Oberon—Hereford Times.

GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB.—The second meeting of the season took place at the Albion Hotel, on Thursday evening, the selection for which was excellent. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Winterbottom, Miss Parry, Messrs. Walton, Cooper, J. Isherwood and Father. The glee, "Blow gentle gales," was beautifully sung by Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Winterbottom, Walton, James Isherwood, and Sheldrick, and it was rapturously encored; but the principal feature of the evening was the performance of Giulio Regondi, on the concertina, and guitar. He played on the concertino De Beriot's First Concerto in D, originally composed for the violin, but arranged by Giulio Regondi for the concertina, the only alteration being the occasional introduction of harmonies and chords, to display the peculiar capabilities of the instrument. We cannot speak in terms too strong in praise of this young artist's talent: his execution is perfect, and his taste and expression peculiarly firm. In the second part he played a solo on the Melophonic guitar, with two additional bass strings to the Tonic and Dominant, making eight strings, while the common Spanish guitar has only six. He played the Thalberg's Fantasia on airs from 'Don Giovanni', arranged by himself for the guitar, and although we consider the Concertina the more agreeable instrument, he delighted us by his extraordinary taste and execution on the guitar; indeed, the addition of the two bass strings makes a great improvement in the capabilities of the instrument. We regret that we have not time or space to notice more, particularly the excellent glee singing. Mr. James Isherwood was in excellent voice. We may add that the meeting was well attended. The host, Mr. Johnson, of the Albion Hotel, furnished an excellent supper, and all went off to admiration.—Manchester Courier.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—The entertainments of the week have consisted of The Hunchback on Monday; Tuesday, London Assurance; Wednesday, The Lady of Lyons; Thursday, The Love Chase; and last night The Hunchback repeated. As we foretold, The Hunchback met with the most triumphant success. The combination of talent introduced could not fail to draw crowded audiences, and the manager was wise in repeating this popular play twice a week. The re-production of London Assurance on Tuesday was hardly less successful than The Hunchback. The cast was most excellent and comprised nearly all the actors in their original characters. With the exception of Mr. Webster in Mark Meddle, played formerly at Covent Garden by Harley, and Miss Julia Bennett in Madame Vestris's original part of Grace Harkaway, the comedy includes the same performers who played in its first production. Mr. Keeley was received with great applause in his old part, Mr. Spanker, and elicited great laughter. Mrs. Nisbett's Lady Gay Spanker is one of the most brilliant and effective of her performances. Mr. Bourcicault certainly fitted her to perfection in the part. Mr. Farren's Sir Harcourt Courtly is too well-known to necessitate any particular comments in this place. Mr. Webster was capital as Mark Meddle. Nothing of the kind could be better. Brindal's Cool, his original part, was admirable, and Mrs. Humby, in Pert, her original character, was equally worthy of encomium. In short, the comedy was played as well as it could possibly be played in the present day; nor, indeed, as far as we can judge, could it well be surpassed by any list of actors who reigned together in our memory. The afterpieces of the week include nothing new: The Romantic Widow, Twice Killed, My Wife! What Wife! constituting the interludes and farces. This evening, a new and original farce, entitled Who's my Husband? will be produced; the principal characters thereof to be sustained by Keeley, Tilbury, Howe, the Mesdames W. Clifford, L. S. Buckingham, and Humby. On Wednesday next, a new and original play, in five acts, called The Heart and the World, will be performed, and will include in the cast the Messrs. Creswick, A. Wigan, Howe, H. Vandenhoff, Miss Helen Faucit, Miss Julia Bennett, Mrs. W. Clifford, Miss E. Messent, Mrs. Stanley, &c. &c. The lovers of Miss Helen Faucit are on the qui vive to see her in a new part.

DRURY LANE.—The Promenade Concerts at this theatre, during the week, have attracted larger audiences than, generally speaking, have been known on former occasions. The novelty and beauty of the appearance of the house, and the praises it has universally obtained from the press, have, no doubt, tended to increase the multitude of visitors. We are, however, inclined to think that a more laudable reason for the accumulation of spectators may be traced to the spread of music among the middle classes, in the dissemination of which M. Jullien, most undoubtedly, has participated largely. A single fact of late occurrence at the Promenade Concerts will exemplify this diffusion of musical taste better than the most elaborate arguments drawn from theory, or speculation. On Saturday evening the allegretto scherzo in Beethoven's Symphony in F was encored with a degree of fervor and persistence that would have done honor to the Philharmonic classical audience, and reflected highly on their judgment. This is no mean indication of the progress and march of music, when we remember, some five years ago, that a symphony of Beethoven's was actually hissed, and would not be heard throughout at the same Promenade Concerts. The encore of Saturday evening told plainly enough that the multitude is not so dull a beast as is generally supposed, and that if he be only properly indoctrinated, using at one time the coaxing means and at another the judiciously-coercive, as you would with any other baby, for the mob is Community's and Communion's youngling, you may lead him by insensible gradations through the whole alphabet of taste. The mingling of the trivial and the sublime in music at the Promenade Concerts exhibits M. Jullien's tact and his knowledge of humanity. Had he introduced at his first entertainments nothing but the highest order of music, he would not only have scared away the mass of his audiences, but he would have lost the opportunity of the power, which he now possesses, of infusing into the minds of his auditors a love and veneration for the beautiful and grand in music. We trust and hope, before many more seasons have passed away, that M. Jullien, following the popular feeling, will find it necessary to give a larger portion of the compositions of the great masters than he does at present. He will then, indeed, be entitled to the appellation of a musical regenerator in this country. The magnificent band at his disposal cannot fail to do justice to the works of the master-minds of past or present times; and as perfection in the execution is requisite to the full understanding of these compositions, he has in his hands the chief moving power by which the best works may be disseminated.

M. Jullien's band consists of the principal part of the Royal Italian Opera orchestra, with selections from that of Her Majesty's Theatre, and a section of his own constituted corps. It is, therefore, hardly necessary to state, that his band is one of the most efficient in Europe. We will give a list of the principal names, from which the reader may draw his own conclusion as to the completeness of the body:—Messrs. Sainton, Richardson, Tolbecque, Collinet, Nadaud, Barret, H. Blagrove, Baker, Lazarus, Case, Kœnig, Sonnemberg, V. Collins, Baumann, N. Mori, Platt, Watkins, Harper, Hill, J. Harper, Rousselot, Jarrett, Hausman, Hancock, Cioffi, Lavenue, Prospere, G. Collins, Payton, Loder, Thomas, Howell, Goffrie, Alsept, Casolani, Rowland, Anglaise, Pratten, &c., &c., &c. Signor Piatti, the violoncellist, is engaged for a limited number of nights for the concerts.

We have thought it necessary to furnish a catalogue of the orchestra in full, since the same band is provided for the Drury Lane Opera. Those, therefore, who are anxious to obtain an idea, by anticipation, of the intended operations of the new academy, would do well to attend the Promenade Concerts and listen to M. Jullien's band in an overture, or a symphony. They cannot fail saying to themselves, if the singers and chorus be equal to the orchestra, then, indeed, shall we have music in perfection.

The performances of the week have consisted of overtures by Weber, Rossini, Herold, Beethoven, &c.; movements from symphonies of Beethoven; with the usual selections of quadrilles, polkas, mazourkas, gallopades, and vocal morceaux. The vocal department has been entrusted solely to Miss Dolby, who sang two songs on each evening. One of these, a Swiss national melody, has met with the greatest success, no less from the finished and pure vocalization of the charming artiste, than from the simple beauty and expressiveness of the song itself. This ballad is entitled, "The Swiss Girl," and will, we have no doubt, become one of the most favourite vocal morceaux of the day. Among the solo performers of the week, we should select for particular praise, Sainton on the violin, Signor Piatti on the violoncello, and Mr. Baumann on the bassoon. The performance of the last named artiste in selections from Robert le Diable, was received with immense favor. Kœnig, Richardson, and Barret, have also, by their admirable solo performance, tended to delight their hearers. Monsieur L'Anglois made his debut on Tuesday evening, and performed a solo on the contra-basso with the greatest effect. The entertainments on the whole have been admirably varied, and are entitled to much praise.

The appearance of the theatre demands a few additional words to what we have given in our last week's article. We have noticed the prevailing lightness of the interior and the simplicity of the decorations. On entering the theatre the ceiling first solicits attention. A light trellis-work, formed of crossed bars of gold, rises from the shoulder of the dome to a small height, through which is seen the sky of a beautiful ultra-marine colour. Beyond the trellis-work to the centre, from which the chandelier is suspended, the deep blue of the sky warms to a rich golden-orange tint suggestive of a sunrise, and has an admirable effect, the light from the chandelier seeming to issue therefrom. The chandelier, supported by six golden cupids flying, is brought close to the ceiling, a necessary provision, as thereby it does not interfere with the view of the spectators from the upper parts of the theatre. From the body of the chandelier six arms issue, shaped like the Union-Jack, the compartments being signalized by gas-pipes, with jets of light at short intervals. This has a very happy and novel effect. Around the lower part of the dome there runs a large pipe, from which proceed gas burners, the multitude of lights filling the house with intense brilliancy. This is quite an original provision, but we think not altogether in good keeping with the harmony of the general appearance. For the Promenade Concerts, where something might be conceded to surprise of effect, the suppliancy of so startling a novelty may have its advantage, and will find many advocates; but we cannot help thinking that its retention in the opera season would be injudicious, as it would certainly detract from the simplicity which is the prevailing characteristic of the aspect of the theatre. The decorations and ornaments are in the best possible taste. The eye is no where offended by an extravagant display of colours, or embellishments. On the façade of the boxes a light trellis work of gold is overlaid on a faint bloom-colour, and the pillars supporting the boxes are twined at intervals with wreaths of flowers in gilt papier-maché. When we mention that the curtains and borders are in scarlet cloth and gold, we have supplied some faint notion of the appearance which Drury Lane wears at the present moment. The theatre, no doubt, will present a different aspect when prepared for scenic representation.

PRINCESS'S.—Romeo and Juliet was repeated on Tuesday, but failed to attract a large audience. We are not surprised at this. With the exception of Miss Cushman's Romeo, which is indeed an admirable performance, the play was most indifferently cast, there being hardly an actor who was adequate to represent the character allotted to him. Mr. Compton's Peter and Mrs. Selby's Nurse were both good, but none of the rest were above mediocrity. Miss Cushman's Romeo is her most equal and most admirable performance. There is something in the character of the youthful romantic lover that suits the actress to perfection. All the asperities and angularities of her acting appear to have been doffed with her feminine attire, and though the want of grace is still observable, it is not so obtrusive in Romeo as in her female characters, as neither dignity nor grandeur is demanded in the personation of the love-sick Montague. Miss Cushman has not here to contend to elevate herself by unnatural efforts, but to allow the predominant influences of the lover's character, intensity of passion and the keenest susceptibility, to pervade her mind and sway her in the performance. There can hardly be any scenic representation more truthful and beautiful than this artiste's Romeo. There is something in Miss Cushman's tone of voice that is absolutely love-pleading: a plaintiveness that sounds like an echo to Melancholy, Love's sister, and which fills the heart with recollections of happy days gone by to all. Her voice, in Romeo, is one of the greatest charms of the actress. In the garden scene it rings on the ear of night like Endymion's hushed music in his low complaints to the moon: and how beautiful it is, and how full of sorrow half concealed by an effort to give it a gay tone, in that heart-rending scene, when banished Romeo bids his last adieu to his new-wedded Juliet, it is impossible to express in mere words. But voice alone makes not up the excellence of the artiste. Her acting throughout is character-raised by great power and great judgment. Miss Cushman's acting in the last scene is scarcely surpassed by any performance we have witnessed. It is full of passion without rant, feeling without exaggeration, and the deepest pathos without the slightest taint of mawkish sentimentality. It is, in short, an effort of the highest art combined with the finest appreciation of the beautiful and the true in nature. Alas! that we cannot say so much for Miss Susan Cushman, who is a fine girl, a handsome girl, yea, and a clever girl. Her Juliet, however, is an error. She neither looks, conceives, nor embodies the character. She exhibits talent, but not the talent required to impersonate the Juliet of Shakspeare. She possesses a fine form and a good-looking face, but not the face nor the form to captivate the lover of Rosalind, and turn him from his ancient love. Miss Susan Cushman is neither sufficiently juvenile-looking on the stage, the consequence of a somewhat large person and a certain seriousness of aspect; nor does she seem intended by nature to personify the softness and yielding qualities of the female characters; qualities which in the earlier scenes of the play, Shakspeare infuses into the love-awakening heart of Juliet, till she appears formed for no earthly purpose than

"Loves, tears, and kisses, sighs, and smiles."

It was only in the more impassioned scenes, such as the taking of the poison, and the scene with the nurse, she seemed to exhibit any sympathy with, or show any knowledge of the character. These scenes were performed with considerable skill and feeling, and displayed a tact and sensibility that would entitle her to rank high in the profession, were she to perform that which was most adapted to her talents. Her Juliet was too clever in general, and too artistic in many instances to be pronounced a failure. We may entitle the performance creditable. Miss Emmeline Montague appeared in Miss Hardcastle in She Stoops to Conquer on Saturday; and on Tuesday, after Romeo and Juliet, as Katherine in Katherine and Petruchio. Both performances were excellent. This lady will, we prognosticate, grow into high favor with the audiences of the Princess's before many moons have rolled on.

King Henry the VIIIth. was brought out in a very efficient manner on Wednesday evening, as far as regards scenery, costume, decorations, &c. The principal features of the performance were Macready's Cardinal Wolsey, a celebrated part of the tragedian's, and Miss Cushman's Queen Katherine, her first essay in that character in this country. The play of Henry the VIIIth., poetically speaking, is not one of Shakspeare's masterpieces; and dramatically, is surpassed by most of the author's productions for the stage. We do not altogether coincide with Doctor Johnson's comment on King Henry the VIIIth., when the great writer pronounced that "the genius of Shakspeare comes in and goes with Katherine," and that "every other part may be easily conceived and easily written." With all our respect for Doctor Johnson's great talents we doubt whether he could have conceived and written, by any mental exertion, much less easily and without effort, the character of Cardinal Wolsey, and the language put into his mouth. Nor can the attentive reader peruse the drama without finding many passages, which none but Shakspeare could have written, and many traits of characters which none but Shakspeare could have drawn. Of the poetry, even omitting all appertaining to Wolsey and Queen Katherine, we find many parts which belong to the highest order of writing, and which all the critics in the world could not have indited, even if they could have conceived them, and which no poet, save only one, could have moulded into such harmonious form of beauty and expression. Let us quote, as an instance, Norfolk's character of the Queen:—

"A loss of her,
That like a jewel has hung twenty years
About his neck, yet never lost her lustre:
Of her that loves him with that excellence
That angels love good men with; even of her
That, when the greatest stroke of fortune falls,
Will bless the King."

Surely the great moralist could hardly have understood Shakspeare when he said his genius, in this play, came in and went with Katherine. Was there no genius exhibited in the character of the wily Cardinal? Was there no subtlety of intellect expended in delineating so much vice and hypocrisy, yet keeping the possessor remote from our contempt; rendering him at the same time hateful and interesting; mean and transcendent? Did no genius dictate the speech on falling greatness, or the address to Cromwell? Of the characters too, have we not the lordly Buckingham, the faithful Cromwell, the gay and witty Lord Sands, with others, to disprove this calumny, for it is little else, of the leviathan Doctor? The play of Henry the VIIIth. is undoubtedly better suited to the student in his closet than to the spectator in the theatre; and had the critic confined his strictures to this point, we should have found no cause to quarrel with him.

Taking into consideration the number of characters in the play and their importance, the splendour and pomp required in the coronation pageantry, and the size of the stage necessary to give effect to the spectacle, we can hardly imagine any drama less adapted to the means of the Princess's, than Henry the VIIIth. Much care, and some attempts at magnificence, were certainly shown in its production on Wednesday evening at this theatre, and for this the manager deserves praise; but the cast of parts was so indifferent, and the performance, in consequence, so far below mediocrity, as to render the external speciousness little less than worthless. Of Macready's Cardinal Wolsey alone can we speak in any terms of eulogy. His personification of the wily priest was, indeed, highly artistic, and conceived with great judgment. The character was, perhaps, rendered too senile, and might be said to be at variance with history in this regard; but, nevertheless, looking at it as a dramatic embodiment, we cannot imagine any performance more finished, or more effective. In the third act, his acting was unquestionably a masterpiece. It is only in this act the poet appears to have elaborated his character, and endowed it with greatness. Macready seemed to have reserved himself for his closing scenes, and here he came out with a power scarcely to be surpassed. The speech, when the king leaves him, frowning on him, followed by the "lapsing nobles," commencing—

"What should this mean?

How have I reap'd it? What sudden anger's this?"

was worthy the finest efforts of the tragedian. Nothing could be more truthful and striking than his sorrowful exclamation—

"Nay then, farewell!

I have touch'd the highest point of all my greatness:
And from that full meridian of my glory
I haste now to my setting: I shall fall
Like a bright exhalation in the evening,
And no man see me more."

The scene with Cromwell was splendidly acted, and the great speech before his final exit was delivered with the greatest pathos and beauty. Mr. Macready was called for at the end of the third act, and greeted with loud and unanimous applause. To Miss Cushman's Queen Katherine we may apply the same objections we did to her Lady Macbeth: a want of dignity, a lack of grace, an absence of repose, and a straining after effects were equally noticeable in both performances. Her acting in the arraignment scene was divested of that solemnity and heroic grandeur which the poet has flung round the Queen with all the power of his mighty genius; and her death was conceived in a spirit identical with that which portrayed the expiring throes of Meg Merrilies. Miss Cushman has not the intellect to discriminate between the poetical and the pictorial in acting. Mr. Cooper's Henry the Eighth bordered very closely on the burlesque. We never saw this actor appear to less advantage. If it be his opinion that kingly bearing is incompatible with bluntness of deportment, and that he intend to make this character one of his standard performances, we would strongly recommend him to pay a visit next season to the Royal Italian Opera, and see Tamburini's King in Anna Bolena. If he be not convinced then of the strange error into which he has fallen, he must be incorrigible. Miss Susan Cushman's Anna Bolena was neither elegant nor artistic. She looked the part indifferent well, and that's the sole praise we can bestow upon her. Of the other characters charity forbids us to say one word. The play was announced for repetition on Friday and Monday. The audience seemed perfectly satisfied.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Colman's comedy of the Jealous Wife was revived at this theatre on Wednesday, to a house moderately well filled, Melpomene being evidently a greater favorite here than Thalia. The comedy was, on the whole, well played. Mr. H. Marston and Miss Addison undertook the parts of Mr. and Mrs. Oakley. Although Miss Addison's comic acting is inferior to her tragic, yet it contains many felicitous points. Her best scenes were, the one with her husband, in which she wheedles him into a confession of his supposed delinquency, and that with Lady Free love, who plays on her jealous fears. Here Miss Addison's manner was easy and natural; but her reproaches of her husband were too loud and violent. Mrs. Oakley, although a woman of strong passions, is yet a lady, moving in the highest circles. Miss Addison's voice is melodious, and she ought to give it fair play by dropping that inflation of style and straining at effect, by which she spoils some of her best points. Mr. H. Marston made a very efficient Mr. Oakley, and Mrs. Marston an extremely clever Lady Free love. Mr. G. Bennett, as the Major, although a little too boisterous, was highly amusing.

MARYLEBONE.—Hamlet has been produced at this house in capital style, as regards the dresses, scenery, and accessories, but as regards the actors, most indifferently. Mr. Graham's Hamlet was, indeed, strikingly original, and most of the other characters coped with the Prince in peculiarity of excellence. From this mass of indifference we would reserve from animadversion the Queen of Mrs. Warner, the First Gravedigger of Mr. T. Webb, and the King of Mr. James Johnstone. The latter gentleman seems to us to be the best actor in the company.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MR. WILLIAM MICHAEL ROOKE, the composer and professor of singing, expired at his residence, Claremont Cottage, St. John's, Fulham, on Thursday, after a tedious and painful illness. Mr. Rooke was a native of Dublin. He left Ireland in 1821, and from that period has since resided in London. Some years after his arrival he here, became Musical Director at the English Opera, and subsequently Chorus-master and Musical Director at Drury Lane. His avocations were various. He was for years previous to his death one of the principal second violins at the Philharmonic and Ancient Concerts, &c. He was considered an excellent teacher of singing, and among his pupils we may mention Balfe, who, in his youth, studied under his instruction for some period in Dublin, Miss Forde, Mr. W. Harrison, and Mr. Clement White. As a composer Mr. Rooke was highly estimated, his opera of Amilie, having obtained a decided success at Covent Garden, under Macready's management, and many of his fugitive vocal morceaux having gained great popularity. Mr. Rooke's loss is universally regretted. In private life he was a most excellent husband and father, and a kind-hearted and staunch friend. It is to be hoped he has left his family sufficiently provided: if not, their deprivation claims the sympathy of every musician in this country.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER, the eminent pianist and composer, was married on Tuesday last to Miss Batchelor, of Eton. May every happiness attend them, say we.

MISS PURDAY, a professor of music, perished by the fire, which occurred on Monday evening on the premises, Waterlane, Blackfriars.

MADAME DULCKEN intends giving a pianoforte matinée next week, at the County Assembly Rooms, Maidstone; John Parry will be the vocal interlude.

MADAME ALBERTAZZI.—The Queen Dowager has generously sent £10 to Mr. Frederick Beale, of Regent-street, for the benefit of the children of the late Madame Albertazzi.

JENNY LIND AT HOME IN LONDON.—Jenny Lind arrived in London, by the steamer, at Blackwall, on Saturday, the 17th of April, about three in the afternoon, and came to the west end through the streets on the Surrey side of the river to avoid the crowd of carriages always impeding Cheapside and the Strand. Mr. Lumley arrived in London early the same morning, after having seen his prize safely off for England. She resided for some short time with Mrs. Grote, the wife of the member, and then domesticated herself in a cottage at Old Brompton, next door to the Rosery (an accidental juxtaposition), the residence of the talented authoress Mrs. S. C. Hall. Between Mrs. Hall and Jenny sprang up a friendly intercourse. When Jenny first took possession of her new abode, Mrs. S. Hall, as a mark of attention to her celebrated neighbour, sent in her card; and, with her characteristic frankness, good-humour, and simplicity, Jenny immediately returned the compliment by a visit. Otherwise, during her residence in London, Jenny Lind saw few or none. Extremely quiet and retiring—passionately devoted to her flowers—and employing herself in all graceful and tranquil exercises, besides attending to her theatrical duties—Jenny Lind avoided company, and declined the invitations of half London. Earnestness and simplicity, a total want of self-value or parade, and a child-like disposition to be amused, and to be "let alone," are inherent in her character. If you saw her off the stage, you would take Jenny Lind to be the most unpretending person possible. In her dress she is as simple as a shepherdess, and she would be overlooked a hundred times over. She has remarkably quick observation, however, and a self-dependence, and a self-possession admirably contrasting with the bustle, and restlessness, and affected importance of some of the members of the large musical family. In the early part of the season Jenny Lind used to drive to the theatre at an early hour (in anticipation of performance)—five o'clock—as much to avoid the crowd which besieged the stage entrance in hope of catching a sight of her, as to obtain an hour's quiet before dressing for the representation. Latterly, however, she was later in her arrivals. Occasionally, in the evenings, after her performance, she would take a chair in the first entrance on the stage, and watch the ballet with great amusement.—People's Journal.

THE Queen Dowager, with her usual liberality and benevolence, has sent a donation of 10*l.* to Mr. F. Beale, 201, Regent Street, for the benefit of the children of the late favourite vocalist, Madame Albertazzi.

JENNY LIND paid a very gratifying compliment to our fellow citizen, Mr. H. Cooper, at the Exeter concert on Saturday last. It seems there is no retiring room at the subscription-rooms there, and Mdlle. Jenny was very near Mr. Cooper, whilst he played a concerto on the violin, with which she was so much delighted, that she hastily wrote on a slip of paper the words, "Je suis votre sincere admiratrice," which she handed to him with a sweet smile as soon as he had made his acknowledgments to the audience for a burst of well-deserved applause which followed his performance.—Felix Farley.

MR. AND MRS. MILLAR'S SOIREEES MUSICALES commenced for the season on Wednesday last, for which occasion an attractive programme of vocal and instrumental pieces was provided. The services of Mr. T. Wright (harp) and Mr. H. C. Cooper (violin), in addition to those of Mr. and Mrs. Millar, had been secured for the first soirée, and as both artistes are in the first rank of their profession, it may be supposed that full justice was done to the various compositions which they executed. Sir H. R. Bishop and Mr. H. Phillips are engaged for this series, the concerts of which will be continued at fortnightly intervals.—Bath and Cheltenham Gazette.

ENORMOUS SUMS PAID TO FOREIGN SINGERS.—The Englishman meekly submits to be fleeced, and consents to pay guineas instead of shillings into the hands of the very same people he may hear sing in Italy for one quarter the money. The fever for Jenny Lind has raised prices to a height that we shall take the liberty of calling scandalous. It is no good argument to state that English people can afford it, and therefore may do it. Money is money: 30*l.* is 30*l.*; and if one man thinks this an inconsiderable price for one single night's entertainment, we candidly confess we wish that some day he may want it. Such money is ill spent; it goes after a certain point only to enrich one singer, who pockets the cash, does not spend it in the country, and sends it perhaps to some bank in a dirty little foreign town.—Fraser's Magazine.

PUNCH AT THE PLAY.—(From Punch.)—Last week the dramatic season—of which Punch from time to time may take note—fairly began. We wish to be pleased: we have thrown open "the red-leaved tablet of our heart," and wish to be complacent with all the world. Nay, to show the extravagance of our benevolence, we wish to be at peace even with all managers—past, present, and to come. But we owe a duty to the world; and whatever our laundress may say of our private debts, duty is a debt we always pay, sometimes thirty shillings in the pound. London feels, as the savage saith, the stone rolled from her heart. Her playhouses are again opened; and it would seem, to the peculiar discomfiture of "Our Fast Man," that the fashion seems to be somewhat in favour of those old world matters, five-act dramas. Be this as it may, London is in the best of temper with her plays and players, reading the morning bills with brightening eyes, and determining at some theatre—the Haymarket—the Princess's—the Marylebone—or Sadler's Wells—to make a night of it. Moreover, the dramatic impulse has communicated itself—as though travelling by the electric wire—to Windsor. The Court will return very much earlier to London than was proposed, the Queen being desirous to personally patronize the English drama. This being the case, we understand that the Master of the Horse has already purchased two sets of horses for play-nights; none of the cattle at present in the royal stables—from old habit—being manageable one step beyond the Italian Opera. (It is not generally known, but at present there is not a royal horse that does not shy at an English play-bill.)—Mr. Webster has in active preparation very handsome paraphernalia for the Royal Box, in the lively expectation of a royal visit: and Mr. Maddox will, on a like occasion, put forth something better than new. It is scarcely to be expected that Her Majesty will be so extreme in her patronage as to visit Islington, or Marylebone, yet when enthusiasm is once awakened, who shall prophecy a limit to its operation?—Punch—he confesses it—has, of late, neglected theatres. But—Punch is a courtier. All the world knows that. Therefore as his Queen determines to smile upon the English drama, Punch—like certain other patrons—will patronise it too; that is, when he can get an order, or be allowed to sell the use of his opinions for an entire season for one private box. (Wine and sandwiches will make him a slave for life.)—The Haymarket has opened merrily enough. Very pleasant was it for the actors—old faces and new comers—to feel that the audience was shaking them by the hand, and wishing them a pleasant season. Mrs. Glover had been—not to Margate—no, but to the Fountain of youth, and came rejuvenescent from the dip. And Nisbett—another duck!—brought back June to us in her sunny face and lark-like voice. At the first gathering, all—actors and audience—seemed to make holiday. "What do you think of this?" said a familiar voice to us. We looked—it was the ghost of Elliston in the boxes. With the mild dignity of a subdued bashaw, he observed, "I've just come up to see Charles Surface. It's very odd, Punch, but Nature has certainly worked out her raw material; there is not a real light comedian left. At the best but molten lead—not the true quicksilver—not the real mercury!" and the ghost feebly chuckled, and ere we could ask him news of his friend George the Fourth, faded—faded away. Shakspeare—though sophisticated Shakspeare—is mighty at the Princess's. In Macbeth—especially in the fifth act—Macready has delighted even "Our Fast Man." After seeing the actor, the "Fast Man" (he confessed as much to a friend) did not visit a Casino for a single week, and had some notion of going as far as Islington to behold Macbeth's head upon a pole. The "Fast Man," moreover, thinks Miss Cushman's Mrs. Macbeth first-rate. Miss Montague—the new Desdemona—is a charming actress, with a dove-like manner, and a voice of magical sweetness—a voice that would draw a suit out of Chancery. "Will it draw houses?" asks Mr. Maddox: and Punch answers—"Mr. Maddox, it will."—Punch, however, must not quit Mr. M. without expressing the intensest admiration of his scenery in Macbeth—it is so primitive, so perfect. The scenery of Othello is equally true; and then so domestic! though the bed of Desdemona, from its yellow tint, did excite in our mind a somewhat unpleasant recollection of "The Industrious Fleas."—The Lyceum will throw open its doors, and make, no doubt, a very handsome show. Vestris certainly carried confusion among the spiders of the Olympic, and was the first to turn a theatre into a drawing-room. Perhaps the curtains and chair-covers were sometimes a little too fine, and the pieces now and then a little too flimsy. Nevertheless, stage reform, as far as scenery and costume go, originated in Wyche Street, and we doubt not, we shall have the like rigid propriety at the Lyceum. Planché—President of the Antiquarian Society—has very recently discovered in Brokers' Row a complete set of tea-spoons of the fourteenth century, and is engaged on a drama of "stirring interest" to introduce them.

THE DISTINS have given concerts during the last fortnight in Scarboro, Witby, Stockton-on-Tees, Newcastle, Sunderland, North and South Shields, Carlisle, Whitehaven, Maryport, Cockermouth, Penrith, and Carlisle; accompanied by Miss Moriatt O'Connor as vocalist, and Mr. Willy, Jun. as pianist.

GRACE AGUILAR, the authoress of many popular works in favor of the Jews, died last month at Frankfort, aged 32.

MEYERBEER.—A medal in honor of this composer has lately been struck in Vienna; on one side is a bust of Meyerbeer, and on the other the following inscription: "To the great Musical Composer, 1847." M. Riesk, the engraver, has just had conferred on him the gold medal of merit.

DISCOVERY OF A VALUABLE ITALIAN MS.—Signor Carlo Guzzoni Degli Ancarani, in a letter to the Chevalier Salvator Betti (published in a Roman Newspaper) announces the discovery of an unpublished "Life" of Fra Girolamo Savonarolo, dictated by Brother Serafino Razzi, of the order of preachers. At the end of the MS. are some poems of Girolamo, which (especially a canzonet on the happiness of Florence) are sufficient to stamp him as a poet. A Florentine Journal proposes the erection of a monument in honour of this celebrated man on the site of his convent. A stanza in the Ottava rima is selected from the poems in question, as a proof of the truth of the above critical dictum. The subject is a pious invocation to the Deity.

A LIVERPOOL JENNY LIND.—"An amateur of 50 years experience" writes as follows, calling the attention of the editor of the Liverpool Albion to a gem in music, a future star of the first magnitude:—"I, an old amateur, an enthusiastic admirer of the art, and familiar with the best schools in all lands, fearlessly predict the certainty of Thursday last being memorable in the musical annals of Liverpool. I saw an announcement of the ballad 'The Banks of Allan Water,' at the Liver Theatre, in Church street, by a young lady, her first appearance on any stage. I went, partly from curiosity, but in some dread, fearing a torrent of cadences and a series of music lessons. The symphony commenced, and on came an elegant sylph-like girl, apparently about eleven years of age, modest, unassuming, and very pretty; but, oh! the melody she poured forth, the soul-feeling purity of tone! I was enraptured; so were the audience; we scarcely breathed. At the end, the burst of applause was enthusiastic and honest; not a soul in the house but joined in it. The house was taken by surprise; it was Jenny Lind again; the same freshness, the same nature. I remembered Jenny Lind's early history; this seemed a realization of a dream; there stood the child before me; and so beautiful too! Canova would have copied the head. I went again last night. If possible, it was still better,—the action so varied, yet so graceful. I cannot give you a better proof of the power of this young syren than this fact—I saw the sailors, rough fellows, crying like children near me."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THEATRE ROYAL,

DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS, FIRST NIGHT OF THE SWISS QUADRILLE.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that his New DESCRIPTIVE QUADRILLE, entitled the

SWISS QUADRILLE,

composed during his late tour in Switzerland, will be performed for the First Time

On MONDAY, OCTOBER 18th, 1847.

INTRODUCTION.—The Scene takes place in a Mountain District of Switzerland at Daybreak.—Perfect stillness reigns around, broken only by the Chirping of the Birds, the early Song of Shepherds, and the distant Village Bell, calling the Peasants to their Morning Devotions.

No. 1.—Suddenly the Calm is dispelled by the Cry of the Hunters, who rally forth in pursuit of the Wild Chamois; the Report of their Rifles is heard, and the Corne Sauvage (a Rustic Instrument of the mountains) sounds in the heat of the Chase, when shortly the cheer of the pursuers proclaims the success of the day.

No. II.—National Air, "LE CHALET."—Dialogue for Bassoon, Trombone and Clarinet, performed by M^{rs}. BAUMANN, Signor CIOFFI, and Herr KÖNIG.

No. 3.—"LE RANS DES VACHES." Performed on the Alpen-Horn by Herr KÖNIG. This National Melody has such an extraordinary effect upon the Swiss Peasantry, that in those countries where the Swiss Soldiers were formerly employed to guard the persons of royalty, its performance by the Military Bands was actually forbidden; indeed, it so affects these voluntary exiles, and so forcibly reminds them of their fatherland, that many have been known to desert after listening to its notes. The palace and person of the present Pope, Pius IX. are still under the care of Swiss Guards.

No. 4.—National Air, "AU RIVE DU LAC." Arranged with Variations for Flute, Flageolet, Clarinet, and Oboe, performed by Mr. RICHARDSON, M. COLLINET, Mr. LAZARUS, and M. BARRET.

No. 5.—A Village Fête is in course of celebration.—The sun sets, and night comes on. The Spring, the period when the dreadful Avalanches fall, has arrived, and the thunder-like noise in the distance interrupts the Fête and warns the villagers of the near approach of this awful visitation.—The sound of the fitful wind and the drifting rain are mingled with the wild cry of the eagle, and other affrighted birds, sure tokens of the coming storm.—The terror of the people increases with the violence of the tempest; and the mountain torrent bursts its banks, threatening to overwhelm the devoted village. This convulsion of the elements at last detaches the overhanging Avalanche, and with an awful crash it bounds down the mountain side, carrying destruction in its path.—The village bell rings, a shout resounds through the valley, and the joyous chorus of the assembled villagers announces their escape from the threatened danger.

The Programme will also include an Aria by MISS DOLBY; the Overture to "Euryanthe;" the Allegretto Scherzando, from Beethoven's Symphony in F; a Solo by M. ANGLAIS; a Solo by Mr. RICHARDSON; the New Rhine Polka, &c. &c.

The Concert commences at Eight o'clock.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator:

"Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire-sq., Bishopsgate-st., 19th July, 1847.

"Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's "Aromatic Regenerator," feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Herbarry, Highgate, near London."

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

(No. 5.)

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.

Tuesday, October 19.—MY DEAR RYAN.—With the exception of Paganini, no artist, within the last quarter of a century, has made so great a sensation at the Académie Royale de Musique, as Alboni. The first night's success was not a mere excitement of the moment, the explosion of a long train of preparatory puffing, cautiously laid by cunning hands, but a legitimate triumph, the natural result of a splendid exhibition of talent, which, from being unanticipated, told with tenfold power; on the second night it was substantiated, on the third confirmed, and on the fourth ratified beyond further questioning. By this you will rightly presume that Alboni has appeared twice since I last wrote, instead of only once, as was expected. Her reception was so tremendous on Wednesday evening, that MM. Duponchel, and Roqueplan, after much persuasion, induced the celebrated singer to give one more "last night," on the Friday following, when the theatre was crammed to the roof, many hundreds, eager to hear her, being unable, at any price, to obtain admission. Could Alboni have been argued into setting aside her Pesth engagement, she might safely have undertaken twenty more performances in succession; the house would be filled, every night, to the ceiling, so great is the desire to hear her.

The programmes of the third and fourth nights were precisely the same as on the second. The attraction of the pieces included therein was so great that there was no necessity for any change. So that I need hardly tell you, as yet, the Parisians scarcely know the hundredth part of what Alboni can do. As you walk along the Boulevards, at night, almost every third person you meet is humming the refrain of the "Brindisi," which, pretty as it undoubtedly is, was never thought anything of by the Parisians, until they heard it from the lips of Alboni, whence it issued refreshed with new life and vigour. Poor Donizetti!—how would he have been pleased to hear his melody expressed in such honeyed accents.

[En parenthèse :—The present was hardly the time to issue the criticism which appeared in the last number of the Musical World. Not only, however, do I object to it, as inappos, at a period when the subject of it is perhaps on his death-bed, but I utterly dissent from the opinions it supports. If the writer can find no melody in Donizetti, he ought to be endowed with the ears of Midas, presuming that additional length of oraculars may be accompanied by an acuter sense of hearing. The very tune of which I have just spoken, "Brindisi," would alone prove Donizetti to possess the gift of melody; it is as fresh as a new-born violet, and as natural and easy as it is original. Moreover, he has written many such, besides others of a higher and more pathetic character.]

I promised you some extracts from the criticisms of the feuilletonistes, apropos of Alboni. Were I to translate the articles entire it would fill your whole number; I shall, therefore, content myself with some specimens from the best of them, which will make you acquainted through the medium of their own words, with the opinions of these distinguished and popular writers. To begin, then, with the Journal des Débats. M. Hector Berlioz, one of the most justly celebrated of living critics, thus commences his apostrophe :—

DEBUT OF MADEMOISELLE ALBONI.

"Here was one of those displays of unbounded enthusiasm which have for a long time been unknown to the Opera. The applause, the clamorous admiration, the bouquets thrown by les dames du public,* the encores, the re-calls, all this tumult of a real triumph, emanated from a sentiment equally real, of which the manoeuvres of friends, leaders, manipulators, and vendors of success, in nothing diminished the sincerity. It is such a pleasure to hear real singing! It is so rare; and voices at once beautiful, natural, expressive, flexible, and in tune, are so very uncommon! The voice of Mdlle. Alboni possesses these excellent qualities in the highest degree of perfection. It is a magnificent contralto, of immense range (two octaves and six notes; nearly three octaves—from low E to C in alt), the quality perfect throughout, even in the lowest notes of the inferior register, which are generally so disastrous to the majority of singers who fancy they possess a contralto, and the emission of which resembles nearly always a rattle, hideous notes in such cases, and revolting to the ear. Mdlle. Alboni's vocalisation is wonderfully easy; few sopranos exhibit equal facility. The registers of her voice are so perfectly united, that in her scales you do not feel sensible of the passage from one to the other; the tone is unctuous, caressing, velvety, melancholy, like that of all contraltos, though less sombre than that of Pisaroni, and incomparably more pure and limpid. As the notes are produced without effort, the voice yields itself to every nuance of intensity; and thus, Mdlle. Alboni can sing from the most mysterious piano to the most brilliant forte. And this alone is what I call singing humanly—that is to say in a fashion that declares the presence of a human heart, of a human soul, of a human intelligence. Singers unpossessed of these indispensable qualities, should, in my opinion, be ranged under the category of mechanical instruments."

M. Berlioz then indulges in some severe strictures on this unhappily large class of vocalists, which, as they do not immediately concern the point in hand, I shall refrain from transcribing here. He concludes with an anecdote about Handel, to which, as Fielding says, I have only one objection—that it is not true. This anecdote relates that the great composer of the Messiah, exasperated with the frigid insipidity of one of these "filles de marbre," laid hold of her, in the middle of a rehearsal, and pushed her out of the window! M. Berlioz adds with reason that Mdlle. Alboni will never

* That is not by persons appointed for the purpose; as is too often the case.

I am too much a John Bull, to allow a compatriot, a lady, and a fellow-artist, to be cajoled and ill-treated, either at home or abroad. I have already a clue, which I shall follow up steadfastly, and, in case of any eventual foul play, you may rely upon a full exposure of all the parties concerned. Meanwhile, let us hope that Miss Birch may speedily have her rights, and that I shall have nothing less pleasant to record than her triumph on the French Opera boards. I do not believe a word of a report which goes about, that M. ——— objects to Miss Birch's debut, on account of his fair protégée, Mlle. ———, who will be the actual representative of the Princess, when Guillaume Tell is produced. I do not believe one word of it—albeit a witty feuilletoniste did inform me that the motto of the illustrious composer of fifty operas was "Ici on se tutoie—essayez vous les pieds, s'il vous plait?"—stigmatizing the great man with the two-visaged morality of which poets have occasionally made Janus the sign. N'importe, if I find it necessary I shall respect neither persons nor names—and the Musical World, as you know, lies upon the tables of all the principal cercles and cafés in Paris. Moreover, Miss Birch has another friend in Paris, and a powerful.

To talk of something more agreeable and less wrapped in moral mist—I have received a letter from Brussels, which informs me of the brilliant reception of Carlotta Grisi at the Grand Opera. The queen of dancers has already appeared in Le Diable à Quatre and the Jolie Fille de Gand, while Giselle and, above all, Esmeralda are preparing. M. Auguste Nourrit, whose affairs have lately been in nowise prosperous, is now in a fair way of retrieving all his ill-luck; Fortune smiles upon him, and the twinkling of Carlotta's charming feet, has been echoed by the tinkling of five-franc pieces and golden Leopolds, which have showered abundantly into the treasury. As I guessed the six representations for which Carlotta was pledged have multiplied into twelve, and, instead of going to the Hague, as was anticipated, she will pass her whole month's leave of absence in Brussels—a fact upon which the good Belgians felicitate themselves mightily, and wherefrom the rail-road from Ghent, Bruges, Liege, Malines, Louvain, Tiselemont, and even Namur at one corner, and Ostend at the other, derives infinite profit, since every convoi brings new visitors to Brussels, eager to see, zealous to applaud, and unanimous to admire the most graceful and fascinating and perfect of all the daughters of Terpsichore. The following is a short extract from the letter I mention; for the details I can find neither time nor space:—

"Since I wrote to you last Carlotta has made her début with a success not more brilliant than her deserts, but quite unprecedented at the Brussels Opera. You, who know the lethargic constitution of the Brussels public, will scarcely be able to credit me when I tell you that the good "burghers" beat the English, and even the Italians, in the warmth of their enthusiasm. Flowers, coronals, sonnets, and other poetical effusions, unite in abundance, to fête and pay homage to Carlotta, than whom no goddess of the ancients was ever worshipped with greater pomp and ceremony. Come here, and I promise you some good operas, some pleasant company, some Belgian dinners, and ballets such as can only be where Carlotta presides at the helm."

The Parisians may therefore console themselves in the absence of their favorite, by the certainty that their judgment is respected and her merits appreciated.

Have you heard that Grisi and Mario have signed an engagement for St. Petersburg? It appears that their engagement with M. Vatel—homme malheureux!—expires next month, and that it will not be resumed. This is a deadly loss to Paris, and a wonderful acquisition for the capital of the Russias. You may easily imagine how the magnificent Grisi will be fêted, and how the graceful Mario will be admired! By the way, for a wonder, I was very much pleased the other night at the Italiens. The opera was Il Barbiere. The Figaro of Ronconi was transcendent; he sang in the most masterly style, and his acting was overflowing with drollery and humor. I never in my life heard Mario sing with more wonderful finish, more intense and varied expression; while Lablache was more than ever irresistible in Bartolo; and Persiani, who happened to be in excellent voice, vocalised in such a manner as left all competitors in her peculiar school at an immeasurable distance. In Basilio, Polonini failed, and the orchestra, chorus, and mise en scène—what a contrast to the Royal Italian Opera—were in the usual style that characterises the performances in M. Vatel's establishment, and gave new aliment to the charges of the Corsaire, and the biting irony of Fiorentino, who treats the unlucky impresario even worse than the old man of the mountain treated Sinbad the Sailor, unmercifully riding him to death. I fear that M. Vatel will, unlike Sinbad, be able to devise no scheme to rid himself of his pitiless persecutor. Signor Costa has been a day or two in Paris; he arrived last Sunday, I believe, from Italy, en route for London, where he will doubtless be, ere this dispatch reaches you. The celebrated chef d'orchestre was present at the performance of Il Barbiere, to which I have just alluded; he gives a most disastrous account of Italian music in general, and with the exception of one acquisition (and that, which I am not yet at liberty to specialise, may be reckoned on as a jewel) has been able to find nothing worthy of his own great establishment in London; it appears also from his statement, that every Italian singer of note makes an express clause in his or her engagement with impresarii, that they are not to be asked to sing in Verdi's operas, which having of late caused the untimely dissolution of two feeble tenors, at Venice, has frightened all the rest of them out of their wits.

Rosati, the danseuse, is in Paris, but I do not hear of any likelihood of her appearing at the Opera. Flora Fabbri is also here, and will shortly make her rentrée; meanwhile the action at law, pending between her and Mr. Bunn (who, I am delighted to find getting on so triumphantly at the Surrey, and whose advertised "Word with Punch" is the object of general curiosity here) is rapidly coming to a crisis. Benedict has also arrived in Paris, en route for London. His opera, The Crusaders, which was to have been produced lately at Stuttgart, has been unavoidably postponed by a melancholy event—the death of Madame Pischek, wife of the celebrated barytone, who is now at Prague lamenting his ir retrievable loss. Benedict will return, however, next month, to Stuttgart, and The Crusaders will then be produced under his superintendence. He gives a glowing account of the reception of Jenny Lind at Berlin; it appears that the madness of the Londoners is but coldness by the side of the rabid intoxication of the Prussians. It is true that the German papers recount, in significant terms, the entire failure of the "Swedish Nightingale" in Der Freischütz; but of course that stands for nothing; so long as Jenny Lind can excite unheard-of enthusiasm in La Figlia and I Masnadieri, what does she care about the vieilles of Weber, Mozart, and other second-rate composers? Having concluded her present engagement at Berlin, the "Nightingale" has declined all other offers, and has retired to her nest at Stockholm, where she will rest her weary wings until Mr. Lumley requires her services next season, at Her Majesty's Theatre. I hear she has been offered fabulous sums, un argent fou, as the French call it; but nothing can make the charming songstress give up the advantages of her winter-sleep. She is completely tired of triumphs, and her voice, already worn and wearied by over exertion, demands both care and medicine. I strongly recommend her to take two or three boxes of Stolberg's lozenges, the panacea of panaceas, which Paracelsus only dreamed of, but Dr. Stolberg realized substantially, for the comfort and benefit of the whole race of vocalists, male and female, biped and quadruped, feathered and unfeathered. At Berlin, Jenny Lind sang no less than six nights in succession, and so difficult was it to gain admission that even Benedict, who, by the prerogative, of calling, talent, and position, ought to have free ingress to all the theatres of the world, was compelled to pay six thalers (eighteen shillings) for a sorry place, anywhere or nowhere. Now that Jenny Lind has quitted Berlin, Mr. Lumley is daily expected in Paris, where, doubtless, his diplomatic genius will bring forth fruit, ripe and plentiful.

On Monday, the Feast of All Saints, Paris was like a beehive, or an ant-hill, absolutely swarming with living beings: The Champs Elysees presented the most animated and brilliant spectacle I ever beheld in my existence. Among the motley crowd so careless, so joyous, so eager for pleasure, a pale thin figure, with a countenance wan and worn, a frail and bending form, a melancholy smile, and a step as silent as a ghost's crossed me on the Boulevard des Italiens, and flitted into the door-way of the Café Riche, unobserved and unobserving. My companion, who marked the evident impression made upon me by this living phantom, inquired—"Do you know that man?" On my answering in the negative, he rejoined, with an accent full of sympathy and feeling, "It is Chopin." And he has been thus for nearly ten years—one step more would launch him into eternity.

The Theatre Francais has at length made its first grand coup. A new comedy was produced on Friday, under the title of Les Aristocraties. M. Etienne Arago, a political writer of democratic principles, is the author. To write a comedy in five acts, and in verse, was pronounced by Voltaire l'œuvre du démon. The aim of the Aristocraties, however, appears to me sufficiently flat for a demon. All the world allows that there are other aristocracies besides that of birth; for example, wealth, talent, &c. Had M. Arago told us this in a distich-epigrammatic, we should have answered, "all right, old fellow, we knew that long ago." But M. Arago is not so short-winded. He is determined to preach a sermon on his darling theory, and takes five acts of rhymed couplets to do it. Allow his position; let there be aristocracies, one, two, three, and four; let their names be Birth, Wealth, "Military," and Talent; and let Talent be the worthiest of the four—what then? This matter established, which is indisputable as a truism, does not prove that M. Arago has written a good comedy. On the contrary; he has merely shown us that another aristocracy may be added to the four-in-hand, which he drives with such evident satisfaction through the streets and thoroughfares of platitude—the aristocracy of dulness. M. Arago represents this "aristocracy" himself, with the magnanimity of a Quintus Curtius. The Roman sacrificed himself to the weal of his country by leaping into a gulf; M. Arago sacrifices himself to the weal of his profession by writing a comedy; the gulf closed its jaws, and swallowed up the life of Curtius; the abyss of sentiment has equally swallowed up the dramatic reputation of M. Arago; there was no danger from the gulf after the disappearance of Curtius; there will be no danger of any one attempting a five-act comedy in verse, on any such subject as the Aristocraties after the discomfiture of M. Arago—for that M. Arago is discomfited I must aver, in the teeth of the clacque, and the brilliant essay of M. Jules Janin, which is worth 100,000 crowns to M. Arago's comedy, and has more wit, poetry and humour in it than can be found in the whole of M. Arago's five acts in verse. M. Arago should dedicate twelve golden candlesticks to the gifted feuilletoniste, who has built him a reputation in a day—and all because M. Janin wished to show that the Journal des Debats was conscientious enough, and liberal enough, and independent enough, and Quixotic enough, to praise the effort of a democrat in its columns—which did by no means astonish anybody—for now-a-days journalism has no party. Tant mieux.

But of the comedy, and of the actors, Madlle. Brohan, Madlle. Judith, Madlle. Mantes, MM. Provost, Regnier, Mirecourt, Geoffroi, and the rest, and of many other matters too long to mention now, I must defer speaking at length till my next. The hand of the clock on the Bourse, within a stone's throw of which I am now not writing, approaches the figure five—and the post waits for no man less than a Prime Minister, or an Ambassador. Good bye, for the present, and believe me, ever yours, D.

THE ITALIANS AND THE FEUILLETONISTES.

FROM two clever feuilletons by MM. Fiorentino and Gustave Héquet, we have translated a few stray passages, which, as they concern some of the popular Italian artists, will doubtless interest our readers. M. Fiorentino, in a very intelligent review of the performance of Don Giovanni, at the Italiens, offers the following sensible remarks relative to the Leporello of

"The colossal size of Lablache is altogether opposed to the part of Leporello, and renders the illusion impossible. I have heard many persons express great astonishment, and lament that Lablache had made the character of Leporello too prominent—obtrusive perhaps—and altered, in some respects, by too great a shew of pleasantry, and by too jovial and burlesque a physiognomy, the ensemble and seriousness of the work. Lablache is too great an artiste, too finished a comedian, too spiritual, too sensible to be ignorant that Leporello is no buffoon. Leporello is the good sense personified—he is the positive by the side of the ideal—the Sancho by the side of Don Quixote. As rusé as Figaro, as devoted as Caleb, Leporello adores his master; he weeps for him—excuses him before the world; but in secret, en tête à tête with his master, he does not fail to read him sound lectures. And it is he who amuses Don Juan in a sovereign manner. A little of a liar, a little of a gourmand, a little of a libertine, since it is necessary that vices should degenerate in their transit from master to man, Leporello is never involved in crime. The imperty of Don Juan makes him shudder. If he obey his orders, it is only against his inclinations, and in terror of his master's sword; and if he be subservient to his criminal designs, he never fails to warn the victims; and, after some dreadful day of treacheries, duels, and murders—after a night spent in orgies and debaucheries, I am sure that Leporello, retired into a corner, finds time yet to pray to God in secret for his own soul, and the soul of his master. Worthy Leporello!

Lablache is not an artiste to whom the nuances of character can be unknown, or unappreciable. Nobody understands better this tremendous chef d'œuvre. But it was necessary, so thought he, with all his power, to smooth each anxious brow; it was necessary, whatever might be the consequence, to drive away that dark and brooding ennui, which stretched its gloom, as a bat its pinions, over the listless audience; it was necessary to amuse the provincials, who flocked in crowds to the Italiens on the evening in question, and who, in their ignorance of the opera so loudly bepraised, and of the singers whose pompous eulogies were so far and high emblazoned, remained, as it were, glued to their seats, with necks extended, with mouths all agape, and eyeballs darting from their heads. This is the reason why Lablache gave himself so much trouble, and indulged in so many extra displays of activity; this is the reason why he introduced more French words and phrases than he is accustomed to do; in fine, this is the reason why the artiste par excellence, for one instant descended to the level of the public. Lablache is so truly devoted to the interests of the theatre to which he belongs, and undertakes its cause with so much warmth, that he would even compromise his high artistic name to save his director."

In a notice of the same performance, M. Héquet (of the "National") thus apostrophises the Don Giovanni of Coletti.

COLETTI.

"It is evident Nature never intended Signor Coletti to play the character of Don Giovanni. I say it, without circumlocution or periphrasis, because, all things considered, it cannot take from him the claims, which he possesses by right, on the esteem of the public. On the contrary, in the very first scene, Signor Coletti proves himself not to be the man who could surprise and force a woman. He kills the commandant, and plainly shows the audience that he was but young in deed, and never killed commandant before, since he kills him as no Don ever yet killed man. When he attempts to seduce Zerlina, each spectator says to himself, "My God! what an excellent family man Signor Coletti must be!" In the finale to the first act, when Zerlina cries from within, in piteous tones, "Gente, aita! aita, gente!" we feel somewhat surprised that the good folks on the stage do not answer, with one voice, "Oh, nonsense! be quiet—Signor Coletti is incapable of so black a crime—we don't believe it." Signor Coletti, nevertheless, is a man of talent, who has received from nature a very fine voice, which he manages artistically and with taste; but he is too much of a good man to imagine the unbridled egotism, the diabolic pride, the ferocious and libidinous desires of that sublime incarnation of wickedness, whom the Abbé Da Ponte, after Molière, has created, and Mozart made sing. Everybody knows that this Italian Don Juan, so freshly lyrical, so original, so new, after that of Molière, is the work of a priest!—of a priest, in truth! who was as well suited to the sacerdotal robes as Signor Coletti is to play characters like Don Giovanni. He was a man of wit, and, I might almost say, of genius. In his old age he cast off his monk's habit, and emigrated to America. Garcia, the great tenor, and who perhaps of all singers best understood and could best impersonate Don Juan,* encountered in New York, about the year 1830, the old collaborateur of Mozart. It is to be hoped that Garcia played Don Juan before him—indeed he owed him so much. The ex-abbé was then upwards of eighty years of age. He had a wife and several children, for whom he gained an indifferent livelihood by teaching Italian to the fair-haired daughters of the New World. But let us leave Da Ponte and return to his interpreters."

Further on we find the following from the same pen in respect of

MADAME CASTELLAN.

"As for Madame Castellan she has no reservation to hope from me: I shall tell the plain truth in plain terms. Madame Castellan's voice is somewhat feeble, but sweet, mellow, and sympathetic. The lower notes are good, and the upper notes have a charming sonority when they are not forced. Her vocalising is neat, correct, and graceful, and it is evident that she has studied her art with determination and assiduity. Her style possesses elegance and much expression. Add to this, youth and very agreeable personal traits. Unfortunately when she sings, she has a fashion of half closing her eyes, and opening her mouth a travers, which has by no means a happy appearance. I have promised her the truth without reservation, and I keep my word. My criticism has been proffered with no other intent than to point out to the fair artiste faults which may be so easily amended. The success of Madame Castellan has been brilliant and legitimate. We congratulate M. Vatel on this excellent acquisition to his troupe. If his subscribers pardon him for having forgotten Alboni, it will be through the mediation of Madame Castellan."

And, still lower down, the following about the accomplished

MARIO.

"In the Lucia di Lammermoor Mario sustained the part of Edgar. I do not know what it is that has happened to Signor Mario, what example has struck him, what noble emulation has piqued him, but he sung the grand scena in the last act very differently indeed from what we have heard him on any former occasion. Anterior to the present performance, his voice was, as it always is, sweet and captivating—but it was devoid of expression: it merely flattered the ear—to-day it penetrates to the inmost soul. It seizes on the listener, moves him, makes him thrill and weep. It is, in fact, a complete transformation. Signor Mario is now certainly the most delightful tenor on the lyric stage. If he would endeavour to combine with his great vocal abilities the talents of a comedian what would remain for others? After the late transformation we witnessed in the Lucia, we cannot answer when the improvement in Signor Mario will cease."

We shall further consult the Parisian feuillitonistes from time to time, and offer anything we may find of sufficient interest to the consideration of our readers. Meantime, we take leave to conclude with another extract from the article of M. Fiorentino, which involves a triple and a triple-merited compliment to Grisi, Mario, and the Royal Italian Opera.

"The Theatre Italien has given Don Giovanni four times. What we have just said of Alboni may be also referred to Grisi and Mario. Mario is, without contradiction, the most accomplished tenor on the stage. If the theatre possessed such singers as he, nothing could be more perfect. He is young, handsome, in all the power and freshness of his talent: his voice is beautiful, and subservient to a rare intelligence: born and educated in the highest circle of society, he is endowed with its manner and its distinction. Who can sing like him, with the same ease and success, serious and buffo parts? He possesses flexibility and largeness, expression and grace, energy and purity. Dark and impassioned in Otello, tender in Lucia, touching in Lucrezia Borgia and the Puritani, he is graceful, brilliant, comic in the Matrimonio Segreto, the Barbiere, and Don Pasquale. There is no work in the repertoire in which Mario has no character—and none which he does not fill to perfection.

La Grisi, with her imperial and superb head, her queenly brow, her magnificent bust, hewn, as it were, from the most beautiful marble of Paros, has no rival to fear in the loftiest rôles of lyric tragedy. This she proved lately in London, where she sustained, in her single person, the entire weight of the repertoire; and where each time that other comattrici, even the most celebrated, attempted to personate her characters, they have failed in the most signal manner. Nevertheless, it is time that Grisi and Mario, whose talents are of the highest order, should exhibit these talents in new works. I am astonished, indeed, that these artistes can sing for ten years the same notes without gaping in the face of the spectators. Don Giovanni is an imperishable chef-d'œuvre, but the more sublime the work is, the more perfect should be the execution. To appreciate truly this work of the mighty master, one should have heard at the Royal Italian Opera, in London, the magnificent finale of the first act, with a triple orchestra, conducted by Costa, with its numerous chorus, and a dazzling mise en scene—a performance worthy of Mozart. The minuet was danced by Fanny Elssler and Adele Dumilatre. Singers, band, dancers, chorus, all seemed penetrated with the most profound reverence—with a sentiment almost religious—for this divine music. It is thus, indeed, that homage should be rendered to genius."

To every word of which we say, amen! from the very bottom of our understandings and our hearts.

A Treatise on the "Affinities" of Goëthe,

IN ITS WORLD-HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE,

DEVELOPED ACCORDING TO ITS MORAL AND ARTISTICAL VALUE,

Translated from the German of Dr. Heinrich Theodor Ritscher,
Professor at the Royal Gymnasium at Bromberg.

THE ARTIFICIAL COMPOSITION OF "THE AFFINITIES."

HOWEVER often we turn to the artistical composition of the "Affinities," we shall never grow weary of admiring the extraordinary simplicity of the external means and of the whole action of our work, which with the slightest motives, a *staffage almost uniform, with positions and events but little complicated, with a very small number of figures produces the highest effects. Considered from this point of view there is no work of art in the whole novel-literature, which to him who only seeks for an external gratification, for that which we call a material interest in the development of incidents, and the excitement thus produced, can be more unsatisfactory than our "Affinities." Because every thing takes place within the individualities, because the whole development occurs in the field of internalness, the novel requires for its comprehension a mind extremely cultivated in every respect. The composition of the artist is here everything: the mere matter, on the other hand, is nothing. What indeed is more common than a couple of married people, who through their feelings are powerfully attracted by two individualities, to whom, by virtue of their position, they cannot belong. And yet all turns upon this

* Query—Better than Ambrogetti and Tamburini. [Ed. M. W.]

single point. But what wealth in its development, what a charm in the exhibition of the state of feelings, which have grown to such visible clearness, that we can thoroughly live through every one of them, without any sacrifice of the ideality. The whole presents us with the fullest reality, with an event of every day occurrence, with the simplest circumstances, and yet, at the same time, it is a creation of the highest art, penetrated by an all present zeal, which has formed every organ of its body into an important sign of its invisible activity.

As the antique Epos was the poetical expression of the heroic condition of the world, and the purest organ for its collective interests and relations, so does the genuine novel in its highest form reflect the life elements of our modern existence, and reveal to us the soul of the world's present condition. Corresponding to the Epos in this, that both reveal an entire concrete view of the world, they differ essentially in this, that the antique Epos gives an exhibition of a condition of the world, which (exhibition) is most objective, and most independent, so to speak, of the subjectivity of the poet, while the novel, on the other hand, as a subjective epopee always develops to us—the concrete relations as reflected in the subject, nay, as in reality, so in a work of art, allows them to arise as products of internalness, and subjective intuition.* In this sense our "Affinities" is the modern Epos of marriage, which pursues the whole present condition of the world, and the interests of modern life down to the moral basis of marriage, and therein allows them to be recognised.

This already implies, that our novel limits itself to the district of its development, and excludes the comfortable diffuseness of an epic unfolding. While everything within that district gravitates towards marriage, it cannot contract itself to a field, which is extremely narrow, and cannot carry us into a broad stream of events and complications, amid which we lose sight of the simple relation. In this respect the "Affinities" seems to us the most decided contrast to "Wilhelm Meister," which, in conformity with its aim, has to extend, in epic development the most manifold circumstances of life, a wealth of the most different individualities, while the "Affinities" on the contrary, in conformity with its subject, is directed towards limitation. Contrasted with "Wilhelm Meister" it bears the same relation as that of the Epos, which embraces all the states of the heroic age, to the limited action of an antique drama.

Simple as are the action and the relations in our work, equally inobtrusive are the surrounding objects,† while they belong to the highest art, as Solger has very properly acknowledged. Feeling the weight and importance of the former, this thinker saw in the details of the circumstances the visible garb of the personalities. They are to him the daily life, in which the personality expresses itself, so far as it comes into external contact with others, and distinguishes itself from them. There always continues to be a homogeneous expression, while the interior is violently changed. This change is fearfully striking, if once the glance falls upon the peculiar circumstances, which always continue the same, or progress homogeneously.

Sensible and true as is this notion of Solger's, it by no means comprises the whole deep import of the surrounding objects in the "Affinities;" nay their proper artificial effect seems to us to proceed from a totally different element. We will endeavour to develop this, and thus to give an insight into the internal workshop of our romance. And, in the first place, we agree with Solger that the surrounding details form the garment of this personality, in which the latter externally displays itself. The laying out of the grounds, upon which the individuals of the action bestow so much care, and the progress of which is a constant back ground to the whole, is a product of that grade of refined cultivation, which everywhere impresses upon natural things the stamp of the human mind;—which converts nature into an ornament for ourselves, and makes it a copy of our personality. While in the laying out of the gardens and parks, Nature is, as it were, forced to adapt herself to our views, and to express our intentions, so does the poet, by such surrounding objects, place us in a state of existence, which has man and man alone for its creator, and in harmony with the whole comfortable state of an advanced cultivation, to which our individuals belong, everywhere, as far as his power extends—freely subject nature to himself, and make it a copy of his own views. But this existence, in which, down to the minutest details, the human impress is visible, in which nothing is left in its immediate natural form, but all has felt the mastery of the human will—into this existence, we say, breaks the natural force of feeling, smooths its own paths, and in its power scoffs at the work, which the hand of man and human freedom have produced. In this contrast lies the highest poetical effect. Everything, we may say, in our work gives us a view of a pure human creation, produced out of freedom. The marriage itself, the comfortable existence arising from a tasteful employment of wealth, the park which is formed before us with the greatest care—all, in short, shows us both in the moral and in the natural sphere a pure human dominion, a free creation of the human mind. All in our work of art is wrought up to this view, that the contrast of that unfree natural force, which leads into this human existence, may come forward with a real shock.

It is in the objects which surround the individuals that we first truly perceive this contrast, and it appears to us, like a deep irony, that those who, with so much mastery, rule over external Nature, and to whose views she must conform, are so exposed to the storm of an internal natural force. This contrast is naturally heightened, as well as its effect, with the increasing passion, and with the variance, which becomes more and more incurable, while the objects laid out and formed by human hands look on quietly, and present, unchanged, the picture of a state of things, in which no place seems to be accorded to mere natural force. From what we have said, it results that the æsthetic effect in the change of surrounding objects rests essentially upon contrasts of thought, which here immediately press forward, and are, as it were, in a naïve manner brought to view. The same contradiction between freedom and natural necessity, which was recognized by us as the soul of the entire action, involuntarily comes forward here also, since these very objects, belonging to a nature changed and formed by the human will into an ornament, and according to our pleasure, of themselves direct our glances to the contrast of an immediate nature not included in us.

No. LVIII.

LIFE does not flow in one continued course
So that its parts all with each other blend,
Each one beginning at another's end,
And each one in its turn a goal and source.
No, there are points where the stream gathers force,
And suddenly appears its course to mend,
As though to some new destiny 'twould tend—
Such points with joy we think on—or remorse.
And thus it was when first thine eyes met mine,
The changeless course of years at once was broken,
And all around the scene was new and strange;
And though the image be not always thine
That fills my soul; yet still through thee was spoken
That word of fate, which bade my life be new. N. D.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—How Shakspeare surpasses all dramatists, past and present, in the fitness and construction of his plays for scenic representation is every day made more manifest. How our forefathers could have permitted the unhallowed alterations of the playwrights is not quite so evident. It is positively inconceivable that the audiences of any period could have endured such desecration of their favourite poet. In no single instance has the re-modelling of Shakspeare's plays for the stage been an improvement, and in most cases the alteration is a disgrace to the perpetrators, a disgrace to those who sat to endure it, and a disgrace to the country at large. Thanks to our stars, we have fallen upon brighter days. The spirit of innovation that walks abroad has yet respect and reverence for the works of genius. But restitution, like reformation, as it is slow and gradual, must depend on time for its results. It has been reserved for the present age, we might say, for the last lustrum of the present age, to restore to our stage the works of our great poet in their purity and integrity. To Macready, certainly, is due the primal honour of this glorious undertaking. Many years ago, when he was at Covent Garden, he revived Richard the Third, almost as Shakspeare wrote it, and rescued one entire scene from the pilfering grasp of Nicholas Rowe. He did not go far enough, but he made the first step on the road of restitution. More late, when Covent Garden was under his own management, he made still further advances in presenting to the public the plays of Shakspeare, denuded of the interpolations of Garrick, Nahum Tate, and Cibber, the glorious triad of meddlers, who have made themselves infamous in the annals of the stage. The revivals of The Tempest, Henry the Fifth, King Lear, and other plays, will hand Macready's name to posterity, written in more bright and living characters, than even his transcendent talents as an actor. The spirit he set a-foot did not linger round the glories of Covent Garden and Drury Lane. It wended eastward and waved its banners over the little temple of Sadler's Wells. From thence it has lately flown over roof and spire, back to the west, and now beams round the long neglected shrine of "Marylebone," with a true and steady, if not a brilliant lustre. More recent still we have seen its light diffused with purer rays in that tiny temple of taste, yeapt the Haymarket Theatre. The re-production of The Taming of the Shrew at the Haymarket is undoubtedly one of the most complete that, in this age of restitution, has yet been given to the stage. The text of Shakspeare is adhered to to the letter, and not a line is omitted which propriety could preserve. But not only is the text closely followed, the very stage directions are observed, and the play is witnessed, exactly as Shakspeare intended it should be played, and as it was played in his time. There is no doubt had Shakspeare lived in our scenic-loving age, he would either have omitted the Induction, as cramping the mise en scene, which dramatic exigencies appear now to demand, or he would have transferred the action of the comedy, in the stage directions, to some more appropriate locale than a bed-chamber, in which it is intended it should be exhibited. The Taming of the Shrew, as now performed at the Haymarket, is entirely devoid of scenery, excepting two introduced in the Induction. The different scenes are merely signified by placards hung against the tapestry, on which are written the particular locale of the actors. Thus, in the first scene, Padua, a Public Place, is inscribed on the placard; and in scene the second, Before Hortensio's House, and so on. This is the only provision made to point out the change of place. Even between the acts, the Lord's bed-chamber, with Christopher Sly attended in state, is still presented to the spectator's view. Such was the fashion in which our ancestors, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, were wont to behold the dramas of William Shakspeare acted. Nor, in good sooth, strange as it may seem, does the mind seem to look for anything more in the scenery. We are inclined to think the exhibition of scenic splendour, magnificence of decoration, and completeness of detail rather deteriorates from, than adds to the reality, or verisimilitude, of stage representation. It is certain that too close an adherence to the pictorial destroys the poetical. When we witnessed the Taming of the Shrew, we felt no want of a change of scenery. In the first scene, upon the entrance of Lucentio and Tranio, when the placard indicated a Public Place in Padua, we as readily imagined ourselves in such a public place, as though the most delightful scene, and most truthful, was represented by the accomplished pencil of Mr. P. Phillips, or Stanfield himself. It must be allowed that as in The Taming of the Shrew, we have a play within a play, and as the spectator knows that it is being performed in a bedroom, he is naturally satisfied with such scenery, or its substitute, as a country mansion and a set of strolling players could furnish at an hour's notice: still from the play we cannot help feeling we have learned a lesson in stage painting, and that it were far better, in the performance, to attend to other things of greater need. But of this more by and bye. The acting of the Taming of the Shrew, at the Haymarket, is (we speak of it in the present tense, as it is being performed two, or three times a week) most excellent. We have seen Mrs. Nisbett in parts better suited to her. In the two first acts she was rather snappish and fretful, than froward and bold: but her acting in the two last acts was truthful and beautiful. Mr. Webster made a capital Petruchio, the best we have seen for a long while. Nothing could be more bluff, hearty, and good-tempered than he appeared throughout the play. Keeley's Grumio was deliciously comic. We never imagined he could fill out Shakspeare before. Mrs. Seymour was lady-like as Bianca. Of the other characters we must distinguish Mr. Brindal's Tranio as particularly good, albeit we should prefer his omitting the gag with the cloak when he and his master change apparel. The other characters were well supported. We thank Mr. Webster with all our hearts for this inimitable revival. Two or three such productions—where are they to be had?—and echo answers, &c.—would do more to advance the true interests of his house than forty modern plays, whose success is only upheld by partisanship. We would be just, not invidious.

* The novel, says Göthe, is a subjective epopee, in which the author allows himself to treat the world in his own fashion. The only question is whether he has a fashion;—the rest will come of itself.—Dr. Röscher's note.

† "Umgebungen," that is to say, the scene and circumstances, which surround the principal figures.—Translator.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—The concerts at Drury Lane continue to attract most crowded and fashionable audiences. Indeed, we may say, we never remember M. Jullien's entertainments to be so well attended. During the first few nights the promenade was so densely thronged that it was considered advisable to erect barriers at either side of the orchestra. This has been found a necessary accommodation as it tends greatly to break the pressure of the multitude. Other alterations have been made with a view to the public convenience. The programme is varied nightly, on each occasion one classical morceau being given. We attended on Saturday night last, when the house presented a most brilliant aspect, the boxes being completely filled with the elite of fashionables at present in London. Among others we recognized His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge in a private box, who seemed greatly to relish the entire performance. His Royal Highness expressed aloud his admiration of the band, after the allegretto movement from Beethoven's symphony in F. He seemed no less delighted with Piatti's violoncello solo, which followed. We never heard, on any instrument, anything more exquisite, on more perfect, than this young artist's performance on Saturday night. He is positively the Paganini of his instrument. Not only is his execution faultless, and astonishing for its rapidity; his tone most beautiful and powerful, but he exhibits in his playing the finest taste, and the most genuine feeling. The tones he produces from the violoncello at different times resemble the violin, the tenor, and even the flute. His harmonics are marvellously perfect. We never dreamt of hearing such mastery on the instrument. Signor Piatti is certainly one of the first instrumentalists we ever listened to. At the close of his performance he obtained the most tremendous cheers from all parts of the house, the Royal Duke, himself no mean performer on the violoncello, applauding him most enthusiastically. Notwithstanding what we urged in our first notice respecting the Swiss Quadrille, from its continued and legitimate success, we are bound to admit that it is likely to become the most popular of all the composer's works. The introduction and finale have both been considerably abridged, and the melodies de danse are not now so much submerged as formerly in the symphonic frame-work of the composition. The introduction of the machinery, to which we objected as foreign to the purposes of music, is now altogether dispensed with; and a great improvement is manifest. The band, too, are decidedly more at home in their performance than on the first night, when the difficulties involved in M. Jullien's work were not mastered with that consummate ease we expect from this great instrumental corps on all occasions. The performance of the Swiss Quadrille is now quite perfect. We have heard several tourists, who have travelled through the Swiss cantons, express the warmest approval of M. Jullien's new work, not only as it brought back old friends to them in the national melodies, but as it so very happily and truthfully conveyed, as far as music could convey, an idea of a storm on the Swiss mountains. To the great majority of M. Jullien's audience the principal features of the new quadrille must be a sealed book, as it cannot be supposed that one in a hundred has visited the country of William Tell, and few therefore can form a notion of how closely the composer has imitated nature. Enough remains, however, to gratify even those whose highest mountain flight has not exceeded one hundred feet above the Zoological Gardens, or, in other words, the peak of Primrose Hill. The Swiss Quadrille is advancing nightly more and more into public favour, and, as we have said above, promises to become the most popular of the popular composer's works.

SURREY.—Balfé's opera of the Enchantress has been produced at this theatre in a style of great splendour and completeness. It has been, if possible, more successful than the Bohemian Girl. It is not necessary to criticise a work that has so frequently obtained our strictures and our approbation. The Enchantress, if not one of the composer's chef d'œuvres, is certainly one of his most dramatic works; and is, perhaps, better adapted than any other for scenic representation. The manager of the Surrey has caught the taste of his audience in a most miraculous way. Crowds are sent back nightly from the doors, and the enthusiasm of the auditors inside borders on an Italian furor. A new melodrama, called The Traveller's Room, written by Fitzball, in his own peculiar and exciting manner, has been produced lately, with great applause. It is played every night with the Enchantress, and both pieces, from their great success, will probably be run till Christmas.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

"Souvenir de Donizetti et Mariani;" containing the most admired subjects from the works of the above popular composers, arranged in the form of a "fantasia," for the pianoforte, by W. H. HOLMES.—ADDISON and HODSON.

A very brilliant and effective morceau without being too difficult. The composer has evidently indited the fantasia for proficient, or at least, for those who have made good progress in pianoforte playing. The introduction leads to the aria, "Ah! dolce guidami," from Donizetti's Anna Bolena, which is varied in a very happy manner. The next air introduced is also from Anna Bolena, "Come innocente, Giovane," treated with more suavity and grace; this leads to another theme taken from the same opera, "Cielo a miei lunghi," which will afford the performer great scope to exhibit his executive powers, the composer having written semidemi-quavers for both hands in two entire pages. The last morceau introduced is Mariani's well known air, "Stanca di piu," which Mr. Holmes has handled in an elegant and striking manner. A brilliant finale in allegretto concludes a most admirable fantasia.

"Shine on, thou bright beacon!" Song. The poetry suggested by a seal with the motto, "Si je te perds, je suis perdu;" a mariner in a boat at sea, and one lone star in the sky: composed by COSMO ALEXANDER HEPBURN, Esq.—R. MILLS.

This song does not aim at any particular musical excellence. The air is simple and the harmonies obvious. It possesses, however, sweetness and expression, which, to most lovers of modern ballads, more than make amends for novelty of conception or mastery in arrangement. The words are well written.

"C. Goodban's Vocal Album;" containing four songs, two duets, and trio: The words by various Authors; the Music composed by CHARLES GOODBAN, Mus. Bac. Oxon.—J. ALFRED NOVELLO.

Mr. Goodban has given us in this work, a very pleasing set of vocal pieces. There are seven morceaux in the collection, of which, to our thinking, the first and fifth are the best. No. 1, "The Blind Girl's Hope," is a tender and neatly written ballad in E. flat, 3-4 time. The accompaniments are appropriate and effective. No. 5, "Faire Daffodils,"—Herrick's exquisite and well-known complaint, is a duet in F, 3-8, and is very sweetly written. It is, nevertheless, scarce quaint enough, but this will pass the knowledge of most hearers, and will be recognised as no want by the purchaser. Mr. Goodban has written the words to three of the seven compositions. We cannot praise his poetry as much as we can his music. It is strange that a Bachelor of one of the learned Universities should make "intervene" an active verb. Sorrow may "intervene," but it cannot be said to "intervene its clouds" between two objects. It is no less strange, than one gifted with a sensitive musical ear should rhyme "scenes" with "beams," "smile" with "trial," and "roam" with "shone." But too often do musicians fancy there is no craft in writing verses, and so, poor easy men they are tempted to manufacture their own metre, and in almost every instance they betray their ignorance of the commonest rules of versification, as we have frequently had occasion to show. Mr. Goodban's Album is, notwithstanding, a very meritorious work.

1. "In the joyous Spring;" Song, the words written by EDWARD J. GILL; the music composed by SIDNEY NELSON.
2. "Italia shall be free;" a Roman song of liberty, written by J. W. LAKE, Esq.; the music composed by SIDNEY NELSON.—ADDISON and HODSON.

The first of these compositions is a pleasing ballad; though something of the popularly common is apparent in its melody. It is nicely written for the voice, and will suit the generality of singers. No. 2 is altogether better as a composition, and will make a capital song for a barytone voice. In both instances Mr. Nelson has been successful in the arrangements.

"Mid waving trees" Duet, sung by Miss A. and M. WILLIAMS; Poetry by GEORGE LINLEY, Esq.; Music composed by JULES BENEDET.—ADDISON and HODSON.

A very elegant and effective duo, for two female voices. Mr. Benedict seldom pursues the common track in his compositions; and though the subject of the present duet is not strikingly original, he has exhibited much ingenuity in the introduction of novel phrases; and his manner of writing for the voices is entirely after his own fashion. This duet must find a host of admirers, albeit the words have nothing whatsoever to recommend them.

"The Standard Lyric Drama," Vol. I. The Marriage of Figaro, Part V. J. BOOSKY & Co.

The Marriage of Figaro will be completed with No. 6; on the 1st of January the first part of Norma will be issued. We most strongly advise our musical friends to avail themselves of this admirable work. In a few years, by becoming subscribers, they will have a complete and perfect operatic library, at one-tenth of the price for which the same amount of music, without a tythe of its excellence, could now be procured.

"The Swiss Girl," as sung at M. JULLIEN'S Concerts, Theatre Royal Drury Lane, by Miss DOLBY, to whom it is dedicated, by G. LINLEY.—JULLIEN and Co.

We venture to assert that ninety-nine readers out of a hundred will be puzzled to gather from the frontispiece whether Mr. Linley is, or is not the author of the "Swiss Girl." To many, the "dedicated to Miss Dolby" would sound very like the composer's authority. Now we know Mr. Linley is not the composer, though from being writer, or translator of the words, and from arranging the melody, he may, as we have known others do, fancy himself the veritable composer thereof; wherefore do we think it would sound more like a real artist to have the truth indited on the title-page, viz., "arranged by G. Linley." "The Swiss Girl" is a very beautiful melody, in common time, with a refrain, in 3-4, which has a very pleasing and novel effect. The air is perfectly Swiss, and is so simple and catching, that after Miss Dolby sings it nightly at the concert, it may be heard hummed and whistled all over the theatre. Miss Dolby is encored nightly in it. She sings it with great expression, and in the refrain reminds us, though remotely, of Alboni in the air from Betty. The "Swiss Girl" promises to be the most popular ballad of the day. Mr. Linley's words are not devoid of lyric merit.

"Swiss Quadrille," as performed at the Author's Concerts Theatre Royal Drury Lane, by his celebrated Orchestra. Composed by JULLIEN.—JULLIEN and Co.

Jullien's Swiss Quadrille, arranged for the piano, is very different from the same Quadrille as played by the Drury Lane band at the Concerts. The introduction and finale are necessarily dispensed with, and the Quadrille remains now an unsophisticated set of dancing airs, without the intervention of any symphonic embroidery. The Swiss Quadrille, under the present form, we are inclined to think, constitutes one of the very best sets we ever heard. The subjects are striking and highly pleasing, and are full of vivacity. No. 1 is a Chamois hunting subject, a capital melody, and full of character. The air is, we believe, original, and composed by Jullien. A crescendo is here used with good effect. No. 2 takes for its theme the beautiful Swiss melody, "Le Chalet." This is one of the most pleasing national airs ever written. The subject follows a light and playful morceau d'introduction, and is well worked out. This number will prove a great favorite. No. 3 involves the celebrated "Ranz des Vaches," of which it is needless to say one word. The melody is the national melody of Switzerland, and in foreign countries it is well known produces the same effects on the Swiss exile, as "Patrick's day," "Rule Britannia," "The Campbells' are coming" or "Ar hyd y nos" would on the Irish, English, Scotch or Welch emigrant. No. 4, another beautiful Swiss melody, "Au Rive du Lac," and very popular in the Cantons. This number will be almost in as high favor as No. 2. Two very brilliant variations are provided, which will tax the tiny fingers of the fair performers in no small degree. But this may be omitted, and the simple subject resumed. No. 5—an original subject of Jullien's—is indicative of the village fêlé. We admire this exceedingly. The opening is bold and new: the theme exhilarating and joyous, and worked out with capital effect. It finishes the Quadrille in the heartiest manner possible. Whatever may be the opinion of the world at large, and which just now we have no direct means of accurately certifying, it is our belief that the Swiss Quadrille is the very best composition of that class that ever issued from M. Jullien's pen.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 15.—Musical matters begin to assume a considerable importance in this city. Messrs. Herz and Sivori have given here three concerts with great éclat, and they announce another series of nine. There has been a violent attack upon Sivori in one of the papers, which has called forth considerable antagonism in all the others, the natural result whereof has been a good deal of party feeling, an overflowing attendance at his last concert, and the most vociferous applause on his appearance that can well be imagined. Both Herz and Sivori are playing remarkably well, and are great favourites. Your friend, Madame Bishop, gave two concerts, at which M. Bochs played some of his harp fantasias. With all the wonders that modern Europe has produced upon this instrument, no artiste has surpassed him as an executant, and none has done so much for the development of the power of the harp, as this popular veteran. Two different choral societies are busily preparing opposition performances of Mendelssohn's Elijah, the one under the direction of Mr. Chubb, the other of Mr. G. Loder. Mr. and Mrs. E. Seguin, with Mr. Beeston, who has successively appeared in London, under the names of Belton and Arthur, and now advertises himself as Mr. Arthuraon, are performing the old stock of operas throughout the States. Mr. Manvers and his daughter, with Mr. A. Giubelei, are about to make a similar tour, but they have appeared in this city with small success. A complete Italian Opera company, under the direction of Signor Sanquirico, formerly of the Opera Buffa in London, have arrived and are waiting the completion of a new theatre that is building for them, by subscription, to commence their proceedings. What occupies more public attention is a company which has been associated for the performances of Italian and English operas, and scenes from operas, which combines an unusual assemblage of talent, namely, M^{me}. A. Bishop, the English prima donna; M^{me}. G. A. Macfarren, the German contralto; Signor De Begnis, the Italian buffo; all of whom are well known to you, added to whom are M^{me}. Korsinkaki, a young German lady of much promise for seconda donna. Mr. Reeve, the brother of whom is to appear at Drury Lane, for tenor, and Signor Valtellina, a great favourite here, for basso cantante, the whole under the direction of Mr. Bochs. Mr. G. A. Macfarren, the composer, is amongst us, and is announced to write two grand scenes, the one from Shakspeare's Macbeth, for Madame A. Bishop, the other from Schiller's Jungfrau von Orleans for his cara sposa. Edward Loder's Night Dancers is being performed at the Olympic Theatre with half the music omitted and the other half completely transmogrified. Fridolin is made the principal character and is enacted by a low comedian. Albert is assigned to Mrs. Timm, a sister of Miss P. Horton. The Princess is omitted; the orchestral parts were arranged even for a smaller band, than that with which the opera was originally produced, the chorusses all sung in unison—in fact Loder himself would hardly recognize his work.—(From our own Correspondent.)

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of The Musical World.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

SIR,—Much interest having been evinced, and many enquiries raised with respect to the financial issue of our late Festival, we are now glad to publish, through your medium, the following particulars relating thereto. In the statement which, as treasurer, I have submitted to my brother stewards, it appears that the total amount of the expenses was £3127 4s. 2d., from which, deducting the sum of £2580 15s. 6d., the net amount received from the sale of tickets and books, there will remain a gross deficit of £546 8s. 8d.; consequently each of the twelve stewards will be £45 10s. 9d. minus. The result, although not so satisfactory as could be desired, exhibits, nevertheless, a most cheering prospect towards the continuance and future welfare of our ancient festival; for, although the principal vocalists were paid nearly £300 more upon the late occasion than in the year 1844, yet the deficiency is £200 less than happened at that period, after taking into the scale the aid then afforded by a guarantee fund. And the fact that the present receipts shew an excess of £420 beyond those of the last meeting, we may, we trust, infer that the county families and the clergy are now bent on rendering that assistance which they have been accustomed for upwards of a century to afford, towards the cultivation of the finest musical compositions, and the enjoyment of a social intercourse, whilst at the same time we aid the cause of the widow and the orphan. It may not be irrelevant to add, that the late acting committee feel assured that the expenditure may be still considerably reduced, the item of the chorus especially, namely, £776 (and really the individuals composing the same could scarcely have done more than to cover their expenses, especially if their loss of time is any-wise considered), may, it is fairly assumed, be met nearly by one moiety, by the gratuitous services of local talent. We have two institutions established in Gloucester, in order to promote good church and choral music within ourselves, and three years will doubtless sufficiently perfect the meritorious exertions of those individuals who form such institutions, so as to render their assistance at our next and future meetings very important. It now only remains to notice that the total amount of the late collections made for the relief of the widows and orphans of the clergy, is £723 2s. 3d., which includes a donation since remitted by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol of £20. Here we also report an amended state of affairs, in reference to the contributions in 1844; but we have to lament that this large and opulent county and diocese should, in this important feature, be still deficient, when viewed in comparison with our neighbours and coadjutors at Worcester and Hereford.

I remain, sir, yours, very faithfully,

THOMAS TURNER.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

IT having been our pleasing task, self-imposed by the way, to furnish, from time to time, some short notice of the musical doings at Manchester, for the readers of the Musical World, in attempting so much, however inadequately performed, we have not been gratifying any idle ambition of beholding ourselves in print; indeed, at times, we have been somewhat startled to see the prominence given to our hasty scribble, placed as it has been beside the eloquent and glowing effusions of J. W. D. and D. R. We possess not the musical knowledge of the one, nor the elegant yet delightfully familiar style of the other; yet yield we to neither in our passionate fondness for music, nor in the sincere wish for its progressive advancement as an art amongst us. The Musical World being the periodical in this country devoted to such matters, we have always been anxious to see it contain a faithful record of all musical doings, provincial as well as metropolitan, with this single motive and purely for the love of the thing have these articles been inscribed. We have endeavoured to steer clear of favouritism on the one hand and hyperbole on the other, giving simply our impressions, as an amateur of such performances as came under our ken—and so long as considered worthy insertion shall continue to send such brief notices of Music at Manchester. This gloomy commercial year has been cheered by some halcyon days (or rather evenings) to such sons of trade in this hive of industry (a city now by the way) as have a taste for music and the drama. The production of Mendelssohn's Elijah, for the first time in the presence of, and conducted by, its illustrious composer in April last; the amateur performance, by Charles Dickens and his worthy confreres, for the benefit of Leigh Hunt, in July; the advent of RACHEL amongst us (certainly one of the greatest luminaries of this nineteenth century); and, lastly, the appearance of Jenny Lind, are all occasions that are worthy to be marked with a white stone in one's memory, and, excepting the last, have all been briefly noticed by the writer in the Musical World. We assisted, as the French have it, at three of the four performances of the Swedish Nightingale, and were only prevented noticing them by sickness; in place of doing so, however, we furnished, from a much abler pen, the best criticism we have seen on Jenny Lind, viz., the one from the Manchester Guardian. Unluckily the tide had turned of your favour, and the article in question only appeared as one amongst the extravagant provincial notices, weekly inserted, with notes of admiration, Jenny Lind! Jenny Lind! Jenny Lind! It is not necessary, indeed it would be fruitless now to seek for the causes of this artiste's unprecedented career in England; we do not approve either the excessive mania, or madness (furor), or the detraction that has perhaps been its consequence, and could have wished less of the latter to have appeared in the pages of the Musical World. Jenny Lind is gifted with talent, both as a singer and an actress that would have raised her to an exalted position amongst us, without the aid of all the extraordinary and extravagant puffing that was resorted to, but she certainly, without this adventitious aid, would never have saved Mr. Lumley from ruin, nor have commanded the ridiculously exorbitant prices that were paid to hear her in the provinces. We should like to see the Musical World lean neither to Mr. Lumley nor Mr. Beale (nor Mr. Bocha, vide Madame Anna Bishop), and hope the notices for the coming (some months hence) season of the rival Operas will be as free from bias as they were this year up to June last. Come we now to the object (like a lady's postscript) of our present writing.

HARGREAVES' CHORAL SOCIETY.—First Concert.—Seventh Season.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was judiciously selected as the oratorio with which to open the winter campaign of 1847-8 of the above society. Miss Birch having been engaged at the French Opera in Paris, and Miss Dolby at Jullien's Concerts, the services of the Misses Williams were secured in lieu of them, and Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips, as before, for principals. The Free Trade Hall was quite as crowded on Thursday the 28th ult., to hear the second performance of the sublime work as in April last, when Mendelssohn himself was such an additional attraction. Of its execution we can speak in the highest terms: the chorus were positively marvellous, they evidently had rehearsed the music con amore, and sung it as though they loved it. We cannot notice every individual excellence where all was so perfect, but the following appeared most prominent. The opening chorus, "The harvest now is over, the summer days are gone," with its gushing yet mournful strain of melody, was delightfully sung. Mr. Lockey gave the fine air, "If with all your heart," more effectively than before, and the double quartet, "For he shall give his angels," was far more adequately rendered than on the first performance. Miss M. Williams was very good in the episode of "The widow," and delivered its recitatives with much feeling and propriety. But what shall we say of Mr. H. Phillips and his fine delivery of the many and arduous recitatives and songs in the part of the Prophet? He was as great as ever and delighted everybody. It was not until the last song, "For the mountains shall depart," that we could discover any marks of the hand of time on his once fine organ: still his elocution, conception, and taste, surpasses that of any living English baritone or bass singer. The Misses Williams, by the way, might take a lesson from him as to the delivery and distinct utterance of the words allotted to them. Miss A. Williams suffered from contrast with her great predecessor in the part she had to sing, especially in the holding note with the oboe, "There is nothing,"—else she acquitted herself very creditably, especially in the concerted music, which, like the choruses, all went marvellously. How this glorious composition improves on acquaintance! New beauties spring up never dreamt of before, at every turn. In particular we were struck with the fine prayer of Elijah, "When the heavens are closed up," and its response from the people, "Then, hear from heaven, and forgive the sin," and the quartet and chorus of angels, "Holy, holy, is God the Lord." The favourite chorus, "Baal we cry to thee," was given with great spirit. The quartet, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," narrowly escaped an encore. In the second part, the chorus again came out with great force in "Be not afraid," and that masterpiece, "Behold, God—the Lord passed by:" nor should we omit to notice the jubilant finale to the first part, the gorgeous "Thanks be to God," but we get extravagant about Elijah and must bring it to a close. The unaccompanied trio was encored, as it richly deserved; the Misses Williams and Miss Kenneth warbled it delightfully. Miss M. Williams took the time of the song, "O rest in the Lord," somewhat quicker than Miss Dolby; probably from that cause it did not produce the same effect, or procure it almost an inevitable encore. Altogether Elijah has been again a great treat to the members of the Hargreaves' Society, and fully justifies the selection of this, the greatest work of modern times, by the committee. It is a glorious composition and will live to the end of time. In concluding our notice of this most excellent concert, we are sorry to mention the unavoidable absence of the much esteemed leader, Mr. Seymour, who has had the misfortune to fracture his left arm by a fall. Mr. Conrain, the principal first violin, has had to take his place, assisted by Mr. Aldridge, Jun., of Liverpool.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

BAPTIST LILLO, the infant vocalist, pianist, and violinist, of whom the French press spoke in such eulogistic terms, on the occasion of his visit to Paris last summer, gave a concert on Monday evening, the 25th October ult., in the Round Room of the Rotundo, in this city, which was well attended. Mr. J. Werner Glover (pianist), Mr. Luffrein, (flautist), and Sig. Cavallini (clarionet), were the principal solo performers. The National Anthem, in B flat, was performed by an orchestra and chorus consisting of nearly one hundred performers. A novel and pleasing effect was produced by the second verse being sung by a contralto voice in the subdominant F, which accorded well with the religious character of the words. Rossini's brilliant cavatina, Una voce, was beautifully warbled by Baptist Lillo, the "Infant Nightingale," as the French press styled him. He performed the numerous roulades with the greatest precision and correctness of intonation, adhering with praiseworthy fidelity to the original score. Tadolini's quartet is a truly brilliant composition, the only drawback being that it is not sufficiently concertante, the pianoforte having by far the most prominent place, but which Mr. Glover performed with great power and brilliancy. The respective executants, on its conclusion, were loudly and deservedly applauded. Verdi's chorus, and Locke's music from Macbeth, went admirably. The "Swedish Melodies" were rapturously encored; and the concert passed off admirably, and to the apparent satisfaction of all present.

The Theatre Royal opened for the winter season on Saturday last, when there was a crowded and brilliant audience to witness the appearance of Allen, the favorite tenor, and the debut of a young lady, his pupil, in Bellini's popular opera of La Sonnambula. The debutante made a "decided hit," and has been spoken of in high terms by the Dublin press. She has a mezzo soprano voice of nice quality and of considerable compass, an expressive face, good figure, and action at once natural and easy. With such requisites, I have no doubt but that she will prove a valuable auxiliary to the English lyric drama. As Mr. Allen's merits are already well known to your readers, I need only mention that he sang the music allotted to Elvino with good taste and judgment, and was encored in the favorite scena, "All is lost." The orchestra is under the able conductorship of Mr. Levy; and the chorus is full and efficient.

The popular vocalist, Henry Russell, has just concluded an engagement of three nights at the Music Hall, with considerable success.

A batch of Ethiopian Serenaders appeared here a short time since, but failed to draw good houses, which is not to be wondered at, considering we have had niggers of all descriptions, usque ad nauseam, so that a surfeit has been the natural result.

The Tyler Family are now performing at the Music Hall to poor houses.

Charles Kean and his cara sposa are to pay us a visit as soon as Allen's engagement terminates.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN VOICE.

BESIDES the differences arising from singleness of sound, and diphthongal combination, the tonics exhibit a variety in time, both when uttered separately, and in a syllabic association. Two general divisions may be made. A-we, a-rt, a-n, a-le ee-l, i-sle, o-ur, oo-ze, may be called long tonics: and e-rr, e-nd, i-n, short. It is not to be understood that the latter may not, by designed effort, be made as long as the former: they have their places in this arrangement, from their usual time in English syllables. In the prolongation of i-n it changes nearly, if not entirely, into ee-l: and as it thus seems to owe its character, in short pronunciation, to its abruptness, it might be merged in ee-l and rejected as a distinct element. When the long tonics are combined with other elements into syllables, their time is of every distinguishable degree, from a momentary impulse to the longest passionate utterance of an interjection, as from o-tt to a-we—from ou-t to h-ow—from a-t to a-h!—a-te to h-ay—pe-a-t to ee-l—f-oot to oo-ze, c-a-rt to a-rms—k-i-te to i-sle. The time of the short tonics, in combination, has much less variety. But however short any of the tonics may be, they do in their minimum duration still pass through the concrete movement, as will be shown hereafter.

All the elements, except the abrupt atonics h, p, t, have a variety in duration. The vocalty of the subtonics affords the means of their time, and its prolongation is next in importance to that of the tonics, for the purposes of vivid and graceful expression.

Should it be asked, why the diphthongs are here designated as elementary, when each may be resolved into greater simplicity, it may be answered, that the diphthongs, though compounded of the successive sounds, are inseparable in utterance: and regarding elements as simple efforts of the voice, these diphthongs may be ranked among them. I cannot pronounce the radical of a diphthong without in some sort, giving also its vanish. The radical may indeed be indefinitely sustained on its level line of pitch, and we may attempt to cut it off by a sudden occlusion of the voice; but it can be terminated only by a glide through the vanish, which, however quick, or feeble, or varied by aspiration or otherwise from its exact sound, may still be heard. In the equable concrete of speech, the rapid pronunciation of a diphthong may diminish the audibility of its second sound, but to an attentive ear it will not be altogether lost. And further, not only does the radical of a diphthong demand its own peculiar vanish, but cannot itself be carried through a given interval without sliding into that vanish. For when we attempt to lead the voice through an octave on the diphthong a-we or a-le, its radical may be continued up to the seventh of that scale: still the final close on the eighth will unavoidably turn respectively to e-rr or ee-l. A similar change will take place on all smaller intervals, in an endeavour to make monothongs of the diphthongal radicals.

If an elementary character be denied to the diphthongs, by regarding them as separable sounds, it will not increase the number of simple tonics beyond twelve: for the reader may have already remarked that the vanishing portions of the diphthongs consist exclusively of the monothongs.

It follows, from what has been said on the indivisible nature of the diphthongs, that their radicals cannot be united with any other vanishes than those apparently allotted in the instinctive ordination of the voice: and notwithstanding what has been observed, assumed and transcribed by writers, on the subject of the diphthongal union of the vowels, the instances here enumerated appear to be all that belong to English speech. Every attempt to make further combinations produces a voice which wants the smooth transition and singleness of syllabic impulse, that characterises a diphthong, and which is found with its defined perfection, only in the double sound of the above-named seven elementary tonics.

As the diphthongal tonics are respectively produced by joining a monothong to a radical of different sound, and as all the possible permutations of their union are not employed, it is a curious subject of inquiry—whether it is within the power of the vocal organs to make a greater number of diphthongs than are here enumerated, by uniting, severally, every monothong with each radical tonic. Now as there are seven radicals and five monothongs, we might upon this scheme have thirty-five diphthongs. But it appears we have only eight, supposing oi to be included: a-we being severally combinable with two monothongs, and each of the others with one. Other conjunctions may be made; but they have not a fluent transition, like those which already belong to the language and have their literal signs. Would these new associations require a management of voice which is not altogether instinctive, and might therefore call for a practice and skill not yet reached by the English tongue? Have any of these supposed diphthongs been admitted among the alphabetic elements of other nations? And are these unused materials of speech to be classed with those resources in the animal economy, which are to afford their benefits under higher cultivation, and the widening demands of human improvement?

In elucidating this subject of the tonics, it is worthy of remark, that we may consider the diphthongs as mere syllables, compounded of a tonic and subtonic. For it is certain that the monothongs, when used as vanishes to the radical tonics, have in some degree the character of subtonics: that is, they lose the fullness of the radical opening, which they have when uttered by themselves. The vanish of a-le is very nearly allied to y-e if not identical with it; and the vanish of ou-r bears as near a relation to w-o. It will be evident too, on trial, that if a radical character be given to these vanishes, they will not unite with the previous radical into one impulse of the voice.

It was said, in a former part of this section, that the subtonics may be uttered separately: their own obscure vocalities bearing, respectively, some resemblance to those of the five monothongs. Hence it is, that some syllables may be formed exclusively of subtonics. In the words bidden, fickle, schism, rhythm, ripen, and their conjoiners, the last syllable is either purely subtonic, or a combination of subtonic and atonic. On these final syllables the radical and vanishing movement is performed; and though they exhibit the concrete function, they betray their inferiority in abruptness, force, and musical sound, when compared with the more perfect display of these properties on the tonics. The reason why words of this construction are necessarily divided into two syllables will appear in the following section.

PROVINCIAL.

MADAME DULCKEN'S MAIDSTONE MATINEE.—On Thursday this eminent artiste gave a matinée for pianoforte music in the County Assembly Room, which was attended by a numerous audience, which comprised some of the leading families in the county. Few performers could venture to entertain an audience, essentially intellectual, during a whole afternoon; but Madame Dulcken well knew her own powers. The illustrations of the different styles of composition "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," were distinguished by a degree of completeness which delighted all present. Unlike some of our modern pianists, who seem to imagine that musical energy consists in "imitating the actions of the tiger," Madame Dulcken's playing is gracefulness and elegance personified, with such an utter absence of apparent effort as to strike the listener to her exquisite execution with astonishment. A greater musical treat has seldom been heard in Maidstone. The irresistible John Parry drew tears of mirth from the audience, by some of his most humorous effusions.—Maidstone and South Eastern Gazette.

WELLINGTON.—MR. T. HAYWARD'S CONCERT.—Mr. Hayward gave a grand instrumental and vocal Concert at the Town Hall, Wellington, on Wednesday evening last, under a most distinguished and numerous patronage, which included the élite of the towns and neighbourhood, among whom we observed Messrs. T. Eyton, St. J. C. Charlton, T. C. Eyton, W. Turner, W. Wyley, J. Horton, C. Newling, J. T. Phillips (New Lodge), R. Phillips (Brockton), J. Phillips, G. Marcy, R. W. Maxon, C. Stanier, T. Jukes, F. Buckle, M. Webb, J. Williams (Ketley Hill), R. Garbitt, T. Taylor, J. Rider, C. Steedman, W. Howlett, H. Evett, R. Greatwood, W. Nock, R. Palin, B. Smallwood, Revds. B. Banning, — Whitmore, — Gawthrop, H. Burton, &c., &c. The vocal performers engaged were Mr. John Parry, Miss Louisa Haynes (her first appearance in public), and Mr. Griffiths, of Wolverhampton; instrumental—Mr. H. Hayward, solo violin; Mr. Marsden, flute. The band for the overtures consisted of Mr. F. Hayward, first violin; second ditto, Mr. T. Hayward; flute, Mr. Marsden; tenors, Mr. F. Hayward and Mr. Griffiths; violoncello, by an amateur: grand pianoforte, Mr. John Hayward. We need scarcely observe, that Mr. John Parry, the inimitable buffo singer, received the most unbounded applause in his popular songs, "The London Season," "Miss Harriet and her Governess," "Matrimony," &c. Mr. H. Hayward also sustained his reputation as one of the first violinists of the place. Mr. Marsden acquitted himself in a very respectable manner on the flute, in the variations on Rousseau's Dream, and in a fantasia on airs from Norma. This being Miss Haynes's début, she no doubt laboured under some disadvantage in consequence, and appeared a little nervous in her first song, "Lamp of the Night:" she seemed to have acquired more confidence in, and gave in better style, "Go, forget me." Miss Haynes has been prepared for the stage, we believe, at a great expense, having been for some time a pupil of Garcia, at Paris: she has great compass of voice, and will, no doubt, with practice, rise in her profession. The performance on the whole passed off very well, and the room was filled to an overflow,—a sufficient proof of the estimation in which Mr. T. Hayward is held by the public of Wellington and the neighbourhood.—Edinb' Journal.

AYR.—TEMPLETON, the favourite and "king of song," honoured Ayr with a professional passing visit last evening. He gave his popular entertainment—"The Rose, Shamrock, and Thistle"—in the Theatre, which was crowded by a fashionable and brilliant assemblage. This entertainment has immortalised him among solo entertainers. It is not only rich in songs, which few can interpret, whether plaintive, majestic tender, or joyous, but strong in anecdotes, which none can tell like him. He has one great aim. He always introduces classical music amongst his popular selections—the execution of which cannot be surpassed in delicacy, brilliancy, and dramatic effect, eliciting both wonder and delight. Though he now treads his native soil, and in the vicinity of the birth-place of Burns, where a few years since he charmed every listener, he is the Orpheus of the nineteenth century, "whose songs gush from his heart"—who has a sentiment in every tone, and a tone for every sentiment. It would be difficult to describe the character of Templeton's voice. It is more like some curious instrument than a human voice—the sweetness of his upper notes lead to the belief that it is a faissetto; but this illusion vanishes when we hear him, without moving a muscle, or taking breath, swell from the breathing of the flute to the blast of the trumpet. Perhaps we can best account for the effects he produces by saying they emanate from that, which neither the finest organisation, nor the result of the most careful discipline, could of themselves accomplish. Templeton possesses a charm at least equal to this—an unstudied grace of action, suavity of manner, and gentlemanly deportment, without which requisites a vocalist may make a very good "musical box," but cannot attain the high position he enjoys. We have traced Templeton in his present tour northwards, and are happy to say that his progress has been attended with an uninterrupted series of success;—one more brilliant than the other. In Yorkshire, Lancashire, in Dumfriesshire, and Galloway, no concert-room was large enough to accommodate the crowds that assembled from all quarters to hear this gifted and accomplished vocalist; nor can this be a matter of wonder when we reflect that he stands on as lofty an eminence, and is as unapproachable in his line, as Jenny Lind is in hers. He not only remains the pre-eminent tenor who shared the triumphs of the still incomparable "spirit of song," Malibran, but, in his present entertainments, revives the palmy days of Braham and Incledon by his increased power and splendid singing of their once famous songs—at once snatching them from oblivion, and renewing a taste for our national melodies amidst this newly-created mania for foreign music. Mr. Blewitt accompanied Mr. Templeton with his usual ability; and, at the end of the entertainment, favoured the audience with one of his comic songs, which sent them home not only delighted, but merry.—The Ayr Observer.

LIVERPOOL.—THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—The celebrated vocalist, Mr. Wilson, who stands unrivalled as an illustrator of Scottish song, gave one of his entertainments at the Concert-hall, on Saturday evening last. The attendance was numerous and respectable. Mr. Wilson was in excellent voice, and all his efforts afforded unbounded satisfaction to the audience. His recital of Burns's popular and admirable poem of Tam O'Shanter, was a most striking and agreeable feature in the evening's entertainments, and was greeted with loud bursts of applause. During the interval between the first and second parts, Mr. John Smith said, a most pleasing task devolved upon him; Mr. Wilson had, as they were all aware, performed his duty, and they had now a duty to perform. He expressed his gratification at seeing so large an attendance, and after mentioning the good tendency of such entertainments, he said, in contrast to the busy world out of doors, the enjoyment they received there by those entertainments was a refreshing sunshine by which they felt relieved after the depressing business of the day. Their friend Mr. Wilson, who had delighted them so much, had given his services on that occasion in compliment, and in furtherance of the objects of that institution, having come down from London for the express purpose. They had with them one of their best and oldest friends, Mr. Rathbone, also several distinguished strangers from the colony of Prince Edward's Island, including the Hon. J. Pope, Speaker of the House of Assembly, and Mr. E. Palmer, who had come there, as well as themselves, to enjoy the sunshine. He concluded a very excellent speech by moving the thanks of the company to Mr. Wilson, for his handsome services on the present occasion, which was immediately carried by acclamation. The Hon. Mr. Pope expressed the high gratification which had been afforded him, more particularly as he was a stranger amongst them. He was glad to see such entertainments provided for the people, as they were the means whereby individuals, as well as families, were enabled to enjoy amusements of a rational character, combined with instruction. Those who attended would, he had no doubt, go home better husbands and better wives. He had been much struck with the moral tendency of the songs introduced, which was alike creditable to the vocalist, and those concerned in the management of the concerts. (Applause.) Mr. Wilson then made his appearance, and was received with three hearty rounds of applause, at the close of which Mr. J. Smith announced to him the vote of thanks which had been passed for his liberal conduct that evening, and the gratification he had at all times afforded by his vocal efforts. Mr. Wilson said that, in reference to the gratifying information Mr. Smith had communicated to him, he begged to assure them that it afforded him the highest pleasure on all occasions to be in that room. He often met assemblies higher in rank, but he never came before those who could better appreciate the efforts of the poet or the singer than those he was in the habit of meeting in that hall. He always looked forward to his coming there as a day of sunshine, which afforded him the highest pleasure. He thanked them sincerely for the mark of approbation they had given him, and concluded by assuring them of his most earnest desire for the welfare and success of their institution. (Loud applause.) We ought not to omit mentioning the excellent accompaniments of Mr. Jolley, a young man of great talent and unassuming manners, who shewed by his performance, that he was not only a fine pianoforte player, but a splendid accompanist, and that he had a just appreciation of the poetry as well as the music he was accompanying. Mr. Wilson may congratulate himself on having such a coadjutor.—Liverpool Mercury.

DUBLIN. THEATRE ROYAL.—The opening performance presented to us a debutante, in the person of a pupil of Mr. Allen—a young lady who, on the threshold of her professional career, proves that she brings to her arduous undertaking many of the most brilliant attributes of genius—an organ of considerable strength and exquisite sweetness, which has been most sedulously and successfully cultivated—a figure of true feminine grace, and a countenance of the most pleasing expression. The opera selected for her debut was Bellini's most successful and popular composition, The Sonnambula, in which she, of course, sustained the heroine, and with the most triumphant success. Throughout the opera we were delighted to witness in this young lady the rare combination of the melodist's power, blended with the accomplishment and skill of an excellent actress. We should pay but an ill compliment to the treasured knowledge of our musical readers, were we to enter into any enumeration or detail of the delicious airs and concerted melodies with which Bellini has so profusely, so gorgeously adorned this exquisite opera; all we shall say on that point is, that ample justice was done to each and all of these compositions; and so complete was the success of the fair debutante, that at the falling of the curtain, she was most enthusiastically called for by the united acclaims of the crowded and fashionable auditory, and her success recorded in many long protracted peals of applause. A more successful debut has rarely, if ever, been witnessed. Mr. Allen, the Elvino of the evening, what shall we—what need we now say? The celebrity his talents have so justly acquired for him, renders criticism an easy and a pleasurable task, even to the most fastidious professor of the “ungentle craft.” We have rarely heard his melodious and well-attuned organ “discourse more eloquent music;” and, indeed, on this occasion, we could not shut out the notion, that natural anxiety for the success of his fair pupil stimulated him to many of his best and most successful exercises of a voice which is in itself all sweetness, melody, and richness.—(From a Correspondent.)

LIVERPOOL.—The accomplished Miss Emily Grant made her debut at the Concert-hall, Lord Nelson-street, on Wednesday evening, to a numerous and highly respectable audience, including several distinguished professionals, amateurs, &c. The universal cheers which greeted her, on being led on by Mr. Robinson, prevented her proceeding for some time with her opening song—“Love, dwell with me,”—her execution of which, as well as her other songs, brought into play all the resources of her fine soprano voice, revelling into the intricacies of the most difficult and elaborate passages, and surmounting them with a neatness and delicacy of finish, and all with such perfect ease, as could only be effected by the highest degree of art and cultivation, and which the audience testified their appreciation of by the frequent bursts of applause with which they interrupted her, and more particularly in her arch and expressive manner of rendering Balfe's favourite song, “Woman's Heart,” and for which, in the encore, she substituted “Love rules the Palace,” and that, if possible, with increased power, brilliancy, and effect. Her old favourite song, “Sound the Pibroch,” was received and encoored with equal enthusiasm, and the peculiar effects produced by the double echo she introduces, was listened to, as usual, with breathless attention. Miss Grant's voice is one of great power, compass, and flexibility, and has been evidently trained in the true and legitimate school of singing.—Liverpool Chronicle.

IBID.—THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.—On Monday evening the fifth undress concert took place at the Collegiate Institution, but the attendance was not so numerous as usual. The vocalists were Miss Stott, Miss Marie Stuart, Mr. Ryalls, and Mr. Armstrong. Mr. Henry Hayward, the celebrated violinist, was the only solo instrumentalist. The chief attraction of this concert was its instrumental performances, and of these a rich treat was presented. They consisted of Beethoven's symphony in D major; the “Meerestille,” by Dr. Mendelssohn; Berlioz's “Des Francs Juges;” the overture of “Fernand Cortez,” by Spontini; and Auber's favourite overture to “Masaniello.”—Liverpool Journal.

CHELTENHAM.—The Promenade Concerts, which take place twice a week at the Rotunda are very fashionably attended. At the last, Miss Le Grice, a pupil of Mr. Cianchettini, whose performances on the pianoforte we have noticed more than once, at the Royal Academy of Music in London, as well as in Cheltenham, appeared to the greatest advantage, and was indeed uncommonly well received, in two grand masterpieces of the art; one of which was Beethoven's immortal op. 53, and the other, John Cramer's exquisite “Andante” and bravura variations, op. 61. We found this young lady much improved since last year: indeed she is rapidly advancing towards perfection. Her execution is very brilliant, and her expression quite classical; denoting a true perception of the beauties of the great models—those models that are not subservient to fashion; they will indeed, live for ever!!! Miss Le G. can also show off in Liszt or Thalberg; but she has too much taste and feeling to desert the ancient for the modern. We, therefore, wish her well in all sincerity of heart.—(From a Correspondent.)

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From “The Age.”)

MADAME BISHOP's Concert took place at the Tabernacle on Thursday evening, and was attended by at least fifteen hundred persons, who were, if we may judge by the applause they bestowed upon the performances, perfectly satisfied with the entertainments provided. In addition to the treat, which it was known was in store for them from Madame Bishop's singing, much curiosity also existed to hear the performances of M. Bochs on the harp, and those who are admirers of that instrument had no reason to feel any disappointment. In point of skill, M. Bochsa excels all harpists we have ever heard—the exquisite taste he displays in his selection of melodies, and the surprising variations with which he embellishes them, are beyond all praise. The ballad, “On the Banks of Guadalquivir,” by Madame Bishop, drew forth a rapturous encore, as usual, and charmed the unskilled lovers of music more than the elaborate and difficult compositions. This was also the case with her singing the Irish melody, “The Last Rose of Summer,” and for the encore “The Harp that once thro’ Tara’s Halls” was given. These melodies she sang with the most touching and characteristic sweetness, and fairly moved her audience to enthusiasm by the beautiful and most effective simplicity and truth she gave to the character of the words and music.

Messieurs Herz and Sivori gave a Concert at the Tabernacle on Tuesday evening, which was very well attended, and went off with great eclat. The orchestra was led by Rapetti.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BRITISH MUSICIANS.—The Society gave its first chamber concert on Monday evening. The performance commenced with Beethoven’s sonata in A, Op. 69, for pianoforte and violoncello, by Miss Binfield Williams and Mr. Guest. A song of J. L. Hatton’s followed, sung by Mr. Julian Kench; which was succeeded by Miss A. Williams, in a new song of W. Rae’s. A quartet (MS.) from Miss Kate Loder’s pen, was next given, interpreted by Messrs. Mellon, J. Banister, Weslake, and W. F. Reed. Part I. concluded with Mozart’s trio, “Susanna a via sortite.” The most notable feature in this portion of the performance was, Miss K. Loder’s quatuor, a composition of rare merit, and such as we never heard from the pen of a lady before. It is evident Miss K. Loder is intimately conversant with Haydn and Mozart, and upon their works she has founded the style and feeling of her compositions. It is hard to pronounce a decided opinion on a work of pretence, not pretension, and we shall do our judgment no further violence until we have heard the quartet a second time. The items in the second part were a trio in B minor, Op. 20 (MS.) by C. E. Horsley; a song of Walter Macfarren’s to Tennyson’s exquisite little poem, “Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea,” excellently written; Henry Smart’s popular duet, “Summer is coming,” and Beethoven’s quartet in E. flat, No. 1, Op. 74. We shall have occasion, in a future number, to devote a column or two of our journal to the consideration of the prospects and management of the Society of British Musicians.

MADAME PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA has left Paris en route for Dresden, where she is engaged for a series of performances. From thence she proceeds to Hamburg, and afterwards to Berlin. We may now state as a fact, that the great cantatrice has definitively settled with Mr. Beale, and will join the corps of the Royal Italian Opera next season. She will appear in the Huguenots, Robert le Diable, Barbiere, Don Giovanni, Iphigenia, &c. Her coming to England is already looked forward to with the greatest interest.

HAYMARKET.—A new comic drama, in two acts, to be called, The Roused Lion, is in rehearsal, and will be produced on Saturday next.

MADAME ANNA THILLON has arrived in London.

LOLA MONTEZ.—Among the curiosities which most attract strangers visiting Munich at the present moment, perhaps the most curious is the residence of the Countess of Landsfeld, the celebrated Lola Montez. Among the apartments thrown open to public admiration is the countess’s bedchamber, which is fitted up with royal magnificence and taste. On the table in this room is a rare ornament—a superb album is laid out, filled with pieces of poetry, written in German, and in celebration of the charms of the beautiful countess, and on an embroidered cushion upon the same table a hand, sculptured in marble, is shown as a representation of “the royal hand that wrote the verses.”

THE LATE MR. BELLAMY.—The subscriptions for the purpose of erecting a tomb to the memory of this much-lamented and highly-esteemed gentleman are likely to be attended with a result favourable to the wishes of the friends of the deceased. In addition to the sums already received from various inhabitants of Bath, subscriptions have been sent from the following members of the theatrical profession in the metropolis, with whom Mr. Bellamy was upon terms of intimacy:—Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, Mr. and Mrs. Bartley, Mr. Macready, Mr. Charles Young, Mr. Meadows, Mr. Hemming, Mr. W. Harrison, Mr. Charles Farley, Mr. John Cooper, Mr. Harley, Mr. F. Matthews, Mr. W. Farren, and Sir George Smart. Mrs. Macready, the lessee, and Mr. Chute, the acting manager of our theatre, have also contributed their donations towards carrying the desired object into effect.—Bath Herald.

M. DIZT, a celebrated Harpist, formerly a member of the Philharmonic Society of London, died last week in Paris, aged 67.

AN ORGAN has lately been presented to the new church of Bradford, Wilts, by Captain Palairt, R.N., a resident in the neighbourhood.

DEATH OF AN ECCENTRIC MUSICAL AMATEUR.—Died, on Wednesday, the 22nd ult., David Hatton, of Thornton, North Britain, better known in the locality as Flutorum, in the 78th year of his age. Few of his craft enjoyed equal reputation with the deceased for the peculiarity of his sentiments upon civil and religious topics. He had a handsome coffin made for himself some years ago, and realised the outlay, long ere he died, by exhibiting the mute, though eloquent memento mori. His house, both internally and externally, was a perfect curiosity, with figures, devices, and emblems of the most incongruous beings and objects in nature; many visitors resorted thither, in consequence. He had great musical talents, and invented a musical instrument (hence the name of Flutorum), something in the shape of an Irish bagpipe, upon which he played, with tolerable accuracy, most of the old Scotch tunes. He has left a considerable property to be divided amongst some distant relations, as he never was married.—Scotch paper.

MR. MITCHELL is expected to-morrow, from Brussels, to complete his arrangements for the Opera Comique, at the St. James’s Theatre.

A RIVAL TO ALL THE SOPRANI.—It is reported that a pupil of Mdme. Pasta will appear in the season 1849, at the Royal Italian Opera, who is likely to eclipse every European singer.

M. BERLIOZ leaves Paris to-day for London. Felicien David will visit London next spring, and intends bringing out, it is said, his last great work.

THE LATE MR. ROOKE.—A grand operatic concert will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. the 2nd, at the Hanover Square Rooms, for the benefit of the widow and children of the above lamented musician. Particulars will be announced forthwith.

GRISI has transmitted to England a donation of £50 towards the relief of the children of the late Madame Albertazzi. We are not at all surprised at this: from numerous other circumstances, which have reached our ears, we have long known that the Diva is as generous as she is great. In the same benevolent spirit, though not in the same largeness of spirit, Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria has sent Madame Albertazzi's children £10.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL UNION.—The following is the programme of the first séance which took place at the Old Ship Assembly Rooms, on Monday last:—

1. Quartette—No. 82 in F, two violins, viola, and violoncello, Messrs. Oury, Cramer, Hill, and Signor Piatti—Haydn. 2. Grand Trio—in B flat, Op. 97, pianoforte, Madame Oury, violin, Mr. Oury, violoncello, Signor Piatti—Beethoven. 3. Solo—violoncello, La Sonnambula, Signor Piatti—Piatti. 4. Quartette Concertante—in A, Op. 18—Mozart. 5. Duo de Salon—(MS.) pour piano et violin, Mr. and Madame Oury, La Figlia del Reggimento—Oury.

Among the subscribers and patrons are the Earls of Westmorland and Falmouth, the Hon. General Upton, the Hon. Lawrence Parsons, Admiral Bladen, Lady Capel, and Captain Newbury. The meetings are held once a week, under the direction of Mr. and Madame Oury.

MISS RAINFORTH, MR. TRAVERS, and MR. STRETTON, have been attracting full and fashionable audiences at the Newcastle Theatre. Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore was produced on Friday in a manner which would have done credit to a metropolitan theatre. The choruses and orchestral department were excellent.

MR. G. H. BIANCHI gave a concert at the Theatre, Ipswich, on Tuesday evening, composed entirely of English music. The vocalists were Miss Bassano, Miss Eliza Nelson, Mr. Leffler, and Mr. John Parry. The concert was given under the immediate patronage of the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. The entertainments opened with Bishop's glee, "Blow gentle gales," sung by Miss Bassano, Miss Eliza Nelson, and Mr. Leffler. This was followed by Nelson's ballad, "The Wind," well executed by Leffler; after which Miss Nelson sang Henry Russell's "The Old Water-mill," with the greatest taste and feeling, and was loudly applauded; whereupon Miss Bassano gave a ballad of Maynard's in her usual style of excellence; and then Miss E. Nelson and Mr. Leffler indulged the audience with a duet; and Mr. Louis Emanuel, who, by the way, officiated as conductor during the evening, was admired in an impromptu on the harmonium; and "The Chough and Crow" was rendered with effect by Miss Bassano, Miss E. Nelson, and Mr. Leffler; and John Parry wound up Part 1, with "The London Season." In Part 2, we admired most Miss Eliza Nelson in a very pleasing ballad, called "The Happy Gipsies," which she gave most excellently, and in a style which promised still greater excellence. This young lady has a charming mezzo soprano voice, and her method is good. We have heard her but a few times, yet have heard enough to augur well of her future. Miss Bassano sang a Scotch ballad so admirably, that she received a unanimous encore. It is in the interpretation of such music that this lady excels. The concert went off with considerable spirit, most of the fashionables remaining to the end.—(From a Correspondent.)

MR. FREDERICK R. VENNA, Berks, son of Mr. Venna, of Reading, formerly leader of the band and composer to the Italian Opera, London, has been lately elected a student in the Royal Academy of Music, under the immediate patronage and recommendation of his Excellency the Right Honorable the Earl of Westmorland, President of the Institution. Mr. F. R. Venna's examination for qualification proved so very satisfactory in every respect that he has been placed in the highest position in the establishment, which must prove very gratifying to himself and his respected father, who, on application for his admittance, received the following gracious letter:—

"Royal Academy of Music, 4, Tottenham Street, Hanover-square, 20th October, 1847."

"Sir,—I am directed by the Earl of Westmorland, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, and his lordship desires me to say, he will be most happy to give his recommendation for the entry of your son as a student of the Royal Academy of Music: and his lordship further desires me to add, that he very sincerely wishes your son every success in a profession in which his father has been so distinguished.

Believe me to remain, Sir, your very faithful,

J. PITT BONTAIN, General Superintendent.

To FREDERICK VENNA, Esq., Reading, Berks.

We think this distribution a most judicious one, and sure are we that every one will hail the kind consideration which prompted the presenting a portion of Middle Lind's donation to the blind musician, Mr. Taylor, whose latter years we regret to say, are blighted by the presence of distress.—(Norfolk Paper.)

SHAKSPERE'S PLAYS.—The earliest quarto editions of the plays of Shakspeare, wherein the title-pages are given exactly as they stand and in the form in which they are printed in the original editions. It has generally been said that there are twenty quarto editions of plays by Shakspeare printed anterior to the folio of 1623; but the fact is, that, exclusive of "The Taming of the Shrew," the title-page of the quarto edition, which bears date in 1631, there are only seventeen quartos. Steevens in 1766, to make up the number, added the two parts of The Troublesome Reign of King John, 1611, which nobody in modern times has imputed to Shakspeare, although "Written by W. Sh." was inserted fraudulently on the title-page by the old printer: he also reprinted among his "Twenty Quartos" the two parts of the Contention between the two Houses of Lancaster and York; but he strangely omitted Pericles, which had much more than an equal claim to the distinction. The undoubted plays of Shakspeare, which came from the press in quarto before 1623, were the following, and our list is made out according to the dates of publication:—

Romeo and Juliet, 1597—Richard the Second, 1597—Richard the Third, 1597—Henry the Fourth, part I, 1598—Love's Labour Lost, 1598—Much ado about Nothing, 1600—Midsummer Night's Dream, 1600—Merchant of Venice, 1600—Henry the Fourth, part II, 1600—Henry the Fifth, 1600—Titus Andronicus, 1600—Merry Wives of Windsor, 1602—Hamlet, 1603—King Lear, 1608—Troilus and Cressida, 1609—Pericles, 1609—Othello, 1622.

Thus it will be seen at once how irregularly Shakspeare's dramas came from the press, viz. three in 1597, two in 1598, six in 1600, one in 1602, and another in 1603, one in 1608, two in 1609, and one in 1622. Why six separate productions were crowded into 1600, while in various years none at all appeared, is matter of curious and interesting speculation: five of these six were printed from good manuscripts, whether derived from the Theatre or from any other source, while the sixth was indisputably surreptitious, and never could have been authorized by anybody.—Mr. Collier, in the Shakspeare Society Papers.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

OUR CORK CORRESPONDENT is informed that no manuscript works are received by the Society of British Musicians, unless those of a member, or an associate: and we are of opinion that the same regulation prevails in all musical societies. If our correspondent have manuscripts lying by, which are supposed to be worthy of submitting to trial, then had our correspondent best join the Society of British Musicians, and send in the MSS. to the committee for approval.

G. S. P.—"Il Barbiere" is decidedly superior to "La Gazza Ladra;" and is, moreover, one of the greatest musical works ever written. To the other question, "which are Rossini's chefs d'œuvre in opera seria," we answer, "Guillaume Tell, Otello, and the Mosé in Egitto."

J. WAKEMAN.—We are sorry we cannot find room for our correspondent's letter. We feel the truth of his remarks, and would willingly oblige him by inserting them, but they are not of sufficient importance to claim a space in our columns.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator: "Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire-sq., Bishopsgate-st., 19th July, 1847.
"Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's 'Aromatic Regenerator,' feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases."

CAUTION.

WHEREAS

It hath been falsely stated that the popular Song, is a reprint of an old song, I hereby request all Musicians, Booksellers, Teachers of Music, and others, not to be deceived by such statement, and as the report has been traced to the shop of a Publisher in Paternoster Row, the young men and boys in the employ of that Publisher are hereby cautioned not to repeat a declaration which is wholly false. The "Words" are by myself, and the Music is by Charles W. Glover; both are original, and not derived from the French, as many persons have asserted: this declaration is issued in order that no person may, through ignorance of the fact, be entrapped into a violation of the law.

"JEANNETTE AND JEANNOT,"

The demand for Copies of this Song having become very great, Musicians, Booksellers, Music Copyists, and others are hereby cautioned against selling pirated copies of either words or music of "Jeannette and Jeannot," or colourable imitations thereof, and the same caution extends to the other Songs of the Series, entitled "Songs of a Consort," as under.

Witness my hand, this First Day of November, 1847,

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

(No. 8.)

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.,

Wednesday, November 10.—MY DEAR RYAN,—As usual, here I am, at the eleventh hour (three o'clock by the Bourse), just in time not to be too late with my hebdomadal dispatch. However, it is a chronic malady with me, that I cannot begin to work until I am absolutely compelled; and if there were another post at six, I should not commence my letter till four. During the current week my head is crammed with matter, that, by reason of our relationship, should be placed at your disposal; but when the time comes for me to turn it into prose, I am at a complete stand-still, everything of importance has gone clean out of my memory, and I am puzzled how to fashion the opening paragraph of my epistle. Here, however, you have it ready made; by force of complaining that I do not know how to begin, I have unconsciously begun—and so now for the news, ventre a terre, in full gallop!

The Opera being the first thing that presents itself to my consideration, let me begin by the Opera. Since my last there has been no novelty. Auber's Le Philtre, one of the most charmingly pastoral of all pastorals, has twice prefaced the Fille de Marbre, in which—although the nightly receipts are diminishing—the nightly reception of Cerito by the public is increasing in enthusiasm. You know the music of Le Philtre; it only then, remains for me to speak of the style of its performance here. This may be done in very few words:—Mlle. Nau, in Theresine, is mediocre; Alizard, in Fontanarose, is mediocre; Porthéaut, in Joli-Cœur, makes us regret keenly the absence of Massol, who was mediocre; Paulin, in Guillaume, is mediocre; the subordinates, Duclos, Bengraf, &c., &c., are mediocre; the orchestra is mediocre; the chorus is mediocre; in short Le Philtre was just as well, if not better, performed by the Belgian company, at Drury Lane, in the summer of 1846. On Sunday, as there was no Cerito the public was treated to Charles VI., which I did not go to hear; and to-night, as there is Cerito, the public will be treated to Lucie, which I shall not go to hear—albeit the attractions of Bettini's Edgard, Paulin's Arthur, Porthéaut's Ashton, Bremond's Raymond, and Koenig's Gilbert, not to add Mlle. Nau's Lucie, will doubtless draw many amateur vocalists, pleased to listen to artistes who would be called amateurs any where out of the neighbourhood of the Rue Pelletier, and to draw a reasonable comparison in favour of themselves. No, my dear Ryan, I am insensible to this immense phalanx of talent, united together in the interpretation of this immense novelty—albeit I cannot but own that the affairs of the Opera are much more wisely and energetically conducted by MM. Roqueplan and Duponchel than they were by that culpably neglectful Léon Pillet—who never would have imagined, in his most flighty moments, such a superb novelty as Lucie, cast with such singular efficacy and completeness. Paulin alone—that captivating tenor léger, who has been wronged, hitherto, inasmuch as M. Nestor has not yet consigned the principal parts of Duprez to his care—Paulin alone, that Cupidon of tenors, to whom might be applied Shelley's line, in the song of Beatrice Cenci,

"With a light and a heavy heart."—

(With a light head, understood)—Paulin alone, beloved of the Muses would be enough to stamp the management of MM. Roqueplan and Duponchel, with the epithet of ———, choose your own, my dear fellow, I have not time to consult a dictionary. Meanwhile there is no sign or promise of Miss Birch's debut, and after all said and done, I do not see very well how the presence of that clever artist would be consistent with the policy of the Opera directors, and the patronage of the liberal press, as at present disbursed. The policy consists in forming a company out of three elements:—persons who have no voices but would sing if they could, persons who have voices but no idea of singing, and persons who have no voices and no idea of singing; the patronage is disbursed by the critics in quantities, at so much per packet—the only journals wholly independent of, and by no means devoted to the interests of MM. Roqueplan and Duponchel being the Coureur des Spectacles,* and La France Musicale; the former expressing disapproval openly and in plain terms, the latter in the guise of praise, so flowery abundant, so thickly laid on, and so entirely without distinction of persons or things, that the public—or that part which consults La France Musicale—views it through the medium of Socratic spectacles, and distinguishes the esoteric irony of the editors, under what, to common minds, would appear an impenetrable cloud of words—or, to use another metaphor, afar off, as a meteor in a mist. Miss Birch, therefore, who has not only a fine fresh voice, but can sing very well, would not properly belong to any of the three elements of which the Opera troupe is composed; nor can she even be said to appertain to a fourth element, which as it is insignificant in proportion to the other three, I omitted to mention—persons who had voices once, and could sing once, but are disabled by time, and should by rights be conveyed to the Hôpital for musical invalides; these are to be found in the chorus, and—read fiddles and flutes instead of voices—are still more plentiful in the band; one or two may be found on the stage close to the foot-lights. However, I trust, next week, to be enabled to afford you some decided evidence on the subject of Miss Birch's appearance; and till then, I drop the subject, which is not of the most agreeable, as matters stand.

The Paris concert season will soon begin; small shots, in the shape of matinées and soirées, given by vocalists and instrumentalists unknown to fame, are firing, at brief intervals; the proprietors of La France Musicale, foremost champions of the present management at the Grand Opera, have announced their first concert for to-morrow, with a pas seul on the violin by M. St. Léon, the dancer, as the principal attraction; Thalberg, the pianist, has arrived and has already refused to perform in public seven or eight times; Emile Prudent, his shadow, has departed for Algiers, in time to escape, what he could hardly avoid in the meridian of the season, an examination of his pretensions before the ordeal of a Paris audience;* Rosellen, Gorla, Kontski, and the countless tribe of minnow-pianists, are publishing new pot-pourris, to make sorry the hearts and sore the ears of amateurs; Gerald, and the host of white-balt vocalists, have re-commenced their singing classes; Chopin, who is rarely seen in the recess, is now wholly invisible; Felicien David is begetting another ode-symphony out of the ideal vacuum of his muse; Stephen Heller, Charles Hallé, musician-pianists of the true school, make themselves comfortable by their own fire-sides, fearful of stirring out, lest they should be saluted, on the Boulevards, by the roaring of some late-expatriated lion of the Dreyschock, or the Wilmers species; Liszt has not been heard of for the last six weeks; Vivier has gone to tell the "story of Pietro" to the inhabitants of the Hague; and a hundred other familiar signs forebode the near approach of that much-to-be-deplored epoch, when every day in the week swells the catalogue of benefit-concerts, or, in other words, musical performances of the most tedious, trivial, twaddling kind, by ones, twos, and threes at a time. As I have a plentiful dose of these in the London season, be assured the very first that demands my personal attendance will be the signal for my flight. So, if you desire to be enlightened as to the precise period of my return home, look in the musical papers for the advertisement of the first "grand concert of vocal and instrumental music;" and make up your mind that I shall be two-hundred miles off as early as possible.

Meanwhile, events of stirring interest in the dramatic world are casting their shadows before. Every day I expect to be apprised of the first representation of the new tragedy of Cleopatra, at the Theatre Francais, which I hope to be able to attend. The author is Madame de Girardin, wife of the proprietor of La Presse, whose books and feuilletons, under the pseudonym of Sophie Gay, are popular, and deserve the vogue they have obtained. I am nevertheless of Pirrhon's opinion, that a woman cannot write a good tragedy; elle n'a pas de quoi, I say it with becoming deference, chapeau bas; elle n'a pas de quoi, there is no denying it; but, then, Rachel plays the heroine, and that magnificent and inspired creature—who must not be classified into sex or species, being a thing alone, a sublime exception to the universal common-place—can endow the most empty words with meaning, can make even barrenness teem. You have heard, I presume, of the present interesting condition of the famous actress? if not, let this be your informant. I saw her yesterday, in the Rue de Rivoli, looking darkly bright, and fiercely beautiful; she is, among women, as the niger cygnus among birds; more rare, indeed! for there is but one Rachel; another can never be! Among the recent performances at the Theatre Francais have been Andromaque, in which you know what Rachel makes of the passionate and capricious Hermione; Mithridate, in which her Monimia is a masterpiece of feminine dignity and tenderness; Phédre, the chef-d'œuvre of Racine and Rachel; Les Horaces, the chef-d'œuvre of Corneille and Rachel; Polyeucte, and Athalie. Whenever Rachel plays, the house is full to overflow; on the off-nights, until the recent production of Les Aristocrates, it has been but thinly attended. And yet Rachel is poorly supported, by Beauvallet and Lizier, both of whom are vastly heavy tragedians. Cooper would be a god-send here, if Maddox would let him come and study French. On Saturday night a performance took place, for the benefit of Lepeintre, an old-established actor and a great favourite with the public; Rachel appeared in Athalie, Bouffé in La fille de l'Avare, Arnal in Le Poltron, Lepeintre in Le Bénéficiaire, Plunkett in a dévoilement, and some of the Italian vocalists in a selection. The house was crammed, but the performances went off coldly, and you may imagine how late they terminated—seven o'clock being the hour for commencement.

Returning from the Bourse, last Wednesday, after posting my letter to you, I found Paris in a commotion, [Paris Proper, you must know, according to the best topographical authorities, lies upon the Boulevards, between the Rue de la Paix and the Rue Vivienne, on the one side, and between the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin and the Rue Grange Batelière on the other. There be, who for the sake of the Café Vacchette, the most economical of the great dining-houses, would extend the boundary as far as the Rue Montmartre; but this is an error of volition, sufficiently pardonable, by the way, to those whose pockets are not strong enough to resist the attacks of the Café de Paris and the Café Anglais.] As soon as I reached the Boulevard des Italiens, my attention was roused by the unusual aspect of things in general, and of flâneurs in particular. Small knots of individuals, busily occupied in conversation, spotted, at intervals, the whole surface of this great public thoroughfare, as clusters of stars the wide expanse of "the cerulean"—to borrow a word from one of your poems; countless couples, bras dessus bras dessous, were walking up and down, at irregular paces, engaged in discourse of seemingly intense interest; citadines, and milords, and other two and four-wheeled, one and two-horsed vehicles, from twenty sous to forty (by inexplicable gradations), were rumbling along, at a pace even slower than usual—a feat I should have thought impossible, but that seeing is believing—occupied by individuals, on whose physiognomies might be traced the consciousness of some extraordinary event. Vivier was taking advantage of the bustle to recount the histoire de Pietro to an honest unsuspecting German, whose "Was ist das Pietro?" accompanied by an earnest look of inquiry, did not melt the heart of the relentless moqueur;* and other signs, too numerous to specialise, declared, in plain terms, that something strange was in the wind. The first five or six persons, to whom I addressed a demand for explanation, vouchsafed me nothing further than a stare of astonishment. At last, however, I stumbled upon Balfe, who was issuing precipitately from one of the entrances to the Opera Comique:—"What is the matter?" said I; "Don't you know?" said he; "No," said I; "MEYERBEER IS IN PARIS!" said he—and before I could further question him, had vanished.

Well—thought I—Meyerbeer is in Paris, but what is that to me, and what is that to Balfe, and what is that to the Boulevards? Meyerbeer is in Paris, but why should that turn the prelude to confarriation—that usually quiet and sociable hour, when everybody meets everybody—into a tornado? Meyerbeer is in Paris, but why should the people in the streets be as straws blown about by a whirlwind? Meyerbeer is in Paris, but why should that metamorphose the urbane and philosophical inhabitants into irregular companies of échappés de Charenton? “I will tell you,” said Fiorentino, who placed his arm in mine before I observed him, and caught the tenor of my audibly-expressed reflections; “I will tell you.” And walking with me as far as the corner of the Rue Laffitte, he stopped suddenly, and in a subdued tone of voice he said, “Meyerbeer comes to Paris, once a year, and it is ever thus when he arrives.” “Why so?” I enquired. “I can’t exactly say,” was his reply, and turned away, leaving me as much as ever in the dark.

At last I met Panofka, who knows everything and everybody, and the reason of everything, and the peculiarities of everybody; and having no engagement I accepted his invitation to dine with him at the recently renovated Rocher de Cancale (excuse the three R’s) celebrated by Paul de Kock. Now, thought I, Panofka will tell me the why and the wherefore. And so Panofka ordered the dinner—which as he was to pay for it was in due form—and this was his taste. (I am in the circumstantial vein, so you must take all I give you and be thankful.) Huitres d’Ostende, 4 doz.—bottle of Chably Première; Purée de Cressy—bottle of Beaune, Première; Merlan frite, garni d’éperlins—bottle of Strasbourg beer; Cotelettes de Mouton à la mignon—bottle of Champagne (Sillery) frappée; Poulet à la Marengo—bottle of Chateau Margaux with eau de Selz; faisan roti and purée de pommes de terre—second bottle of Champagne frappée—omelette soufflée, salade ordinaire, fromage de Rochfort—café noir (deux demi tasses); eau de vie de cognac (deux petits verres); and dessert, involving divers fruits, crèmes de chocolat, patisseries, sucreries, and ices à l’eau and à la crème of various kinds and colours. This was Panofka’s idea of a dinner; and it was not a bad one, you will own. When we could eat no more, and drink no more, I took occasion to put the question to Panofka as to what was the cause of the unusual disturbance on the Boulevard. “Why,” said he, “Meyerbeer is here, to be sure.” “What then?” I rejoined. “Ah mon cher farcon, I can see you know little of Paris, and less of Meyerbeer—go and ask Jules de Glimes.” “But he is not in Paris, he is in Brussels.” “Well, go to Brussels, and ask Jules de Glimes.” And the next day I packed up a few necessities, and proceeded to the chemin de fer, in the Rue d’Amsterdam, and there, meeting Mr. Mitchell, who was on the point of starting, I took my place, and accompanied him to Rouen—where he had some business connected with his company for the ensuing season.

How beautiful is Rouen by daylight—with its Cathedral, its Quay, its Seine, its bridges, and its relics of Norman architecture; at least, so I have heard, and read, for by daylight I never saw it! How beautiful is Rouen by moonlight—with its Cathedral, its Quay, its Seine, its bridges, and its relics of Norman architecture; at least, so I have heard, and read, for by moonlight I never saw it! How beautiful is Rouen by starlight—with its Cathedral, its Quay, its Seine, its &c. &c. &c.; at least so I have heard, and read, for by starlight I never saw it! We started from Paris at three—Mr. Mitchell and I—and we arrived at Rouen by seven—Mr. Mitchell and I. But all was dark! The night was gloomy and tempestuous; the sky was buried in clouds; not a star, not a moon, not even a comet, when comets are plentiful as blackberries, was to be seen! Nothing was to be seen—not even the darkness—for everything was, as it were, swaddled in a many-folded gloom of doubtful grey. As we passed through the streets, the houses seemed tumbling about our ears—as we passed the Cathedral it was as a gigantic shapeless edifice of mist, the very ghost of the Norman architecture—as we stood upon the bridge, we could not see the city—as we stood upon the city we could not see the bridge! But Mr. Mitchell persisted in asking me what I thought of Rouen, and took me out to see the Cathedral, and to see the other monuments of note, which were all as invisible as the future. In revenge, however, we repaired to the Grand Theatre, the Theatre des Arts, where usually the grand operas are given, and there we saw—as well as the fog, which nearly blinded the lamps, would let us—a part of the little vaudeville, called, Une femme qui se jette par la fenetre, very tolerably played, and the first act of Paer’s jolly old opera, the Maitre de Chapelle, which, though villanously rendered by all concerned, pleased me by its quaintness, delighted me by its cleverness and made me anxious to know more of its composer. After this, to wind up with eclat, we had a sumptuous dinner, at eleven o’clock, with two bottles of Sauterne that made the heart rejoice, and expelled all the vapours created by the fog. And then, at half-past midnight, without voiture—none being obtainable—knowing nothing of the city, and scarcely seeing a yard before our noses, we had to grope our way to the railroad station, without a guide; of course we went to the wrong place first, as there were two to choose, and had not only to retrace our steps, but to mend our pace, for the right station was a good half league away. By help of stamina, and resolution, and a civil inhabitant of Rouen, whom we met, just at the moment when we despaired of finding the way, we reached the terminus, in time; two minutes later, and we should have had to pass the night, with the fog for pillow (or rather wet-blankets and damp-sheets) in the streets of Rouen. At half-past five we got back to Paris; and at six o’clock, snug in bed, I fell asleep and dreamed of Rouen—Rouen—Rouen. I was wandering about the streets, all night, with Mr. Mitchell, and might have saved myself the trouble of coming back to Paris. But in my dream I had the sentiment of cold and heat at the same time, distinctly; my soul was at Rouen, and my body in Paris. I shall never forget the adventure—and please Heaven will pay Rouen a visit some day by daylight.

Of news I am scant. Meyerbeer, who came here with the fog, has consented to write a one-act opera for Mr. Lumley, in which Jenny Lind is to have the principal part. The wags say that Meyerbeer came to Paris to escape from Mendelssohn’s Elijah, which is preparing at Berlin, and to preside, after his particular fashion, at the first representation of Verdi’s Jerusalem, which is in a forward state of progress at the Grand Opera; but this I regard as a mere pleasantry. Meyerbeer has brought his wife and family here, en route to Italy, where they are going for the sake of health, and no doubt Meyerbeer’s wife and family, as well as himself, are anxious to hear the new creation of the celebrated Verdi, one of Meyerbeer’s most enthusiastic disciples and closest imitators. M. Vatel has, I hear, sent Alboni a blank treaty for her to fill up, and the opinion prevails that she will appear at the Italiens soon after her return to Paris. She is expected at the end of this month. M. Vatel—report says—has been offered 200,000 francs to give up the two seasons that remain of his direction; but—report adds—demands 360,000! You will be glad to hear that Mendelssohn,* while in Switzerland, was not idle; he has positively composed the first act of his opera—Larline, not the Tempest—and two violin quartets; who will eventually have the opera in London remains to be decided. Carlotta Grisi is still reaping laurels at Brussels. Adolphe Adam's new theatre, in the Boulevard du Temple, the Opera National, whose object is music for the multitude, will open next week; on Saturday I hope to be able to attend the dress rehearsal. Mr. Green and his balloon are creating a furore at the Hippodrome; on Sunday nearly 200,000 persons witnessed his ascent: next Sunday up he goes again, in company with a pair de France, and some other simpletons, who pay through the nose, as I hear, for their seats. And thus the world wags here. Excuse the length of this; I had no time to make it shorter. Good bye, till next week. Yours, D.

P.S. Madame Grisi assures me that she has not signed for St. Petersburg—but she does not say she will not. Rosati will appear at the Opera.

Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

THE greatest musical genius in the world has left us. Yes! Mendelssohn is dead—vanished suddenly before our eyes, like some mighty star, but newly quenched, towards which all gaze was turned. In the pride of life, in the zenith of his fame, has he departed from us. While the echos of his Elijah were yet ringing silverly in the ears of universal England; while the fame of that immortal work was spreading its author's name on the four winds of heaven, exacting its commemoration before the living world, the spirit of the composer fled for ever. Yes! Mendelssohn is dead! We linger on the words as though there might haply be some error of the brain in our giving credence to all we have heard; and that some dream, some hideous nightmare, had brought us the terrible news. For, can we believe that he who so lately shook our hands in sweet fellowship, the music of whose voice is yet audible to our hearing, the intellectual beaming of whose countenance still plays before our eyes, is now but an earthy clod, a lightless, pulseless, motionless thing of clay—corruption's crop, the worms' proper harvest? Alas! it is no error of the brain, nor dream, nor hideous nightmare! Mendelssohn is dead! From mouth to mouth fly the fatal words. The streets are rife with sad accounts of this universal calamity. It needs no bills in mighty type to chronicle the report. His death is music's eclipse, and all eyes are sensible to the "dunest cloak" that ever misfortune threw athwart the bright day of art.

It is impossible to estimate the loss of Mendelssohn to the musical world. Had he died full of years like Handel, Haydn, and Beethoven, his great countrymen, our regrets would have been qualified by the consideration that he had outlived his time and fulfilled his mission. But he died in the very prime of manhood, at the age of 38, and in the fullest powers of his genius. His last great work, Elijah, has been universally pronounced his masterpiece, and when we call to mind how lately this oratorio was written, we must concede to him, at the moment of his death, the most perfect possession of his lofty abilities. If we consider the amount of intellect and variety of capacity, the powers of imagination and reflection, the acuteness of perception and observation, and, above all, the knowledge and experience that are demanded to make up the sum of a great musical composer, we shall not hesitate to place Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy side by side with the greatest musical geniuses the world has produced. Yes, Mendelssohn was a genius in the truest sense of the word. Possessed of a mind singularly clear and luminous, he, from his very childhood, grappled with the science of music, and mastered its knowledge with as much ease as other boys would acquire their alphabet. Music may be said to have been cradled with him. From his earliest years he not only displayed the most surpassing capacity to appreciate the mysteries of his art, but he also gave proof of that enthusiasm, without which there can be no real genius, no more than there can be fire without heat. Fortunately this enthusiasm, which so often renders genius like an unbitted steed, was, with Felix Mendelssohn, under the governance of the most admirable judgment. Never was musician more conscientious, and never did composer allow himself to be less influenced by momentary flights of fancy, or unweighed impulses—those rock upon which so many bright intelligences have been shattered. Though possessed of the utmost facility in composition, Mendelssohn never allowed his first impressions to go before the public before he had submitted them to subsequent repeated inspections. He owed this, he thought, to his own fame as an artist, and to the world, who in purchasing his works, expected from him something better than the sweepings of his studio. In this respect Mendelssohn's conduct might form an admirable example to all future writers, the following of which would teach them not only to prize art the more, but to know themselves better. Modesty, we are sorry to say, is not one of the peculiarities of the musical class in general. Mendelssohn's intellect was deep and searching rather than vast and comprehensive. His mind loved rather to cling round the true and beautiful, and to pore into their recesses for hidden joys, than to roam at large, in quest of unknown worlds, and not finding them, draw upon his imagination only. Originality, in the strictest term, may be applied to Mendelssohn as a composer. In the face of the great masters of all times he founded a new school: a school, which having truth for its basis, and knowledge for its superstructure, will live while music lives. But we do not wish, in this place, to enter into an analysis of the composer's works; nor is it our intention to give more than a cursory glance at his life. In an early number, when the materials in our possession are arranged, we shall enter into a critical review of all his works, and endeavour to estimate, satisfactorily to our readers, the effect his music has produced on the present age. Meanwhile, we trust our subscribers will rest satisfied with the following succinct notice of his life and works.

Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy was born at Hamburgh on the 3rd of February, 1809. Before he was six years old, he gave extraordinary indications of a genius for music. His parents, especially his mother, herself a musician of no common order, immediately decided on having the young Felix instructed in music, and accordingly placed him under Zelter, who taught him composition. His pianoforte instructors were Ludwig Berger, Klein, Hummel, and Moschelles. He subsequently studied counterpoint under Cherubini, who augured the greatest things of his young pupil. Before he was nine years old, his performance on the pianoforte was so astonishing, that his friends advised him to play in public; and in consequence, he made his debut at Berlin, in 1818. His success was most triumphant; and all the journals teemed with eulogiums on the boy-pianist, and prognostications of his future. In 1824, when but fifteen years of age, he first published his compositions. These consisted of four quartets, and a sonata. In 1827, his opera, Die Hochzeit de Camacho, was performed at Berlin. From this period up to the moment of his death he was giving compositions to the world, embracing all sorts of works, from the "Lieder ohne worte," or ballads without words, to the Oratorio. His pianoforte works are perhaps more important than those of any other writer. But music was not alone Mendelssohn's study. He was a proficient in almost all modern languages. With the English he was intimately acquainted. It was after poring over the magic pages of Shakspeare he wrote the overture and supplemental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, of which it is not saying too much, that it is worthy to be wedded to such immortal verse. We do not remember the first year of his coming to England, all that shall appear anon; but it was subsequent to his journey to the Hebrides that he composed the overture to The Isles of Fingal, one of his most brilliant and characteristic effusions. About the same period, we believe, or a year later, he wrote the Melusina. In 1833, Mendelssohn was appointed musical director of Dusseldorf, which he held for two years, and resigned for the post of director of the Gewandhaus Concerts, at Leipzig. At the Musical Festival at Dusseldorf, on the 22nd of May, 1836, his first grand Oratorio, Paulus, was produced. His last and greatest work, the Oratorio, Elijah, was first produced in this country, being performed at Birmingham in August, 1846. It was subsequently performed at Exeter Hall in April last, and afterwards at the Gloucester Festival. Although the promise of the Opera of The Tempest was an idle report, and utterly unfounded in fact, Mendelssohn had yet thoughts of writing for the stage. After leaving England this spring, and fulfilling some necessary duties on the continent, he betook himself, for the benefit of his health, to Interlachen in Switzerland, with a determination, as he expressed it, of abstaining from composition altogether. But—

"Quiet to quick bosoms is a hell."

Mendelssohn could no more rest, unfortunately, than could the sun stand still. All his friends and his medical adviser entreated him to give his brain repose. He had previously been afflicted with two strokes of cerebral paralysis, and the physician too well knew how likely the third was to prove fatal. But all remonstrance was fruitless—Mendelssohn could not exist and be idle. Accordingly he set to to write an Opera entitled Larline, the libretto of which had been furnished him in Paris, and applied himself to the task with so much assiduity that he had the first act completed before he left Switzerland. There is little doubt that the mental exertion applied to this composition had some participation in the cause of his death.

The published works of Mendelssohn amount to one opera, four overtures, two symphonies, three quartets, two quintets, two sonatas, concerto for pianoforte, psalm "Non nobis," "Ave Maria, for eight voices, six books of "Lieder ohne worte," two fantasias, three chorales, and numberless varied temas, rondos, lieder, capriccios, fantasias, &c., for the piano; and his two imperishable Oratorios, Paulus and Elijah. Among his manuscripts may be found an overture and symphony, several chorales, the Walpurgis Nacht, cantatas, an operetta, entitled Leiderspel, some sacred pieces, and music adapted to Antigone and the Cædipus Colonnus. We have reserved the specification of these composition to our promised notice on the Life and Works of Mendelssohn.

We quote an interesting extract from a letter of Mr. Moschelles to a friend, which appeared in the Morning Post of Thursday, concerning the last moments of Mendelssohn:

"Mendelssohn felt the first approach of the malady which ultimately terminated his life on the 8th of October. It was an attack of an apoplectic nature. From that day until the 28th he experienced moments of ease and relapses. During this period he felt sufficiently well to take several carriage airings. On the 28th, when in full convalescence, a second attack occurred, but this was of short duration. He promptly recovered his senses and his strength returned. Notwithstanding this, he felt severe attacks of head-ache, and could not sleep for three or four days. During the nights of the 2nd and 3rd of November his sleep returned, and he slept seven hours consecutively. Upon his awaking on the morning of the 3rd, he felt quite well, and his family had sanguine hopes of his recovery. He remained thus during the forenoon. But at two o'clock he had a relapse, and a third attack supervened more violent and more prolonged than the former ones. He recovered consciousness but slowly, after bleeding, application of leeches, and vigorous friction. He was attended by Dr. Clarus and Dr. Hammer of Leipsic. Messengers had been sent for Dr. Schönlein, of Berlin. His arrival was waited for with intense anxiety, but he did not come. The night passed in alternations of agitation and tranquillity. Mendelssohn recognised all the persons present, but spoke little. On the morning of the 4th, his state caused the most vivid inquietude. The directors of the "Gewandhaus" decided to put off the concert which was to have taken place that evening. At the second hour the sufferer became insensible, and gave no other signs of life than a strong and equal respiration. All the efforts of the medical men to restore sight and hearing were useless. From six till eight o'clock blisters and violent frictions were exhibited, but without success. In the meantime his features changed with frightful rapidity. At half-past eight his respiration became feebler—it was evident that his end was near. At last, at nine o'clock, on the 4th, a lengthened sigh announced that Mendelssohn had rendered up his soul to his Maker. Near his bed were his wife, his brother, the two doctors, Mr. Schleinitz, Mr. David, and myself. All Leipsic is in mourning."

We have this moment received from a correspondent at Leipzig a further account of the death of Mendelssohn, which we insert in our journal, as every atom of news, at this moment, concerning the last moments of so great a man, must have an inestimable value. Our correspondent, who sends via Hamburg, thus writes:—

Leipzig, Sunday, Nov. 7, 1847.—Before receiving this, you will have already heard the sad tidings of the deprivation with which the musical world especially has, within the last few days, been visited. Our great and beloved Mendelssohn is dead! Anxious fears had been entertained respecting him for some time, and on Thursday night (4th instant), at half-past nine, he breathed his last. The commencement of his illness, I believe, was an attack of the nervous fever (very prevalent in Leipzig), and his sufferings were brought to a speedy close by two strokes of paralysis. This severe blow has fallen so suddenly upon all that it seems like a dream. WOULD TO GOD THAT IT WAS ONLY A DREAM! But, alas! it is true. The brightest star of the musical hemisphere is now dimmed—no more to shine upon us with its sparkling lustre. You may easily imagine that the fatal news spread like wildfire, and with it carried dismay to every heart. On Friday and Saturday persons were admitted to view the body; great numbers went to pay their last tribute of affection; and many were the heartfelt tears that fell beside his couch, from those who long had known his inestimable qualities, and must now take their "long and last farewell!" Although his sufferings were extreme, the same heavenly smile he was wont to wear, seemed to play upon his features as he lay stretched upon the couch of death. How shall I attempt to describe my feelings, as I stood by the side of him who was so blessed with happiness—transcendent genius—beloved, honoured by all the world—the pride and glory of his art? As I placed my hand upon his fine forehead, and looked on his death shut eye, how fearfully the blood thrilled through my veins 'tis impossible for me to relate! This afternoon the funeral ceremonies were performed in the St. Paul's Church, preparatory to the removal of his remains to Berlin, where they are to be interred. At three o'clock the cortège proceeded on its way, headed by the military band, playing Beethoven's March for the Dead: next came the members of the Concert Orchestra, followed by the students of the Conservatorium of Music (founded by Mendelssohn); then—THE COFFIN—supported on either side by Professors Moschelles, David, Hauptmann, and Gade, and followed by the brother of the departed as chief mourner; the directors of the Conservatorium; numerous professors (among whom were Meyerbeer, Robert Schumann, Charles Mayer, &c.) and friends brought up the rear of this mournful procession. The streets through which the cortège passed were thronged with spectators, and the church was crowded to excess with persons all anxious to take their last look of this great man. The ceremonies in the church commenced with an Organ Præludium and a Chorale from Mendelssohn, interpreted by a large band and chorus, led by Professor David, and conducted by Professors Gade and Rietz. The heavenly Chorale from St. Paul, "To Thee, O Lord! I yield my spirit," came next; after which the minister made an impressive oration; then followed the Chorus, "Happy and blest are they who have endured," from the same oratorio. The minister then pronounced the Benediction, and the mournful ceremony concluded with a Chorale from Bach's "Passion." This evening the body will be conveyed to Berlin, where it will be deposited in its last resting-place. Doubtless the feeling of the musical profession in England, and the public at large, will receive as great a shock at this melancholy and sudden bereavement as those who have witnessed the close of this amiable and great man's career—cut off in the prime of life, and in the midst of his glory. I understand he has left several important works in an unfinished state, among which are a new oratorio, "Christus," and an opera. Poor Joachim, as you may imagine, is almost heartbroken; and every heart is struck with dismay. But let us hope that "the Great Ruler of all things" has been pleased to receive him into "that blessed place where only his harmony can be exceeded." This very day poor Mendelssohn was to have been in Vienna, to direct his Elijah! but, alas! in what a different ceremony has he unwittingly, and to the consternation of all, performed.

The following translation of the words adapted to the music performed at the Funeral Service of the illustrious Composer may not be unacceptable to our readers:

The Funeral Service of Mendelssohn.

CHORALE.

Look down on me, my Saviour,
My Shepherd, take me home;
The Source whence every joy,
And earthly good must come.
Oft to thy table called
I ate the bread of Heaven,
And by thy friendly voice
Were joy and comfort given.

Behold, I stand before thee,
Do not despise me now,
The clammy damp of Death
Is on my whitening brow.
And yet I will not leave thee—
Upon thy love I rest,
And spite of pang and pain
Find refuge in thy breast.

Although I travel hence,
Yet part not thou from me;
If Death be heavy here,
Here let thy presence be.
And as my trembling soul
Draws nearer to the grave,
The agony controul,
And bend thee down to save:

In mine extremest need
Be shield and buckler, thou;
Death loses all its fear
In gazing on thy brow.
My heart is full of faith,
Oh, hold it firm and fast—
For him who thus can die,
Already Death is past.

Lord, to thee, myself I render Thine, and thine alone, to be;
Thou, only thou, my breath and life
My greatest gain is death in thee.
Thine alone this yearning faith,
Thine in life, and thine in death.

Funeral Oratio.

CHORUS FROM PAUL.

Behold! we hold him holy who is meek of spirit, for when the body dies, yet lives the soul.

Benediction.

CHORUS, FROM THE "PASSION" OF J. S. BACH.

We sit us down in tears
Calling on thee in thy tomb;
Gentle slumber, calm and deep,
On each weary limb shall sleep.
Calming the soul with its gentle kiss
Steeping it in a trance of bliss.
Sleep—sleep, and soft be thy doom.
We sit us down in tears,
Calling on thee in thy tomb.

* It is needless to say that we should not have made a new and so imperfect a sketch of the fine chorale and following chorus from Paul had we had the book of the Oratorio by us. This, and the lateness of the hour at which we received our express from Leipzig, must prove an apology for the hurry and imperfection of the translation.—EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL WORLD."

In England, next to the land of his birth, more than any other country, will the memory of Mendelssohn be endeared while genius is prized, and worth revered. In England the intellect of the great composer was duly weighed, and duly appreciated. It was amongst us he found his fondest admirers, and it was our writers, who labouring in his golden wake, first rendered his school a great model for composition. But not his genius alone, his goodness will perpetuate his name. In every relation of life Felix Mendelssohn was loved and honoured. As he had no real rival in the glory of his fame, so had he none who envied his popularity. His hand was ever ready to assist the needy artist, and his tongue was ever lavish of praise, even when praise, without suspicion of envy, were that possible, might be withheld. His death is a universal calamity, without remedy, without hope. Mendelssohn is dead!

Peace to His Manes.

MUSIC! THY BEWITCHING CHARM!

FOR MUSIC.

I have heard steal o'er the waters,
Sounding like some fairy's voice,
Songs by Italy's fair daughters,
Making every heart rejoice.
When reclined beside the ocean,
In the evening, pure and calm,
Then my heart felt with emotion—
Music! thy bewitching charm.

Sweetest pleasure! who does hear thee,
And ne'er feels thy spells divine?
Fiercest wild beasts list and fear thee—
Mortals bow before thy shrine!
Angels do their Saviour's praises,
Sing for ever with sweet psalm's,
And each feather'd warbler raises
Music! thy bewitching charms.

CHAPTER III.

THE ARTIFICIAL COMPOSITION OF "THE AFFINITIES."

AFTER this endeavour to become conscious of the significance of the objects which surround the acting individuals, and to comprehend their æsthetical operation, we turn to the exposition. This gives us the chief traits of the positions and the individualities, so that we can anticipate their future conduct, if any fact should call them out of their sphere, and at the same time points, in the most profound manner to the mystery of the opposition between freedom and necessity. By the latter we, at the same time, gain the peculiar soil, upon which the action and the events take place, and our glance retains the clearly defined limit of the district, which we have to traverse.

It cannot be made sufficiently prominent that the whole exposition, if we consider it in connection with the succeeding development of the work, reveals the most wonderful irony at the views and reflections of the individuals as they themselves express them. Edward, with the most importunate loquacity, entreats Charlotte to consent to an invitation of his active and clever friend; he represents to her, in the most lively manner, all the advantages which will arise from his society. Charlotte does not conceal that she wishes something similar for Ottilia, and looks upon the fulfilment of this wish as a counter concession for the Captain. Thus Ottilia invites the Captain, Charlotte invites Ottilia, and each of the two, unknowingly, draws into the quiet domestic circle the disposition of his happiness and peace of mind. While every one labours thus unconsciously against himself, the seed of a destructive destiny, which ripens more and more fearfully, is scattered in the most unseen manner.

But is not this wish of the married pair perfectly justified? Certainly; its fulfilment therefore shows us nothing further than this, that in the most innocent and insignificant matters, in the most harmless positions, the germ of a violent fate may be concealed; but that here man must make and form into an element for his moral development that which takes place without any action on his part. If he is able to do this he has really mastered chance, but if it is transformed into an internal misfortune, he has become the sacrifice of a blind power.

But in Charlotte's opposition to Edward's desire, from the consideration that the intervention of a third party is important in every situation, nay, that the most sacred relations are not unfrequently utterly destroyed by the addition of a new person—in this opposition we already hear, as it were, a warning voice which carries us beyond the immediate present. If, at the same time, we consider, that it is Charlotte, just this clever, sensible lady, from whom we have this warning objection, it appears as a secret foreboding of an unwholesome change in her position, which has greater weight in the mouth of one, who sets it down as the essential characteristic of her sex, to think more of that which connects together in life; because the fate of women, and the fate of their families, is attached to this connection. Thus, by the most unobtrusive prelude we are carried beyond the immediate present, and by Charlotte the mind is familiarised, at least with the possibility of a great change of position.

Let us not, however, overlook the more important additional element, by which Charlotte's objection first gives the character of a foreboding. When she mentions her earlier connection with Edward, we learn that both of them were compelled, by circumstances, to give their hands to another; that they afterwards met again, and that Charlotte had hesitatingly consented to an union with Edward. From this we perceive, that the relation between the two does not rest upon a feeling which embraces the whole existence, but that they have taken a quiet kindness for perfect love. Thus also, by her resistance at the beginning, Charlotte causes us to suspect a deeper motive. Certainly a secret voice told her that while both had yielded to circumstances, and had formed another union without affection, they had been, as it were, silently instructed as to the nature of their connection, namely, that it is not a free love, embracing the whole life, which has destined them for each other. For this reason alone does the foreboding soul of Charlotte strive against an union with Edward. But had not both already, in a certain sense, entered with a contradiction into matrimony; since, feeling for each other, they had bestowed their hands elsewhere. That they could do this at all gives us a proof of the state of self-delusion in which they are placed. And in this we might also see the deeper germ of the original guilt of both, which afterwards ripens into such bitter fruit. Hence it is, that the narrative of Charlotte's earlier connection with Edward, on the occasion of her objection to make an associate of a third party, carries us beyond the scene immediately before us, and awakens in us the notion that each of the married pair might easily be completely fascinated by another individuality, and thus gain the mistaken feeling of passionate love. Thus the eloquent opposition of Charlotte becomes to us a secret foreboding which rests upon the feeling of an existence not completely satisfied, and hints at an evil threatening from this side. The very unobtrusiveness of this beginning, the narrative of the earlier connections, which seem woven in accidentally, constitute the artistic value of this introduction, the relation of which to the organisation of the whole, we have endeavoured to show.

After the conversation and reflections of the two have given us the fundamental traits of Charlotte and Edward—after the Captain, on his very first appearance, has introduced himself to us as a clear, practical, circumspect man—and Ottilia, through the letters of the Governess and the Teacher, stands before us in her mysterious internalness, the poet shows to us the three first-named individuals in a dialogue which we may rightly deem the key-stone of the exposition, and also as a mine rich in deep thoughts for our work.

As if by accident, the conversation turns upon the affinity of natural things, and more nearly upon that elective affinity, by means of which certain substances seek and hold each other, mutually seize and determine one another. In this is at once touched the kernel of our work, which does not appear in its full significance and justification until the end. We here see individuals in intimate hearty converse on a natural relation, to which man, as it were, assigns his own position and his own feelings, since he designates by the expression "elective," that which is conditioned by a natural necessity, and thus concedes to such a mere natural operation a sort of will and freedom. The clearly analysing Charlotte had declared herself dissatisfied with this mingling of different regions, and will have choice confined to human relations alone. In a short time we see how in these individuals positions are developed, in which freedom really yields to natural necessity—how these persons who, as it were, in proud security, are conscious of their higher attribute of freedom, sink, against their will and knowledge, into the rank of natural substances, which attract and quit each other as they are compelled. From this feeling of security proceeds those lively, half-jesting allusions in which they class themselves like natural things, and can assign a place to the yet absent Ottilia. In an artless manner the poet has here uttered an almost overpowering irony. The positions in which the individuals place themselves, in mere sport, and for the sake of illustrating the doctrine of "elective affinity," are, in the shortest possible time, transformed into fearful earnest; and the consciousness which has distributed the conceptions of freedom and necessity, among human and natural relations, soon finds itself really exposed to a perversion of these conceptions, since it feels itself bound by a power which lies beyond all reflection.

Since here the consciousness, because it is still free, distinguishes itself from the natural necessity of elective affinity, and in its spiritual vitality deems itself exalted high above the confined position of chemistry, it unconsciously designates the succeeding position, in which, against its will, it is seized and retained by a kindred being, as one which is unfree and opposed to the proper distinction of man, and by which the individual is himself transported back to the point of natural necessity. Is not the really tragic calamity of the individuals thus at the same time indicated? To be forced to enter into a condition which one would rather shun, to be obliged to endure all the happiness and torment which this comprises, to be aware of this condition, this is real suffering of the soul, compared with which all other misfortune appears merely external. Bound to other powers of feeling, man is an unfree natural product, and subject to the laws of nature. At this grade, it may be said, is shewn only the universal affinity of natural things, which is continued even in the human race, and represents the connection between the macrocosm and the microcosm.

So long now as man, in this his elective affinity, agrees at the same time with the laws of the moral mind, which are quite independent of it, and fulfils the latter only in the form of the former, he is really happy,* for he exhibits in himself and his relations the union of freedom and necessity. If both sides fall into a difference, so that the free moral consciousness stands in opposition to elective affinity, then man is placed in a tragic collision, the deeper sense of which in reference to our work we pointed out at length in our first notice. This whole discussion, the thoughts of which are just brought out, therefore forms a conclusion to the exposition, which is profound, because it shews us in such a naïve manner the essence of Elective Affinity in the region of nature, and again indicates, and almost anticipates its power in human relations. In the distinction between choice and necessity, which is especially put in the mouth of Charlotte, the conversation, with just as much naïveté, refers us to the approaching collisions between these two powers. The designation of the characters, the narrative of the earlier relations between Edward and Charlotte, only elevate for us the matter of this dialogue into a foreboding of the discord which is shortly to arise—elevate the harmless classification of individuals according to the law of elective affinities into a warning prelude of reality.

The exposition, admirable by its simplicity and the extensive prospect it affords, has attained that which is the great point in all artistic introductions—the tone of mind is brought so far that it does not find the development of the struggle unprepared.

SONNET.

No. LVIII.

[A wrong line crept into this Sonnet, as given last week; it is therefore deemed right to reprint it with the necessary correction, especially as it is immediately connected with No. LIX.]

LIFE does not flow in one continued course,
So that its parts all with each other blend,
Each one beginning at another's end,
And each one in its turn a goal and source.
No, there are points where the stream gathers force,
And suddenly appears its course to mend,
As though to some new destiny 'twould tend—
Such points with joy we think on—or remorse.
And thus it was when first thine eyes met mine,
The changeless course of years at once was broken,
Another scene was offer'd to my view;
And though the image be not always thine
That fills my soul; yet still through thee was spoken
That word of fate, which bade my life be new.

SONNET.

No. LIX.

UNASK'D in a strange country we are plac'd;
The scene of our own act we may not choose.
There is one manacle we ne'er can lose—
One bound'ry, which a pow'r not ours has trac'd.
New scenes arise, old objects are effac'd
Without our will; that pow'r its strength renews,
From whose dark hand no cup we may refuse,
Whether of gall or nectar be its taste.
Within such limits can the soul be free?
It can—for it can meet the pow'r without
By change within, through its own native might.
Quick, bold, relentless must its action be—
It must not doubt—it must not hesitate,
But, lightning-like, flash through the destin'd night.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

HAYMARKET.—The once popular operatic comedietta, The Rencontre, has been revived here. The piece was excellently played and was received with applause. Mr. H. Farren improves a little on acquaintance; but, as far as we could judge from the weak samples he gave us of his singing, the night we heard him in the Rencontre, we would advise him to eschew vocalisation altogether. Farren's performance of the old Baron who hates duelling, threatens to disinherit his nephew for challenging a fellow-officer, and is himself ultimately induced to pull a trigger with an adversary, was most excellent. It was legitimate comic acting—rich, racy, and unctuous. Webster's Pierre was admirable. The parts of Madame de Merville and Justine were respectively filled by Mrs. Seymour and Miss Reynolds, and were played right well.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—The principal feature of the week's performance has been the selection from Beethoven's works, which was received on Monday with great applause. Mr. Koenig's benefit took place on Tuesday, when a selection from the Lucrezia Borgia was given, embracing the popular airs from that opera. We deem it but justice to notice the performance of two young artistes, Mr. Viotti Collins, and Mr. Roland, who on their respective instruments, the violin and contra-basso, displayed great mechanical powers, and elicited enthusiastic applause. Mr. Viotti Collins is a very elegant and tasteful player, and his performance was decidedly the most complete we have heard, from an English violinist, for some time. He was encored. Mr. Roland played an air with variations, of his own composing, and narrowly escaped an encore. He is really a very clever artiste, and is one of our best performers on the contra-basso. His bowing is particularly neat and clear, and his execution very brilliant. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the theatre has been thronged every night. M. Jullien has announced his Bal Masqué for the 22nd inst., with which the conce ts close for the season.

PRINCESS'S.—“Eight celebrated singers from the Pyrenees,” have appeared here during the week, and have indulged the audience in very extraordinary displays of vocalisation. The singers, severally, have considerable merit. The part-singing showed they had studied in a good school, and exhibits both taste and art. A war chant, in which the tenor's chest voice came out with Donzelli-like power, was encored with acclamations. Since the days of the celebrated Hungarian Brothers, we have heard no set of vocalists of this kind, which can compete with the “Singers of the Pyrenees.”

SADLER'S WELLS.—A new tragedy, or play, as the bills call it, was produced here, on Wednesday evening, the 2nd inst. To the interest commonly felt in a successful dramatist, is added the fact that the author is, in the present instance, a clergyman of the Church of England: accordingly a crowded and highly intelligent audience assembled to witness this, the third and latest dramatic effort of the Rev. James White. The play, like the rest of the author's, is historical. We do not know whether John Saville is a real personage or not, but the chief historical interest of the piece turns on the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham, the profligate favourite of Charles the First, by Felton. The opening scene displays the Duke, Mr. Marston, in the midst of his retainers, one of whom, Trivett, Mr. Hoskins, offers him the possession of a young country girl of great beauty, the excitement of novelty to his palled and listless passions. This girl is Lillian, Miss Addison, the daughter of John Saville. Meanwhile, Felton, a kinsman of Saville, claiming, in an interview with the Duke, the long promised reward of important military services, is dismissed by Buckingham with scorn and indifference, and retires to his kinsman. We are now introduced to John Saville and his daughter at their house at Haysted. The rapacious favourite has already marked Saville's property for confiscation, and a claim is made by the King, which, unless it can be successfully resisted, will involve the unfortunate squire in hopeless ruin. The Duke, in pursuit of his design upon Lillian, obtains an interview with her in her father's garden, by means of a feigned assault and rescue, and thus succeeds in making such progress in her confidence, that upon his announcing himself to be the Duke of Buckingham's brother, the artless Lillian forms the somewhat romantic project of seeking an interview with the Duke, for the purpose of averting her father's impending ruin, and thus falls into the snare that has been laid for her. She secretly leaves her father's house for Portsmouth, the headquarters of the Duke, who follows her, but is encountered by Felton, who, suspecting his designs, succeeds in drawing the truth from him, and vehemently denouncing him, they fight. Felton is wounded, and can only hasten to Saville, to announce to him his daughter's flight. The heart-stricken parent, unaware of her motives, follows her. The scene changes to Portsmouth, and now comes the best scene in the play. The Duke, throwing off the mask, discloses himself and his designs to Lillian, who receives his proposal with the deepest disgust, but she is now completely in his power. Her father has, however, contrived to convey to her a phial of poison, with an intimation to swallow it as a last resource from the Duke's designs; but an order arrives from the King, obtained by one of Saville's friends, commanding Buckingham to desist from his purpose and restore the maid to her father; but the Duke tearing the paper in a rage, and rushing out to consummate his designs on Lillian, is met by the dagger of the assassin, and staggering in again falls dead, and is followed by Felton, with the instrument of death reeking in his hands. The rescue of Lillian thus effected, comes too late, for she has swallowed the poison in despair, and dies in her father's arms. Here is excellent matter in incident and character for a tragic drama, but, although the play contains much of both, and was listened to with considerable interest throughout, yet the author has failed to work up his materials to the utmost of their capabilities. In short, the play is so good that we cannot help thinking that it ought, and that it might have been much better, and such is the impression that this gentleman's plays have all left upon us. They seem to fail of their due effect, less from want of power in the author, than from lack of the needful time and labour in their construction. He weaves his tale with clearness and simplicity, and in his conception of character has as clear an insight of the great requisites for dramatic effect, strength, variety, and contrast. Thus, nothing can be better adapted for his purpose than the characters of the haughty, profligate, and relentless Duke—the honest, brave, and heart-seared parent, Saville—and the gloomy and fanatical puritan, Felton. The fiery elements on each of these only wanted contact to produce a volcano. But the Duke has but two short scenes with Felton, although the latter is a very effective one; and, as for Saville, with the exception of a weak and somewhat feeling interview with Buckingham, in which the outraged parent is made to go down on his knees to his relentless oppressor, they do not once come in contact throughout the play. Thus the author fails to realise the high promise held out by the first two acts. The best drawn character in the piece is that of Saville. The mingled pathos and humour of the early scenes were given by Mr. Phelps with the versatility peculiar to him. The last scene, in which, holding his dead child in his arms, he clings with true parental tenacity to the hope that she is only asleep, was touching. He was well supported by Miss Addison, who, by the way, looked exceedingly well, and was dressed with becoming grace and simplicity. Her best point was her burst of indignation at the profligate proposals of the Duke. Here she was quite in her element. Felton is made a fanatical and dreaming enthusiast, who fancies that the hand of Heaven will sanction his assassination of the Duke, nor could anything be better than Mr. Bennett's personation of the character, which was not the less effective, because, with the exception of two or three passages, it was perfectly quiet throughout. His face and attitude, as he stood over his fallen victim had a stern repose exceedingly picturesque. A scene of the inside, and another of the outside of Haysted Hall, are well painted, and interesting as specimens of the style of building prevalent at the period; a wooded landscape also is admirably designed and executed. The piece was received with the greatest enthusiasm. After the principal performers had, as usual, come forward, there was a loud call for the author, when Mr. Phelps announced that he was not in the house.

ASTLEY'S.—A new grand dramatic spectacle, entitled, The Camp of Silesia, taken, as the bills have it, from Meyerbeer's celebrated opera, was produced on Monday, with great magnificence, and was received with success. A certain Miss Lydia Pearce made her first appearance at this theatre, and played the heroine with great spirit. Mr. Batty's two elephants, purchased at Mr. Hughes's sale, were exhibited in the circle after the spectacle, and displayed great docility, and went through several very un-elephantine feats.

OPERATIC SKETCHES,

No. 1.—GRISI.

GIULIETTA GRISI is one of the most favoured and favourite singers the Opera has boasted of since the days of the famous Banti. From the first night when she appeared in Ninetta, in La Gazza Ladra, in 1834, to the present time, her career has been one of undeviating favouritism and undiminished success. She took the town by storm and still retains her strong-hold in the citadel. Her classic beauty, her natural ease, her pathos, her fervour, her exquisite organ, the perfectibility of her singing, clear, brilliant, and pure in intonation, created a tempest in her favour, of which time, circumstance, and mutation, have scarcely allayed one breath. The grandeur of Pasta, unfortunately too sublime for general appreciation, or too deeply moulded in the school of imperial tragedy, might awe the public into admiration but for a few seasons—Catalani might electrify and astound awhile, yet at last outweary her hearers—the silvery fluidity of Sontag, unattended with higher excellencies, might pall upon the ear—but it was absolutely left for Grisi, through time and tide, through change and novelty, through seasons, cycles and lustres, albatross-like, with wing that never tired, to hold her way still onward in public estimation: nay more, with Malibran in her zenith, she seemed to divide the general acclamation; and some had the hardihood to declare she was as fine a singer, while no few insisted Grisi's was the more accomplished voice. We do not pledge ourselves to belong to either of these parties.

Grisi's voice is a pure soprano of the very finest quality. She can sing without a strain to C in alt. Her lower notes are occasionally weak, but the middle tones are full, mellow, and deliciously sweet. The flexibility of her voice is proverbial. In arias di agilità she may even fairly compete with Sontag, while in every other respect she is the avowed superior of that charming songstress. Grisi's voice has power to a great extent, but power alone is not her forte. If her forte singing be as perfect as might be desired in such an artiste, her sotto voce leaves nothing for the most critical to cavil at. In this respect she is far superior to any singer we ever heard. It is impossible to describe the exquisite delicacy and purity of her tones while warbling piano passages. Perhaps the knowledge of this directs her to throw into her singing too much light and shade for the sake of effect, and tempts her to force her voice beyond its power, that she may shine by contrast and revel in the excellence of her sotto voce—as actors in parts of their character purposely underplay themselves, that they may strike the more when they come to their points. But Grisi's voice has charms independent of this. It adapts itself to all styles of music, from the lofty grandeur of Donna Anna to the simple pathos of Ninetta—from the passion of the Babylonian Queen to the coquetry of Norina—from the voluptuous sensibility of Norma to the comic grace and naïvete of Rosina. Where energy is required, or love, anger or despair, her voice, as it were, having power to modulate itself to every newer shade of feeling, becomes the veritable vehicle of the passion of the moment. This is high praise, but it is commensurate with desert. Her singing Mozart's music, witness her Donna Anna, is no less chaste and severe than her singing Rossini's is brilliant and light. From her lips, Or sai chi l'onore is as grand an effort of classical vocality, as the Di piacer is a dazzling illustration of the aria di agilità. There is but little appearance of art about Grisi's singing: what she utters seems to fall naturally from her lips, and from the impulse of the moment. On the stage she, indeed, seems to be a true child of Nature.

Perhaps it may be said, Grisi is still more commendable as a histrionic than a lyric artist. If she be removed from the awful majesty of Pasta, or if she lack the absorbing intensity of Malibran, she has passion and power of the highest accomplishment. In the lofty and sublime she fails not in the ability to identify, or the abstraction to realise. Grisi possesses great versatility of talent. There is grandeur in her tragedy—witness her Donna Anna and Norma; there is infinite beauty in her pathos, as her unrivalled personification of Ninetta may illustrate: and her Susanna and Rosina abundantly testify her claims to comic power in "its highest signification." Thus, it cannot for a moment be denied that she lays claim to genius in its truest and fullest import. Like every other faculty of the human mind, genius must have its grades. The endurance of fame—the unabating ardour of admirers—the enthusiasm of succeeding audiences—the universal favoritism, amounting to a mania, could hardly be the unfailing attendants on mere talent, or that species of ability, which, however praiseworthy, or however supported by fashion, prejudice, or taste, can never hope to fix that hold on public estimation which true genius alone effectuates.

It must be allowed in the scale of her appreciation, that, with a certain class of her upholders, Grisi's beauty carries no small weight. Her beauty, indeed, is of high order. The outline of the head is particularly elegant and classical, or, as Hector Berlioz would denominate it, Olympian. Her features are expressive and full of fine intelligence: they are, of a verity, features cast in no common mould. They are full-fraught with that nobility by which, with a thought, the deepest shade or brightest sunshine is truthfully depicted. This was one of the wondrous characteristics of poor Malibran's looks!!! The slightest emotion or change of feeling was apparent as the hours on the dial plate. A poet of our acquaintance was wont to say, "she had a thousand passions on her upper lip!" With some little reservation we may assert the same of Grisi. Her face is a clear lake where the beam or the cloud is reflected with truth and perspicuity. Thought seems to exhale from her countenance, and the artist-feeling casts the momentaneous veil of the ruling passion over her features. This is the choicest faculty of genius; and whether it be ciphered abstraction or mimetic power, is the grand line that, on the stage, separates the rare few from the million. To award an individual a higher niche in the histrionic than the lyric temple, is to invest the head with a crown of gold instead of a wreath of roses. For one who is pre-eminent as an actor, we have thousands who have occupied the foremost rank as singers. Pasta's voice was an organ of indifferent excellency, but Pasta was one of the greatest dramatic singers the world ever saw. On the other hand, what host of delicious songsters do we hear, year after year, that, like comets, emblazon the hemisphere a space, then disappear as suddenly as they came, never to be heard of more—annuals that die with the season! How many singers does England at this moment possess, with voices of rare quality and power, and yet to hope that one of these may rival Grisi is to indulge in a dream of visionary speculation. And why is this? They lack dramatic power—the genius to make others feel what themselves express. Force will not supply the place of energy, rant passion, nor affectation feeling; and yet to these three qualities, or rather assumptions, force, rant, and affectation, some of our first singers are indebted for being enrolled among the foster-babes of genius. Genius is unmistakeable: it stands out in bold relief from the flat ground of surrounding mediocrity. There is no erring in respect to Grisi. Hypercritics may urge that she wants Pasta's flight or Malibran's fire, but this mode of criticising is only less feeble than that of judging by defects, and cannot affect her own high merits. That she is not perfect, is only what may be predicated of all the greatest artists. Greatness, so far from being incompatible with faults, is necessarily, from its lofty soaring, being liable to be dazzled with the sun, or dizzied with its elevation, more subject to sins and offences than mediocrity, whose wing is too cautious and too dependent to dare too high or too discursive a flight. It may be a matter to be deplored, but nothing has experience taught us to be more true, than that the greatest geniuses are allied to the greatest faults. Pasta, Malibran, Catalani, Garcia, Velluti, Ambrogetti, Tamburini, Rubini, and Braham are all on the lyric stage evidences of this position. We shall therefore be less astonished to find Grisi number a few defects among her excellencies. These it is neither grateful to us to touch upon, nor do we think them of sufficient importance to hold our attention one moment. In gazing on the sun his lustre outshines his spots.

In conclusion, whether we consider Grisi as a vocalist or an actress—whether we look upon her as one endowed with the rarest faculties of song, or as gifted with histrionic powers of the highest order, in either case eminent award must await her;—but when conjoining both qualifications, when to sweetness, purity, delicacy, intonation, perfectibility of execution in the voice, we add fire, energy, high development, and abstraction in her acting, we shall not hesitate to enrol her in the list of the greatest singers, while we adjudge to her, as her incontrovertible right, the loftiest seat in the Temple of the Modern Lyric Drama.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

HANOVER, NOVEMBER 7.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Although I have been visiting a number of places, it does not happen that I can give you much musical information.

I beg, therefore, you will not place the dearth to any want of activity, or inclination on my part to seek for it. After leaving Baden-Baden I wended my way north-east. At Frankfort there was no Opera, nor was there any concert announced. Dance-music, à la Sperl, one might hear in the Wiedenbuseh Hotel, if inclined to inhale at the same time, the masses of smoke issuing from the mouths of a thousand burghers! I spent one day at the pretty watering-place, Homburg, situated in a most agreeable country. The Prince has allowed a Cursaal to be erected there, which is not inferior to those at Baden and Ems. In the evening an excellent orchestra performed potpourris from Robert le Diable, and Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, as well as several waltzes and polkas. Next morning I set off (the railway not being completed) by diligence to Eisenach, the road wending through vallies smiling with verdure, often reminding me of English scenery. At Eisenach I found myself in a most romantic part of Thuringia. Of course I ascended without loss of time, the mountain on which stands the celebrated Wartburg, where, some dozen years ago, assembled many thousand students from all parts of Germany to celebrate the 300th anniversary of Luther's birthday. You are aware how unfortunate this meeting ended for the liberties of the universities. The King of Prussia is now having the castle reinstated into its ancient form, and, when finished, it will be, to all lovers of the beautiful and romantic, a spot of great attraction, for, from its casements, the most delightful prospects present themselves to the eager gaze of the visitor. The rooms which Luther inhabited, during his ten months' imprisonment, remain as they then existed; the furniture of wood is of the coarsest description, whilst a couple of portraits of Luther, by Krauch, ornament the otherwise bare walls. From Eisenach I proceeded on to the bath, Lichtenstein, situated a few hours' journey distance from Eisenach, amongst the most romantic scenery. The Duke of Coburg, and the Prince of Meiningen were there, still enjoying the pure mountain air; and as the place is but small, all the principal persons congregate at the hotel erected by the Duke for the visitors accommodation. I made some very agreeable acquaintances—among them, the Baron and Baroness of Oldershausen; the Baroness speaks English very well; in the course of conversation I discovered that she is the niece of our esteemed friend, Mr. Wessel, of London. The Baron and Baroness were kind enough to invite me to their chateau at Gebesee, near Erfurt; so, after enjoying the charming retirement of Lichtenstein for about a week, I went to Erfurt and took post for the chateau at Gebesee, where I was most kindly received by the noble owners. The Baroness is a good musician, and possesses a soprano voice of uncommon sweetness and flexibility. The Baron accompanied me to a neighbouring town, called Weissensee, where the Thuringia, Gesang vereine, had assembled to execute some choruses. At one time, about twelve hundred voices united to sing Luther's Hymn, "Eine feste burg ist unser Gott;" the effect was most overpowering and sublime. The famous chorus, from Fidelio, likewise produced a great effect. Minor compositions served for rival display of the powers of the different societies. After the performances all parties met at the social dinner-tables. Lodgings were cheerfully given to the visitors by the townspeople without any remuneration, which gave us a favourable impression of the kindness and hospitality of the Thuringians. I parted with regret from my kind host, and taking the train at Erfurt, steamed on through the pretty valley of the Saale, to Weimar, Halle, Magdeburg, Brunswick, and Hanover, where I had the gratification of seeing King Ernest and the Crown Prince, who both looked remarkably well. The whole court came in gala the other evening to the theatre, in honour of the King of Prussia and the Crown Prince of Bavaria, both guests to his Majesty of Hanover. The opera of Ernani was performed on the occasion. The choruses, in particular, showed the excellent training of the conductor, Herr Marschner; the fine band deserves a due share of praise, and the principal singers are very good. A Baron Von Klenzheim gave two evening readings of his poetry, written in the Austrian dialect, that pleased amazingly. He shows in his writings a natural vein of humour, relieved by passages of much sentiment and feeling. Several of his songs have been set to music, and were capitally sung by Madame Nottes, prima donna at the theatre. On my return I shall have the pleasure to present a few of them for your use for the Musical World. Herr Marschner's last opera is called, Der Herzog von Nassau, but I have not yet heard any part of it. A young composer, M. Wallerstein, bids fair to become very popular in Germany, as an inventor of pretty and elegant melodies for polkas and other dance music. In Paris they have been introduced with great success. I had the pleasure of seeing here Thalberg, who was staying at the British Hotel. He travels solus, and is on his way to Vienna. Tamburini also stayed here a night on his way to St. Petersburg, to fulfil his engagement in that city. With the renowned Alex. Von Humboldt I conversed a short time; although past seventy he is still active and occupied in literary labours; his "Cosmos" creates universal attention; no doubt you have heard of his work in England. I hear that a commission is appointed to regulate the acts for international copyright between Hanover and England. I believe that all the states of the "Zoll-Verein" have joined the contract with Great Britain and Prussia. As British composers are daily making progress in the good opinion of their German brethren, it is high time that their labours should be secured to them by law in this country, where so large a field is open to obtain musical reputation and honours. Lady Jersey and Lady Villiers were here on a visit to the King; to gratify them, several of the best pieces from Balfe's Bohemian Girl were frequently executed by the military bands. The cavalry band is of the first class; the leader is Herr Sachse, a splendid performer on the saxe-horn. I am now going to "assist" at the opera of Ernani, commanded in honour of the Duchess of Mecklenburg's presence; I would gladly have preferred "something worth listening to," but—My next may, in all probability, be from Berlin. I have just received the melancholy tidings of the death of Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who expired at Leipzig from the effects of brain fever. This severe loss will be felt by the whole of musical Europe; no where, I am sure, you will say, more than in England, where he obtained the greatest reputation as a composer, and enjoyed the highest regard, as a man.—A. Z.

VIENNA, OCTOBER 27.—Wallace's opera of Maritana will be produced here in about a fortnight, the principal parts will be sustained by Mdle. Meyer (a pupil of Mendelssohn), Mdle. Helreich, Herren Relschsky, and Staudigl. The composer has written a new scena and chorus for the last act, of which report speaks highly. Miss Wallace, the composer's sister, has made a great impression on the Viennoise, and is expressly engaged to sing at a grand concert, on the 15th of November, before the Emperor and the court. She is also engaged to sing at a concert to be given on the 8th of December, by the Brothers Helmesbergers, the violinists; and subsequently at Parish Avars' concert. She is next engaged to lend her vocal aid to a concert about to be given by Madame Schütz Oldose, prima donna to the Court of Austria; and finally purports giving a concert on his own account.

HAVANNA, SEPT. 29, 1847.—The cultivation of music here seems to be on the increase. We have a very good opera during the winter, and many vocal and instrumental concerts; and those distinguished artistes who visit the United States, seldom omit paying us a visit before their return to Europe. There is an on dit afloat that we are to have Rubini next winter, together with the Viennoise children, and other novelties. The planters have been making large crops, and selling them at more than remunerating prices, and can therefore afford to bleed a little for the amusement of their wives and progeny.

A RELIGIOUS FESTIVAL AT BOLOGNA.

THE Philharmonic Society of Bologna published, on the 9th of September last, the following manifesto:—

"On the 16th of September a mass in music will be celebrated at Saint John's Church, to pray to the Lord to preserve for many days to come the health of his Holiness Pope Pius IX., who, after so many acts of magnanimity, has desired to honor the above-named Society with his august protection."

On the day appointed, the fête was celebrated with unprecedented pomp. The church of Saint John was decorated and adorned in the most magnificent style. In the centre aisle they erected a throne of crimson velvet with a cloth of silver spread beneath, and the portrait of the august Pius IX., to whom this fête was consecrated. On all sides were seen portraits of the eminent Cardinal Opizzoni, Archbishop of the city, and the most zealous supporter of the Philharmonic Society. At eleven o'clock His Eminence arrived, attended by the Legate Louis Amat, and found already seated in the church the Marquis Guidotti, Senator and City Magistrate, the members of the Academy of Fine Arts, among whom might be recognised Rossini, and other bodies corporate, mingled in a crowd composed of the most distinguished classes of the society of Bologna.

The mass was chosen from different authors. They performed, with orchestra and full choir, a Kyrie of Thomas Marchesi; a Gloria of Antoine Fabbri, president of the Philharmonic Society; a Graduale of Philippe Vanduzzi; and a Credo of Louis Bartolini. The introduction was composed by Professor Manetti, the Te Deum by the maestro, Joseph Busi, and the Tantum Ergo by the maestro Fabbri.

The solemnity was in every respect worthy of the Sovereign Pontiff, Pius the Ninth, whose revered name is enrolled at the head of the registry of the society. On their departure from the church, the people sung aloud the new hymn, O Sommo Pio!

PROVINCIAL.

KETTERING, NORTHAMPTON.—A very pleasing concert was given here on Tuesday last, by Messrs. Nicholson and Weston, of Leicester, assisted by Miss Waldron and Mr. Wykes, as vocalists, and thirteen of their concert band. The programme included solos for clarinet and cornet, well performed by Messrs. Adcock and Smith; selections from the operas of Lombardi & Maritana; and Lindpainter's song, "The Standard Bearer," sung by Mr. Wykes very effectively. Mr. Nicholson sustained his reputation as a first-rate fautist by his excellent performance of Drouet's introduction and variations to the "Huntsman's Chorus," in which he was enthusiastically encored. A similar honour was awarded to Miss Waldron in the song "O Peaceful Lake." Mr. Nicholson conducted and Mr. Weston most ably led the band, which performed the overtures, &c., with great precision. The concert terminated with "The British Navy" quadrille, which ~~went~~ off with great eclat. The room was well filled, and all departed highly gratified with the evening's entertainment, which was, without doubt, the greatest treat enjoyed for some time past by the good folks of Kettering.—Leicester Journal.

LIVERPOOL, THEATRE ROYAL.—The entertainments at this house lately have not been in the highest walks of the drama, but have well suited the capacities of the company, the taste of the times, and of consequence have served the interest of the manager. The Arabs and the Mexican wonders have aided the attraction of Mrs. Brougham's Jack Shepherd, and Mr. Browne in The Unfinished Gentleman, and have afforded high gratification. On Thursday evening the little Bush People made their debut on these boards, and were saluted with a shower of coppers, the use of which they seemed fully to comprehend. They appeared to be highly delighted with the magnitude of the house, the number of heads which they saw, and the band of music, the drummer in particular receiving a large share of their commendation.—Liverpool Mail.

CLIFTON.—Messrs. H. Phillips and Land gave two concerts at Long's Hotel, Clifton, on Tuesday; the morning performance consisting of sacred music, in the delivery of which Mr. Phillips sustained his justly-acquired eminence; and the evening one, of the songs of Scotland, England, and Ireland. Mr. Phillips sang, "Mine be a cot," (Kraus), and the old English ballad, "Shall I wastynge in despaire," (G. Withers, 1640), with consummate taste. Mr. Land sang several songs with much sweetness. The performances afforded a delightful musical treat.—Felix Farley's Bristol Journal.

HARMONIC SOCIETY, BATH.—The third meeting of the members was held on Friday evening, at the Assembly Rooms. The room was filled to an overflow, and the performance of everything calculated to please. Six encores were demanded. As to the merits of the singing, we can only repeat our previously expressed opinion, that professionals and amateurs did themselves great honour, and their indefatigable conductor great credit. It would be unjust not to mention the beautiful execution of two pieces in particular—the madrigal, by Luca Marenzio, "Lady, see on every side," and "Thou art beautiful, queen of the valley," Dr. Callcott—a vehement burst of applause followed both. We hear that the demand for tickets for the "Ladies' Night" (the next concert) is unusually large; consequently, a full room is expected.—Bath and Cheltenham Gazette.

CHELTEHAM.—Messrs. Hale and Son's Concert took place yesterday morning, at the Assembly Rooms, and was honoured with a fashionable and numerous attendance. The programme was very attractive, as regards both the music and the performers which it specified.—Madame Dulcken, the Misses Smith, John Parry, and Mr. Blagrove, compose an assemblage of diversified talent but seldom surpassed at musical re-unions in the provinces. The style of Madame Dulcken is superb, combining great manual skill with the higher qualities of expression, grace, and inventive brilliancy. She executed "Tarantelle Brillante," "Fantasia on Russian airs," "Notturmo," and "Il Tremolo," an Italian air, in a manner which must have delighted connoisseurs. The Misses Smith are doubtless favourably remembered by our musical readers, owing to the concerts at which they appeared in this town last season. We are quite sure their return will be welcomed by every lover of ballad music; a style in which their voices blend with a penetrating sweetness—a pathetic grace, that for aught we know, resembles the wild and witching strains poured by Ariel on the charmed air of Prospero's magical island. Not the least pleasing of the vocal pieces was, "When daylight fading," a new song composed by Mrs. Francis Herrick, and about to be published by Messrs. Hale and Son. The music of this composition is highly pleasing and harmonises delightfully with the theme. John Parry sang, or rather recited, four of his popular extravaganzas. Of course every body laughed, applauded, and encored, with as much enthusiasm as the conventional restraint of fashionable manners would permit. Mr. Blagrove's performances on the concertina were likewise well received.—Cheltenham Chronicle.

DUNMOW LITERARY INSTITUTION.—LECTURE ON MUSIC WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.—On Monday evening Mr. J. T. Frye, organist of Saffron Walden, gave a very pleasing lecture on music, deducing its history and progress from the earliest ages to the end of the sixteenth century, during which, with the assistance of several very able vocalists, he introduced a series of appropriate illustrations and several amusing anecdotes. The company was highly respectable, including John Marryon Wilson, Esq., and family; the Misses Wade and Woodbridge; Jos. Grice, T. Salt, W. Johnson, Esq., their parties and friends, a large attendance of members, and upwards of eighty visitors. Besides the vocal illustrations, which were supported by Messrs. R. and T. Chappell and Mr. W. Spicer, the lecturer accompanied the singing by a cordolion, kindly lent for the occasion by a member.—Essex Standard.

NEWCASTLE.—MR. JULIAN ADAMS' CONCERT.—Last night Mr. Julian Adams gave a grand concert in the Music Hall of this town, at which, in addition to his own acknowledged talent, the celebrated Collins family attended. The appearance of the latter is considerably altered since their last visit, four years ago. Miss Rossini plays most superbly on the violin. Her "Carnival de Venice" was rendered with all the spirit of master. Mr. Julian Adams, on his patent harmonion, called down a perfect thunder of applause, and, we need hardly say, was loudly encored.—Newcastle Guardian.

LIBO.—The re-engagement of Miss Rainforth, Mr. Travers, and Mr. Stretton brought out at the theatre Weber's grand opera of "Der Freischütz," which kept the stage for three successive nights. "In its day" this was one of the most popular of foreign operas. Besides some of the beautiful songs, which are still well known, the grand incantation scene imparts to it a terrible interest, which Mr. Stretton, in the part of Caspar, rendered with much effect. The last evening was appropriated as a benefit to that gentleman. On Thursday, Mr. Travers took his benefit, in the repetition of Donizetti's opera of "The Love Spell," and last night Miss Rainforth's benefit, in Vincent Wallace's opera of "Maritana," appropriately concluded the engagement of this talented and harmonious trio.—Ibid.

REVIEWS OF MUSIC.

"The Fairy Waltz," for the Pianoforte. Composed by THOMAS TALLIS TRIMNELL.—D'Almaine and Co.

A trifle, but a neat one.

"The Pirate:" a Song. The Poetry by the REV. J. MEYNELL WRE福德, F. S. A. The Music composed by THOMAS TALLIS TRIMNELL.—D'Almaine and Co.

No subject for song has been so much worked to death by the poet as this self-same "Vagabond of the Seas," and no subject has taxed more frequently the pens of composers. Mr. Thomas Tallis Trimnell's music is not outrageously original, but it is characterised by a flow of ideas consonant to the spirit of the words, which the Rev. Mr. Wreford has written like a practical rhymers. Wherefore is the ballad a good one.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the half yearly general meeting of this society held last Monday week, Mr. J. Clinton (flautist) was elected a member.

MR. BENEDICT arrived from Paris on Saturday last. He will proceed, in a few weeks, to Stuttgart, to superintend the rehearsals of his opera, The Crusaders, which will be produced with great splendour at the Royal Theatre, about the middle of December.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—It is reported that Mr. James Wallick, the eminent actor, whose return from America we lately announced, has become lessee of the Olympic theatre.

MR. GEORGE FABRICIUS, a German violinist and musical composer, committed suicide a few days since in Brussels.

MR. THOMAS PRYNN, a bass singer, well known at the minor theatres in the metropolis, died on Monday last in the Clerkenwell workhouse.

MONSIEUR HECTOR BERLIOZ, musical director at Drury Lane Theatre, arrived in London on Saturday.

DRURY LANE.—The rehearsals have already commenced for the operatic campaign. The chorus are busy with the Lucia, and a general rehearsal will take place as soon as Madame Dorus Gras has arrived.

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Active steps are about to be immediately taken to promote the success of the meeting to be held in 1848. A public meeting is called for on Monday next, at which the Lord Bishop will preside, and a large attendance of the clergy and gentry of the county and city is expected.

MADAME DORUS GRAS is expected in London daily. Mme. Jullien has provided a residence for the accomplished cantatrice in the Regent's Park.

MR. REEVES.—We have heard this accomplished artiste at rehearsal on the Drury Lane stage, in the Lucia, and have not the least doubt, but that he will prove the greatest tenor we have had in this country, since the best days of Braham. The vocalisation of Mr. Reeves is formed entirely in the Italian school, and combines the natural, and rare advantages of sweetness and power. He will appear, on the opening night in Edgardo, in the Lucia, the part which has taxed the highest efforts of a Rubini, a Duprez, a Salvi, and a Mario.

MONUMENT TO MALIBRAN.—A statue of Malibran is about to be erected in the grand entrance hall of the Scala, at Milan. Pompée Marchese, well known as one of the first sculptors in Italy, is entrusted with the execution of the work.

SOME WORDS ABOUT MUSIC AND THE MODERN OPERA.—To claim the truest and most just view of the end of music and all other arts is one of the greatest blessings we can pray for and strive for. The love of the beautiful is, alas! unconnected in many minds with the longing for the divine. Yet we may feel assured that the longing for the divine and its final attainment in a future world will be accompanied with the beautiful that we seek now in the half light of a faint belief. "Music," says Beethoven, "is a higher revelation than all their wisdom and philosophy." This is one of those attractive half-truths that are more dangerous than downright lies. It is undeniably evident that the love of the beautiful, the poetical, and passionate worship of the corrupt human heart has been from the earliest ages the stumbling-blocks of an idolatrous nature. Well and truly has Milton said—

"Songs, garlands, flowers,
And charming symphonies attached the heart
Of Adam, soon inclined to admit delight,
The bent of nature."

But it was the fallen Adam, not the unstained original; and grand is the answer put into the mouth of the archangel at his side:—

"Judge not what is best
By pleasure, though to nature seeming meet,
Created as thou art to noble end,
Holy and pure conformity divine."

Anxious indeed is the charge laid on those who have the care and the training of one gifted with the musical and poetical temperament. "The starry crown of genius" is paid for too dearly in the sensitive, morbid, and exaggerated views of life and ideal miseries that so frequently accompany the possession. It has been said by one of the great men of our day, that "Poets shed no bitterer tears than ordinary men." He might have added, "should not," for, if not bitterer, they are at least much more frequent. The brightest days produce the heaviest dew. They who dream the most sweetly will weep the more bitterly when they awake. The poetical temperament is in most cases a distressing and complicated mystery, frequently coupled with an imaginative selfishness that sends its wretched possessor to and fro without finding all the false lights that are most seductive and destructive. It is from this wretched band that proceed the exaggerated, distorted, hideous fictions that disgrace our day under the name of French novels. It is this school of mystics that sends forth the music of angels, devils, hell, and heaven, and calls the spasmodic and profitless struggles a sublime apostleship.—Fraser's Magazine.

DEATH OF GEORGE WIELAND.—This well-known pantomimist died on Saturday last of consumption, a disease under which he had been labouring for two years. Mr. Wieland had been on the stage since he was five years of age. His first appearance, on the occasion of the benefit of Leclercq, at Sadler's Wells. He was a member of the Acting Committee of the Drury Lane Theatrical Fund. His kindness and charity will be regretted by the members of the profession, as his best endeavours were at all times used for the benefit of his less fortunate brothers. Mr. Wieland was a real artiste in his peculiar vocation. His performance of Diavolo in Macfarren's popular opera, The Devil's Opera, was extraordinary for its feats of agility and grotesqueness.

MUSICA DI CAMERA.—A musical publication under this title will shortly be given to the world, from the pen of W. R. Bexfield, M.B., of Oxford. The compositions will comprise songs for bass, and treble voices, a round for three trebles, a solo and quartet, a GROUND for the piano-forte, a waltz, a fragment, and a morceau for piano and violin, to be called The Kitten's Scherzo. There will be a variety at least in the little volume.

THE BATH HARMONIC SOCIETY commenced its meetings on Friday the 8th of October, under favourable prospects. Several excellent voices (amateurs) have joined the society. The Marquis of Thomond is President: Lord Ashley, Viscount Dunan, &c., &c., Vice Presidents. The first public concert will shortly take place. The meetings are held at the Assembly Rooms.

MADemoiselle FALCON, the celebrated French cantatrice, (so says Le Revue et Gazette Musicale) is engaged at the Opera Italien, and will debut in the Così fan tutte of Mozart, or in the Bravo of Mercadante. Ronconi will sing, in the last work, the rôle written for a low tenor.

GUASCO, the celebrated tenor, and Madams Frezzolini, are engaged at the Imperial theatre, St. Petersburg, and will debut in Verdi's Attila. Tamburini and Salvi have arrived at the capital of the Czars. The celebrated barytone is, perhaps, the greatest favourite of a vocalist that ever sung in St. Petersburg, not even excepting Rubini. The imperial city is delighted at the announcement of the promised advent of Grisi and Mario. A splendid season is expected.

MR. BEALE, with his usual liberality, has granted the use of Covent Garden, for the dramatic performance about to take place towards the fund for the purchase of Shakspeare's house. The performance will include the names of all the greatest living actors and actresses; and it is even whispered, that so great an occasion will draw from retirement, Young and Charles Kemble. Particulars will be duly announced.

THE GREATEST SINGER IN THE WORLD.—La Tadolini, the celebrated Italian soprano, is engaged by Mr. Lumley to play all the high tragedy parts, Jenny Lind's incompetence being most judiciously recognised. She is, or rather has been, a very splendid dramatic artiste; but she is now upwards of fifty years of age, and her vocal powers, which were never of the highest order, have almost deserted her. In one respect, she may with the most perfect truth be called the greatest singer in the world. She is nearly as large as Grisi and Alboni together, so you may have some idea of her size. She is, notwithstanding, a very fine dramatic singer, or rather, artiste, and was, some twenty years ago, in high repute in certain parts of Italy. But Pasta then usurped almost all continental fame, and Tadolini was forgotten. She has never been either in London or Paris, and I suspect, if she appears in either of these places, she will have, with her broken powers, but little chance of success.—(Extract of a letter from a Correspondent at Milan.)

A GREAT UNKNOWN.—Some curiosity has been excited in musical circles (Paris), by the report of the approaching visit of a new singer from Russia. She is said to have a most extraordinary compass of voice, comprising the most tender and agile soprano with the lowest barytone. No one has hitherto been able to discover who she is, or what the country which has given her birth. She has sung at the Court of Naples, and before the Emperor of Russia; in both cases, however, stipulating to preserve her features concealed by a mask. It is thus she persists in appearing before the public. By some, she is believed to be a noble Russian lady who had been, for years confined in durance vile by her husband, who has married again; by others, that she is an Italian nun, escaped from a religious life to get a peep at this wicked world. Others have declared again, that, although her arms and bosom are of the most snowy whiteness, her face and head are those of a negress of Senegambia, which belief is confirmed by her persistence in wearing the domino hood, which conceals even the very form of her head and throat from observation. In England she will immediately be suspected of being the no other than the pig-faced lady. She persists in signing no other name to her engagements than that of La Mascherata, by which she is already famous in many parts of Italy.—Atlas.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TRUTH AND JUSTICE.—If our Correspondent refers to the columns of The Musical World, he will find we have said nothing whatever of the young lady to whom he alludes. A Dublin paper furnished us with the article in which her name is mentioned. We, nevertheless, thank our correspondent for calling our attention to the supposed error. We are always open to conviction. We shall not fail to bear in mind for future criticism the information of our correspondent.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator: "Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire-sq., Bishopsgate-st., 19th July, 1847. "Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's 'Aromatic Regenerator,' feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases."

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

(No. 10.)

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ.,

Wednesday, Nov. 24.—MY DEAR RYAN,—I am pleased to observe that Paris, although far behind London in appreciation of the genius of Mendelssohn as in personal knowledge of the man, is not quite indifferent to the blow which his death has inflicted upon art, nor wanting in respect for his memory. Among the musicians here (the pianists especially) there are several whom the intelligence has deeply affected. Out of this small but estimable band the names of Stephen Heller,* Charles Hallé, Rosenbain, and Panofka, occur to me. You will say that these are not Parisians, but of pure Teutonic extraction; nevertheless they have lived long enough in Paris to imbibe the frivolity of Parisian taste, and that disregard for the higher manifestations of art which is the peculiar attribute of French musicians; but, true to their German principles, they have remained in the cauldron unscathed, and are as sincerely and substantially artists as though they had never migrated from the soil of their nativity.

Among these gentlemen—I believe the idea originated with Panofka—it has been proposed to get up a demonstration, signed by the chief musicians resident in Paris, conveying to the widow of Dr. Mendelssohn expressions of regret for his loss, of admiration for his genius, and of condolence with her affliction. M. Habeneck, the well-known chef d'orchestre of the Conservatoire (whose post at the Opera, lately resigned, is now filled by M. Girard, predecessor of M. Labarre at the Opera Comique) having been applied to for his aid and concurrence, has promised both, and there is every prospect that the matter will be accomplished in a style befitting the occasion. This proceeding ought to be adopted by the musicians of London, who knew Mendelssohn so intimately, revered his genius so highly, and loved the man with such unanimous affection. Talk of it to Sterndale Bennett, Sir George Smart, Benedict, Costa, Lindsay Sloper, Anderson, Lucas, Charles Horsley, Dorrell, Jewson, &c. &c. They all were often and intimately associated with Mendelssohn, and I think will welcome the proposition; at all events do not let it drop for want of consideration—it merits a better fate.

By the way, I have another notion that may be worth a thought:—as there is to be some kind of monument to the memory of the illustrious composer, what think you of Hanover Square for the site? This was the arena of his first and most frequent triumphs in England; and there could hardly be a more appropriate tribute than a memento of them on the very spot—as near as possible to the Concert Rooms?

* This accomplished musician has just returned to Paris after an absence of nearly three months.

A STATUE OF MENDELSSOHN in Hanover Square! It would be a triumph for the art! We have statues of warriors, of sailors, of statesmen, of kings; but we have no statue of what is above them all—a great artist. If every amateur and every musician were to subscribe a trifling sum, the thing might be easily accomplished. It would advance music a whole century. An honorable testimony of England's appreciation of a mighty genius, it would be also a magnificent means of stimulating endeavour; by elevating the musician in his self-esteem, and inciting him to do his best, so that, if God were willing, he might ultimately be found worthy—if not of the same high distinction, at least, of his country's gratitude. Musicians! put your shoulders to the wheel; here is an opportunity of proclaiming your value, and maintaining the dignity of your beloved art, without the assistance of parliament or the necessity of petitions. There is nothing whatever hyperbolic in the suggestion. No one who truly understands and loves music will jeer at me for saying that Shakspeare has (or had!) his statue in Covent Garden Theatre and why should not Mendelssohn have his statue in Hanover Square? The author of Elijah is worthy of any honors that a grateful nation can pay—and Elijah was written for England, and first performed in England. Meanwhile this will not prevent Birmingham, which has had so much to do with Mendelssohn's fame, and Exeter Hall, which has had scarcely less, from exhibiting their own enthusiasm for his memory in any way they may consider becoming; the more and the loftier the honors paid to such a man the greater the credit to the country that pays them. I shall return to this matter, and rely upon your sympathy and your aid in furthering the probability and the practicability of its consummation. Not that I have the least fear of our musicians being backward in such a cause, or that there will be any necessity for an English Liszt, to come forward with the whole of his earnings, and make up the amount required; but unless the question be agitated it will be likely to die for want of nourishment. Therefore, agitate, and you will be rendering a service to that noble art of which you are so eloquent an advocate, and whose followers, unhappily, are so lowly placed in the scale of that civilization which their efforts, nevertheless, tend so much to promote. The important question of who shall make the statue may be discussed when we have raised the money.

To give you a notion of how far the French musicians are behind our own in knowledge and appreciation of the highest forms of art—I was speaking to —, the composer of twelve or thirteen operas, an artist by no means without serious merit and solid acquirement; the theme was the art and its professors; the name of Mendelssohn escaped my lips:—"Ah, by the way," said —, "is that Mendelssohn, who died, Mendelssohn the pianoforte-player?" Somewhat astonished

"THE increased attention now bestowed upon the violoncello, and the proficiency attained by many of our amateurs on this noble and beautiful instrument, are among the many proofs that the musical art is in a progressive state in this country. Lord Gerald Fitzgerald's Notturmo is a composition which would do no discredit to any professional artist. It consists of a single movement—an andante—and is calculated, from its moderate dimensions, as well as the grace and elegance of its style, to add to the pleasure of a social musical evening. It is exceedingly melodious, with much tenderness of expression; and though it does not tax very heavily the executive power of the performer, it demands a smooth and vocal tone, refinement, and feeling. Though the violoncello has the principal part, yet the piece is partly concertante; and the piano-forte is rich in harmony and very effective."—MUSICAL WORLD.

LETTERS FROM PARIS.

TO DESMOND RYAN, ESQ,

Wednesday, Dec. 1.—MY DEAR RYAN,—In my apostrophe to the sentiment and good taste of the French musicians, I reckoned, it appears, without my host. The address to Dr. Mendelssohn's widow proceeds solely from the German musicians resident in Paris; the "natives" have nothing to do with it. Still, to the credit of M. Habenach, be it recorded, that, in accordance with his desire, the first concert of the Conservatoire will consist wholly of the works of MENDELSSOHN. A better compliment could hardly be paid to the memory of the illustrious dead, and there can be little doubt that your London Philharmonic will emulate so good an example. Meanwhile the following is an English version of the memorial addressed to Madame. Mendelssohn by the German musicians, for a French translation of which I am indebted to M. Panofka:—

To the Widow of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

"The death of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy is an irreparable loss to the musical art, of which he was the most worthy representative; for its younger followers, of whom he was the safest guide; for Germany, of which he was one of the most illustrious children; and for humanity itself, which he honored, by his worth as by his genius. All his actions, in private life as in artistic endeavour, were stamped with a rare purity, a lofty aim, worthy of his admirable genius, worthy of the sublime models which he found in his beloved country generally, and in his own family in particular. As his youth was nourished in a pious veneration for the sanctity of art, so all his life was consecrated to the worship of that which to him was most dear, and all his efforts, all his creations were dedicated to its glory.

"It is for this that the tears which fall upon his tomb are not only the tears of a family in desolation, of friends in despair! His memory lives and will live in all hearts that beat, with holy rapture, for the beautiful, the noble, and the true.

"It is for this that the cry of mourning for his loss, so immense, so irretrievable, is uttered with as much anguish, with as much sincerity, from the Thames to the Danube, from the Seine to the Volga, in every part of civilized Europe, as in the little town of Leipzig which he so often and so long honored and made happy by his immediate presence.

"May it, then, be permitted to us, German artists, far from our own country, to offer to the much-beloved master the last acknowledgments of our gratitude and our grief, and to place respectfully in your hands, Madame, the expression of our sentiments for the illustrious defunct.

Paris, 28th Nov. 1847.

In the name of the German musicians resident in Paris:—

J. ROSENHAIN.
G. KALKBRENNER.
H. PANOFKA.
S. HELLER.
C. HALLE.
F. P. PIXIS.
E. WOLFF.

The above are the worthy representatives of the German musicians in Paris. The number of signatures was proposed to have been eight but you will perceive there are here but seven. This was the result of an error. A Polish piano-forte player, M. Frederic Chopin, who has, I believe, composed some rondos and dance-tunes (mazurkas) for the instrument, was applied to, by mistake, I presume, on the part of the German musicians, for his signature. M. Chopin, however, declined to give it. The following was his reply:—

"La lettre venant des Allemands, comment voulez vous, que je m'arroge le droit de la signer?"

"[The letter coming from the Germans, how can I arrogate to myself the right of signing it?]"

It is true that the signature of M. Chopin, affixed to a manifesto from the German musicians, might strictly have been considered an arrogation of a right not invested in his specialty; yet the Germans are very clever in composing waltzes, and here would have been a sympathy of talent if not of blood between M. Chopin and the representatives of Germany; but then, on the other hand, Mendelssohn never wrote either waltzes or mazurkas, which, doubtless, acted as a stimulus to M. Chopin in refusing to affix his signature—for he might reasonably say to the departed musician:—"Si moi, je suis musicien, qu'est ce que tu es, toi?" The resolution of the question would be as difficult as Euclid's most abstruse problem—its consideration as perplexing as the pons asinorum. Solomon said, "Even this also is vanity!"

However, the want of M. Chopin's signature has not yet decided the German musicians upon withdrawing the memorial to Madame Mendelssohn. I question, indeed, whether the question of withdrawal will be raised. What a pity that Musard is not a German: he would consent to affix his signature without difficulty; for, in his way, he is an artist. There is M. Alkan too, a German pianist—why was he not applied to?

* * * * *

I have seen Meyerbeer on several occasions, and by what I can gather from him I am led to conclude that there is little hope of his coming to any arrangement with the directors of the Opera. Of the Prophète or the Africaine, I believe, no one entertained the slightest notion, the present means of the Academie rendering the possibility of producing works of such great musical importance quite out of the question. But there certainly was an idea of the Camp of Silesia, which, although it enjoys a brilliant reputation at Berlin and Vienna, and has long been engraved, Meyerbeer will not allow to be published until it has been brought out in Paris. I need hardly say that this is a serious loss to the music-publisher, who has purchased the copyright for Germany; since while he might have sold thousands of copies of the vocal pieces (rendered doubly attractive by the union of the names of Meyerbeer and Jenny Lind), he has only engrossed the unanimous interest of the house. Grisi came on—the magnificent Grisi—and was received with a burst of applause; but it was not Grisi that monopolized the eager curiosity of the crowd, and albeit many connoisseurs could not help remarking how finely Grisi was singing, how gorgeous and handsome Grisi was looking, and how superbly Grisi was acting, it took some time to captivate the attention of the major part of the spectators. At length a sudden and unbroken silence wrapped the entire assembly in its unseen embrace, and indicated that the all-desired moment was at hand; the band played the long symphony which precedes the contralto air, “Eccomi al fin in Babilonia,” and, with a tranquil step and modest look, Alboni issued from the coulisses, and slowly walked up to the footlights. There was a sudden pause; a feather might have been heard to move; the orchestra, the symphony finished, refrained from proceeding, as though to give time for the enthusiastic reception which was Alboni’s right, and which it was natural to suppose Alboni would receive. But you may imagine my surprise, and the feelings of the renowned contralto, when not a hand or a voice was raised to acknowledge her, the dead silence continuing, as in mockery! I could see Alboni tremble—but it was only for an instant. What was the reason of this unanimous disdain, or this unanimous doubt?—call it which you will. She might perhaps guess, but she did not suffer it to perplex her for more than the time during which you might, in moderately quick time, count twenty. Throwing aside the extreme diffidence that marked her entrée, and the perturbation that resulted from the frigidity of the spectators, she wound herself up to the condition of fearless independence for which she is constitutionally and morally remarkable, and with a look of superb indifference and conscious power, she commenced the opening of her air. In one minute, the crowd, that but an instant before disdained her, was at her feet! The effect of those luscious tones had never yet failed to touch the heart and rouse the ardour of an audience, educated or uneducated. Nature herself made Alboni’s mouth her trumpet, and when Nature speaks, who can listen and not be moved? Not the audience of the Italiens, Parisians, though they be—not they, as was evidenced by the tumult of approbation that succeeded the dumbness of disdain, with the interval of some dozen notes of recitative, that gushed from Alboni’s lips like water from a natural spring, and filled the atmosphere with sweet sound, which, as the fragrance of young flowers, made the pulse beat, the sense quake, and the heart open as a rose that swallows up the dew of heaven. Alboni’s triumph was instantaneous and complete; it was the greater from the moment of anxious uncertainty that prefaced it and made the certainty which succeeded more welcome and delightful. It was as the sudden conversion of a whole populace by some saint whose words are as a miracle! I own that the burst of applause was to my ears as the sweetest music, to my heart as a draught of fresh water to the thirsty Arab of the desert. I felt for Alboni, knowing the particulars of her case, and was enchanted to find all my surmises of opposition to her success vanish away like smoke in the blue sky, as it were by the influence of her very breath. From this instant to the end of the opera, Alboni’s success grew and grew in magnitude, until it expanded into the veritable triumph of a conqueror. During the first act she was twice re-called; during the second act, thrice; she was engored in the air, “In si barbara,” which she delivered with angelic pathos, and in the cabaletta of the second duet with Semiramide. But, I shall not tire you with details that are unnecessary, and which, moreover, you will find at length in the feuilletons of the Debats, &c.* Suffice it that Alboni’s best friend—nay, that Alboni herself, could not have wished for Alboni a more entire, more dazzling, or more legitimate success.

In respect to Grisi, what can I say that shall convey to you my admiration of her immense talent, never more brilliantly exhibited than on this occasion. It is not to say, she was as young as she was twelve years ago, for she is always young, and has many many years of youth before her; it is not to say, she reminded us of Grisi in the meridian of Grisi’s powers, for Grisi is but now in the meridian of her talent, as of her beauty and her womanhood; the only way in which I can hope to make myself understood is by simply stating that Grisi’s Semiramide, on the night of Alboni’s debut, was one of the most wonderful exhibitions of dramatic and vocal excellence I ever witnessed in my life. I never can forget her queenly dignity, her flashing eye, her passionate mouth, her majestic gestures; it was a picture worthy the pencil of a Buanorotti.

The excitement of the audience was intense and unremitting, while Grisi and Alboni were on the stage; during the duets the interest amounted almost to a frenzy; it was as though two gladiators were engaged in a struggle for existence, a Roman crowd looking on, applauding each display of skill or cunning, encouraging and exhilarating the combatants by their cheers. When the two queens had left the scene, not a note of the music could be heard; the audience to a man, were busy, extolling and discerning the merits of the rival mistresses of song; but as one or both of them appeared again, the hum of two thousand voices was gradually hushed into a sigh, which soon died away in the embrace of silence—and then every eye was fixed upon the stage, and every ear drank in the sounds with greedy avidity. Were I to live a hundred years the memory of this evening would be as strong and clear as now; and yet, as you know, with the exception of a few passages, Semiramide is not an opera that greatly moves or pleases me; more is the honor to Grisi and Alboni, that I, as the whole crowd, could be so greatly moved and pleased. Coletti was energetic and pains-taking in the part of Assur, and sang the duet with Arsace (Alboni), and the scena in the second act very cleverly; but his acting was conventional and stiff, and there is something in his voice, which in spite of its power and volume, I cannot like. I am aware that M. Delecluze† of the Debats is not of my opinion—but I adhere to it notwithstanding. A tenor, Cellini, moved the risible organs of the audience to manifestations of ungentle hilarity, and the costumes and mise-en-scene were justly condemned, as shabby, and for the most part inappropriate. I must mention with praise, however, that useful and zealous artist, Tagliafico, who, in the second bass part, was everything that the most punctilious connoisseur could have desired. The band was in better force than usual, and the chorus a little more steady and somewhat less frequently at fault in respect of time and intonation; M. Tilmant (formerly the second to Habeneck at the Conservatoire and the Academie Royale de Musique) is an excellent conductor, and saved the choral and instrumental band from committing a world of blunders, that without him, or a chef of equal talent and experience, would have been inevitable, in such an army of musical Huns and

* We have received some of them, and have rendered them into English, for the edification of our readers.—D. R.

† M. Delecluze has supplied the feuilletons on the Theatre des Italiens in the Journal des Debats, for the last twenty-five years, I am told; he also, occasionally holds forth upon pictures, and is a conscientious, sensible, and cautious, though neither a brilliant nor a forcible writer.

Visigoths; but he cannot get a good tone out of an indifferent band, any more than he can make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. I beg pardon—but I think I have used this simile on some previous occasion, in speaking of some other operatic band nearer home; but I can not recal the occasion, or the apropos de quoi; perhaps you can jog my memory?*

Among the audience were scions of loyalty, ministers of state, poets, philosophers, and others eminent in letters, painters, sculptors, musicians, &c. &c.—all the beauty, all the rank, all the fashion, all the wit and talent and learning and genius that at this precise period of the year could conveniently be brought together, at the beck of some unusual attraction, within the walls of the Theatre des Italiens, one of the handsomest, most commodious, best built, architecturally admirable, and ill-cleansed theatres in the whole metropolis. M. Vatel thinks no more seriously of polishing and renovating this magnificent temple, than of polishing and renovating one of the pig-sties at his country-house on the road to Rouen, he forgets that the Salle de Ventadour is (in poetic diction) an aviary, not a pig-house, and therefore requires cleansing now and then.

The result of Alboni's success has been that no places can be had for many performances to come, and that the prices asked and given have been absurd, and quite unfair to the public. However, as M. Vatel receives no subvention, now, from government, he may be considered at liberty to do as he pleases, and make hay while the sun shines—and it has been chary of its beams of late in his behalf. To this argument I cannot well lay siege, but I may remind M. Vatel that as he treats the public when the public is at his feet, so may the public retort upon him when the position is reversed. He has Alboni with him now, and the public will go and hear Alboni, even though they pay through the nose for it; but when M. Vatel has Alboni no more—and judging from his peculiar method of directing a theatre, such a diminution of his attractions is neither impossible nor improbable—the public might take a pique and abandon him altogether; nor could the retort upon him be justly blamed—nothing would be more natural under the circumstances. But with the Academie Royale de Musique the case presents a flagrant injustice that cannot be defended. MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan receive from government a subvention of 650,000 francs—an enormous sum—the object of which subvention is that the institution may be open all the year round, the prices of admission remain unchanged, and the public have access, at moderate terms, to the enjoyment of an elegant and civilising relaxation. But the instant of any great novelty is the signal for the prices being raised to so unreasonable an extent that persons of middling circumstances (the mass of the people) cannot afford to pay them, and the rich and the privileged can alone enjoy the advantage. As examples of this indefensible imposition, of which I have myself been a suffering witness, I may cite the first night since the change of management,† the recent appearance of Alboni at four concerts, the debuts of Cerito, and the first night of Verdi's Jerusalem—on which occasions unexampled prices were demanded, and the intentions of Government, in granting the subvention, illegally frustrated and disregarded. This question, I am told, will be shortly mooted in the Chamber, and the subvention be withheld, or the conditions involved in its accordance maintained in their integrity—which is nothing more than should be.

I have not much news to tell you. The representations of Jerusalem have been happily suspended, for awhile, owing to the unhappy indisposition of Duprez, who has been writhing in the clutches of the pitiless grippe, which, at the present time spares nor man, nor woman, nor child, with rare exceptions. Bettini has understudied Duprez' part, and has already rehearsed it; but it is anticipated that Duprez will not resign it for the present. I should recommend the great little tenor to give it up at once as a bad job, or it will assuredly destroy all the voice that he has left in him; the music of young Verdi is as fatal to the lungs as the east wind, and much use of it is an invariable provocation to phthisis. Poor Duprez! I cannot but admire his gallantry in thus obstinately making head against so dire an enemy.

On Friday, Carlotta Grisi, crowned with Belgian laurels, fragrant with Belgian flowers, blushing with Belgian honors—for her month in Brussels has been a veritable feast of triumphs—once more delighted the eyes and the hearts of her numberless admirers in Paris. The Academie is Carlotta's palace, where, Queen of Choregraphy, she receives the homage of her subjects, and disburses her smiles and her favors; she is there at home and in her element; the boards upon which she moves seem to court the pressure of her feet, as of some old familiar thing, that long custom has made loveable; she is the very spirit of the place, and charmed, as it were, with the privilege of being there, she pounds and dances in the exultation of delight. Nothing better than Le Diable à Quatre could have been chosen for her rentrée, for there we find Carlotta no less a comedian than a dancer; her comedy, genuine and hearty as her dancing is graceful and natural, and the perfection of art apparent in one as the other. Her reception was enthusiastic and her performance exquisitely beautiful; the spectators were enchanted, and Carlotta, enchanted to enchant, displayed the wonders of her art in a hundred new lights, accomplishing feats never before attempted, and which, if attempted by any other dancer than herself, would no longer be the same thing. In short, I never remember Carlotta Grisi more admirable, or admired her with more sincerity; nor do I recollect, on any previous occasion, a more thorough appreciation of her inimitable talent, or more warm and unanimous demonstrations of satisfaction on the part of any audience in presence of which I have had the pleasure to render homage to her excellence. And, as though in honor of her return, the principal dancers, the coryphées, the supernumeraries even to the rats, and the orchestral performers, with M. Girard at their head, exhibited more than their ordinary zeal, and realised an ensemble of more than ordinary perfection. It is worthy of noting, that, on her appearance, the orchestral performers laid down their instruments and applauded her as though they had formed a portion of the claque—a compliment they repeated at the end of her several pas; from which it may be deduced that Carlotta Grisi has the art of making herself esteemed and liked behind the curtain, as she has that of winning admiration and applause before it.

The ballet was preceded by the eternal Lucie de Lammermoor, in which I was pleased to observe the great progress made by Bettini, and was delighted by the fluency and elegance of Mdlle. Nau's vocalisation.

* * * * *

I have been reproached by some persons for the bitterness which dictated my observations, last week, apropos of M. Chopin and the late Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Th reproach is unjust; no bitterness gave birth to those remarks,

* We could if we would, but we will not: at this juncture be out of place, and therefore unpolite.—D. R.

† The first night of MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan's management, since the abdication of M. Léon Pillet and the relache devoted to the renovation of the theatre.

but respect to the departed master, in whose single person was the concentrated essence of all music, and whose death is as though from now to a century forward were to be a blank in the progress of the art. The musician who fails in respect where respect is so manifestly due—nay, I will go further, the musician who does not merely respect, but revere, worship, idolize the name of Mendelssohn, I do not, I cannot consider a worthy follower of his art, and therefore, owing him no respect, I pay him none. Understand well, that I only speak of M. Chopin, the musician; of M. Chopin, the man, I know nothing, not enjoying the advantage of his acquaintance. If not to admire the music of M. Chopin be proof of a bitter spirit, let me be for ever called “bitter;” I like it not, nor can I like it—it sins against all my notions of the proprieties of art, and presents no ideal attraction to my fancy. If to think that M. Chopin forgets himself in not readily paying homage to Mendelssohn—who in comparison to the Polish pianist is as the sun to a spark flickering in a tinder box—and entitles me to the charge of bitterness, once more I am content to be styled “bitter,” and strong in faith, exult in my bitterness. But, gravely, the accusation is absurd; what I said was not bitter, but sweet to all rightly constituted minds;—in confirmation whereof I appeal to MM. Rosenhain, Hallé, Heller, Panofka, Kalkbrenner (Kalkbrenner was not too arrogant to give his name), Pixis, Wolff, and the German musicians in Paris whom they have the honor to represent on so worthy and melancholy an occasion.

I find, on looking over the copies of my letters with which you have been good enough to favor me, several promises, as yet unfulfilled. I owe you, it appears, full details about M. Etienne Arago's comedy, Les Aristocraties; about Mad. de Girardin's tragedy, Cleopatra; about M. Alfred de Musset's “proverb,” Un Caprice; and other matters connected with the Theatre Francais. Be it so—I owe you them—and when I have paid you, I shall owe you nothing; but when is to be that “when,” I cannot say at present; but I recommend you to get, and to read when you have gotten, the feuilletons of the famous J. J. (Jules Janin, in familiar parlance), which, meritorious as are the comedy, tragedy, and “proverb,” are better, and more readable, and more witty, and more poetic, and more instructive, and more amusingly philosophical than the comedy, tragedy, and “proverb” fastened together—tria juncta in uno—and yet I have no wish to under-estimate the comedy, tragedy, and “proverb,” of M. Arago, Mad. de Girardin, and M. de Musset, but merely to rate the feuilletons of J. J. as they ought to be rated, i. e., much higher than them all. Where M. de Musset says one good thing, J. J. says six; where Mad. de Girardin says one good thing, J. J. says sixty; and where M. Arago says one good thing, J. J. says six hundred—and all as well placed and apposite, when they are not better placed and more apposite; if this be not six, sixty, and six hundred times as good, then am I no master of multiplication, and J. J. not a man of genius—q. e., absurdum—wherefore my argument holds “refutation-tight,” as poor Shelley was wont to say.

Also I must give you an apology in the place of anything more about M. Maillart's Gastibelza, which being a dull work I did not go to hear twice, and so have forgotten; eke must you take an excuse instead of a review of Mount Sinai, which is a duller, and, though I never promised, I intended to have analysed for your edification. Moreover, about the hotel where lived and wrote Mozart, while in Paris, Les Quatre fils Aymon, which I have visited; about the Morgue which I have seen; about the *Theatre Comié (which is to be no more a theatre but a show, by order of the Home Authorities), the last work of M. Rosellen—neither of which I have seen or sought to see—and other curious and interesting matters, you must not trouble yourself at all; having nothing to tell, I shall tell you as much and no more.

When you receive this I shall be far hence, in quite another part of the musical world; at what time, if ever, you hear from me again, and where, if anywhere, I am unable now to say. Perhaps it may be from the North. I have only to solicit your forgiveness for having left untold more than ninety-nine hundredths of what I saw and heard in this fair city of Paris, which I quit with keen regret, trusting that Paris will mourn my absence in return. Meanwhile Panofka will occasionally let you have some news; but in case he should fail to do so let me recommend you to M. Le Brun jeune, (or, M. Le Jeune brun, I forget which,) who, at a supper—given at the Café near the Opera National, on the Boulevard du Temple, by the instigators, movers, makers, and managers of the Opera National—worthily represented the ENGLISH PRESS, and responding to a toast prepared in compliment to that august body, declared, in a neat speech, that he had come to Paris expressly to furnish the papers of his country with a history of the Opera National's proceedings; whereupon there ensued much cheering—a cheering I would gladly echo but that I never heard of M. Le Brun Jeune, (or, M. Le Jeune brun) before. If you want news, however, and Panofka neglects to supply you, apply to M. Le Brun Jeune, and I wish you may get it. Good bye, until our next epistolary shake-hand, which I trust may not be on the other side of eternity,—till when, notwithstanding, I am yours. D.

P.S. The account of M. Le Jeune brun's speech, and the supper, appeared in the Corsaire, a daily journal, enriched by the witty contributions of M. Fiorentino.

As the appearance of the Architect, by his pure personality, elevated above the contradictions of the heart, produces a beautiful still life, in which the precipice on which the principal figures were standing is, for a moment, withdrawn from our view, so does the appearance of Luciana, with all her swarm awoken in us the view of an activity directed only to the froth of life, which also lifts us above the breach in family existence, though not all in the manner in which this is done by the Architect. By Luciana's appearance everything is drawn into the whirlpool of life. The contrast of this violent movement, of this ceaseless change of enjoyments and gratifications of momentary whims, with the mind of Ottilia, which, naturally enough, is thus painfully affected, and forced back into itself, is the more striking, the less directly it is expressed by the poet, who has only shown it in its effects.

As the presence of the Architect awakened Ottilia to reflections, in which we often follow the thread of the conversation with that sensible man, and which we recognize as having proceeded directly from a mental contact with him, so, also, does Luciana's presence becoming the cause for noting down thoughts in the diary. These have arisen exactly from the necessity of collecting the mind, which has been destroyed by the confusion created by Luciana, and therefore have for their root a tendency to return from the immeasure-ability of worldly pursuits into the supersensual region of thought, and thus to acquire a substance and a counterpoise to the billows of the day. In the single expressions the negative relation is to be perceived definitely enough. During the residence of Luciana at the castle, the Architect is Ottilia's only consolation, and as he had already, for a short time, freed her from her pain by his artistical activity, so now, by his tender attachment and attention to Ottilia, does he heal the painful sensation to which her heart is hourly exposed by a contact with Luciana. As for the peculiarity of Luciana's character and inclinations, we have only to refer to the complete description in the second chapter.

Little as Ottilia comes into the foreground, during Luciana's residence at the castle, still she vividly arrests our attention. We again discern the great beauty and art of the poet in this fact, that even amid the boisterous vivacity of Luciana's pursuits, he always unobservedly brings our glance back to Ottilia, who, in connection with the Architect, seems like the mystical background of the various groups, which are commingled before our eyes; and, as man always, from a lawless confused movement longs, for a point of rest, so do we, during the pursuits of Luciana, always return joyously to Ottilia, who again conducts us to clearness, and at the sight of whom we again collect our scattered senses.

The Architect, who lived for Ottilia, took leave of the house in which he had passed such happy hours, by the tableau, in which Ottilia, raised to a queen of heaven by her beauty and soulful expression, was to shine in this form, and spread her beams on all around. The description of this living picture and of this festal moment, has a special charm in the development, beyond the manner in which it is set forth by the poet. At the sight of Ottilia as the Madonna, the thought of a contradiction between her appearance and her state of mind, is awakened both in herself and in us. Ottilia unconsciously entangled in the natural force of immoral feeling, here appears as the pure blessed Virgin, elevated above all earthly discord. She herself, if not in a developed form, is aware of this contradiction, and—which is highly significant—just at the sight of the Assistant (teacher), who had educated her, to whom her soul had always been open, and in whose presence at this very moment she was perfectly conscious, whilst a great growth had been matured in her, since she previously saw him. Here too the whole æsthetical effect rests upon a mild contrast, which connects us with the whole past, while, at the same time, it reveals to us a foreboding future. The same opposition of moral freedom and necessity is, though in another form, again brought forward, and the scattered threads are again collected in the most subtle manner.

On the occasion of the Architect's appearance we remarked that every important man, who appears in a circle, will always exert an influence upon it. If it is a circle of ladies which he enters, he will so rule it as to call forth and conduct the whole course of conversation and activity. Thus the Architect's appearance gave the whole circle an artistical tendency, and directed all the attention to the region of art. Thus, on the occasion of the Assistant's visit, the conversation and sympathies are directed towards instruction, education, and particularly to the understanding of the different destination and duties of the two sexes. By these conversations, which lay claim to a higher nature, we are, as with the Architect, lifted above the contradiction and internal breach of family life, which has gone on gathering strength in the hearts of the personages, and we feel, in a certain measure, satisfied.

But, while occupied with this internal relation, we ought not to overlook the external thread by which the appearance of the Assistant is connected with the whole. We learn, that being moved by his own inclination and sensible reflections, and urged by the Baroness, he has undertaken the journey for the sake of gaining Ottilia's hand, but that he is always prevented by a certain timidity from paying his court. This timidity does not lie wholly in his natural bashfulness, but in the deportment of Ottilia, which involuntarily speaks to him, and in which, though he finds her altered greatly to her advantage, he sees impressed the effects of a destiny, which has rendered an approach on his part perfectly impossible. The Assistant's offer to take Ottilia back to the school for some time, that the defects in her knowledge may be supplied, forms indeed a strong contrast to the education which a heavy calamity has given to Ottilia. For her, the whole universe is absorbed in love for Edward, and all instruction from any other source, and which is beyond the power of her enjoyment, appears but meagre and trivial. The desire to place one who has been matured by the most consuming pains of love in the class of uneducated novices, appears to us—although the proposition was kindly meant—as a cruelty, which gives no little pain to Ottilia. Thus, here again in a simple way (the reverse of far-fetched), does the poet afford us a glance into the deep wound, from which Ottilia ever bleeds, and which has gathered strength amid all the successive positions and changing excitements.

By the birth of the child, which owes its existence to the immoral embraces of that eventful night, in which the natural force of feeling first exercised its mastery over moral freedom, the threads of the main action are again gathered together. Our glance, extended by so many mental treasures being spread out is by this occurrence again contrasted. The delusion of Mittler, who sees in the event the removal of all the perplexities hitherto felt, the solemnization of the christening, which first shows Ottilia the strangest agreement between her own eyes, and those of the child, the death of the old pastor, which immediately follows the solemnity, the suffering of Ottilia, which goes on increasing to a boundless extent, and in which she longs for death—all this together forms a picture so full of foreboding, that we discover in it the traces of a glowing fate, which cannot much longer defer its perfect revelation.

While our deeply moved mind is thus again directed to a narrow circle, and all the threads are woven into a gloomy web, this is suddenly illumined by a light, which allows the fundamental colors to appear conspicuously, and in which the spectators objectively perceive their own interior. We mean the episode that is introduced before the development of the catastrophe.

SONNET.

No. LXIII.

Oh would'st thou—would'st thou have that time gain,
When ev'ry day was by its anguish known;
Each moment had a sorrow of its own,
Diff'ring by greater or by lesser pain?—
That time of aching heart and madden'd brain,
When ev'ry energy was overthrown;
When o'er the soul's waste transient joys were strewn,
Like with'ring flowrets on a desert plain.
Thou call'st me cold;—the anguish that would creep
Athwart my brow has now that brow forsaken;
Thou call'st me cold, that from their magic sleep,
The pains of other days I do not waken;
Thou call'st me cold, that in a whirlpool deep
I plung'd thy grief and mine!—Thou art mistaken.

ALBONI AT THE OPERA ITALIEN.

As a pendant to our extracts from the French criticisms on Alboni's debut at the Academie Royale de Musique in Paris, we subjoin some more apropos of the celebrated contralto's recent triumph on the boards of the Opera Italien. The following article, from the pen of M. Delecluze, a veteran of the French press, appeared in the feuilleton of the Journal des Debats:—

DEBUT OF MADEIRA ALBONI IN "SEMIRAMIDE."

There is something powerful and tenacious in the Italian nature, which supports in those born beyond the mountains an energetic hope, the kindling warmth of which prolongs youth to an advanced period of life. This, which may be predicated of individuals, is applicable also to the whole nation; and of all countries where civilization has deeply penetrated, Italy is the one in which a distaste for life more rarely manifests itself. A man blasé, or used up, is hardly known amongst them, and indeed the word has no synonyme in the Italian tongue.

The éclat and puissance of this eternal youth struck all who assisted at the splendid performance of Semiramide, in which Madlle. Alboni debuted in the Italian Theatre at Paris. Here one might observe and compare, on one side, the youthful cantatrice who had already joined the completion of art to the results of an organization on which nature had lavished all her wealth; and on the others, all the juvenile verve of a virtuoso who has obtained universal favoritism for so many years in the same theatre, and in the same city.

Madame Grisi never in her life sang more magnificently than she did in Semiramide on Thursday last. With that grand and gracious manner, which is peculiar to her, she seems better adapted to personate roles like that of the Babylonian Queen, than any artiste of our times, and her performance, at all times surpassingly great, has never been surpassed on this occasion. Arsace, it is known, does not appear until the third or fourth scene of the opera, and it was nothing more than natural that the liveliest impatience should prevail among the audience for the entrance of the debutante: nevertheless, from the moment that Semiramide came on the stage, and as soon as Grisi and Coletti commenced singing, the public, delighted with the two artistes, soon perceived that the representation was grand and imposing, and that it was necessary to attend to it equally in every part. In effect, so early in the opera as this scene, the spectators had been roused to enthusiasm by the singing of Grisi and Coletti, and the performance in general, and were disposed to accord that profound and willing attention which brings out the talent of the artiste to its greatest power, and makes the public capable of judging.

At last the ritournelle of the aria "Eccomi alfin in Babilonia" was heard, all eyes were anxiously turned towards the side-wing from whence Alboni was to appear. The question mooted at Paris after the splendid performances of Alboni at the concerts of the Royal Academy of Music was soon solved: the young cantatrice appeared, and at once established herself as a great dramatic artiste, preserving all through a noble simplicity in her attitudes and gestures.

Although the talent of the debutante was known by the greatest number of amateurs who were present at the Theatre-Italiens on Thursday, Madlle. Alboni did not obtain that enthusiastic greeting which might have been expected. The reception was cold and cheerless, the applause, which was little, did not continue long, attention and curiosity seemed to absorb every other feeling, and an absolute silence prevailed. To this silence succeeded demonstrations of delight and rapture after the few first bars of the opening aria, which increased to the end, and then broke forth into a unanimous and enthusiastic shout of applause which endured for several minutes. Alboni had incontrovertibly shown that not only could she entrance her hearers by singing in a concert-room, but that her talent was more importantly developed when applied to the art lyric and dramatic in conjunction.

The quality of Madlle. Alboni's voice is well known in the musical world of Europe; I shall find it unnecessary, therefore, to enter minutely into the peculiar advantages of this faculty, which the cantatrice, although so very young, appears to have submitted to the most arduous exercise and study demanded by the art of singing. I shall merely observe that Madlle. Alboni's voice, so pure, so sweet, and so resonant; which includes the highest notes of the soprano, and the lowest notes of the contralto, provides in its effects a marvellous variety which she uses with singular effect. With regard to its agility and flexibility, it is such, and the results are so rapid and pure, that one can have no idea of the least effort on the part of the singer. Agility is a quality essential to the voice of a vocalist, because the more rapid and facile is the execution, the more it evidences capacity and largeness of design. In every art ornaments are indispensable to give true value to large masses: so that a song entirely stripped of floriture, is like an edifice upon the surface of which there is not even imposed a cornice. The art of adorning song Madlle. Alboni possesses in the highest degree. As this artiste surmounts with incredible ease all the difficulties of vocalisation, so she employs them without any parade; for which reason her singing, although extremely ornamented, when one considers it attentively, appears, and is in reality, of a large design, when you deliver yourself naturally to the pleasure of hearing her. As to her method, it is most admirable, and partakes of the true Italian method, such as has been transmitted to us by Crescentini, Fodor, Pasta, Rubini, Grisi, Brambilla, and Tamburini. By this method the singer is taught to take breath at the exactest moment; to be frugal in the use of the full power of the voice, to phrase eloquently to subordinate the ornaments to the ensemble, to observe the nuances religiously, and by these means to join unity and harmony of execution in a musical composition, instead of seeking to draw attention at all times to himself. This discretion, indispensable to a true vocalist, which induces him to forego the transient importance which may be allowed sometimes to prevail with the inferior personages of a drama, is one of the rarest qualities which distinguishes the great artiste. Madlle. Alboni possesses it in a singular degree, as she fully and satisfactorily demonstrated when singing her part in the grand morceau d'ensemble at the foot of the queen's throne.

As the young cantatrice had heretofore been heard in Paris at the concerts of the Opera only, she excited the liveliest sensation on Thursday last by the manner in which she gave the recitatives, and by the expression, I shall not say dramatic, because it is a word of late sufficiently abused, but true, simple, and profoundly sympathetic, she infused into Rossini's exquisite music. This young artiste, who attitudinizes so little, seems to throw her entire soul into her singing; and then her accents penetrate deeply into the hearts of those to whom music is a veritable language.

It were fruitless for me to endeavour to draw the attention of the audience, and the extreme delight with which the opera was heard throughout; for though that must be mainly attributed to the superiority of talent exhibited by Madlle. Alboni, it must be acknowledged that the excellence of the representation of Thursday night was also due to the remarkable manner in which Grisi and Coletti sang their portions of the music. The two duos (for that in the first act between Semiramide and Arsace has been restored) were received with uproarious demonstrations, and were encored. The grand duo of the second act, sung by Grisi and Coletti, and the aria before the tomb, which displayed the power of the last singer's voice to much advantage, were given with great effect. It was in the *cavatina*s belonging to the part of Arsace, that the public especially recognised the talent of Alboni, since singing alone, the best opportunity of judging was given, and it was then only they could fully appreciate the indefinable charm of her voice, her astonishing flexibility, and the simple and large character she throws around her singing.

Italy is decidedly the country of vocal music; throats appear to be organised there as they are nowhere else; the method of singing is good, and has been for more than two centuries, and all the pupils profit thereby. Nevertheless, despite the uniformity which would seem necessarily to result from the same elementary studies, all the true singers who come from beyond the mountains, although belonging to an identical school, have each a distinguishing characteristic. Old amateurs, doubtless, have not lost recollection of Mesdames Stranassachi, Barilli, Festa, Correa, Fodor, Pasta, Grassini, Monbelli, while they may yet hear Grisi, Persiani, Brambilla, and others; but when one compares the very different impressions produced by the talent peculiar to each of these vocalists, all, however, issuing from the same school, he will feel less astonished that Alboni, armed with the same traditional method, should suddenly appear in a light perfectly original, and replete with a charm and a grace altogether her own. It is the peculiar advantage of schools founded on the best principles, that they provide unity in the material exercise of the art, without destroying the development of those qualities proper to the individual who practices them, and that, in other respects, they are favorable to talent on a large scale, but are ruinous to mediocrity.

The engagement of Madlle. Alboni at the Theatre Italien has already produced, and will certainly produce many serious necessary revolutions, that, for example, of reanimating the sacred fire in the hearts of artistes, and of leading to the production of other operas in the same style of perfection as the Semiramide. Besides, as one may easily perceive that Madlle. Alboni produces the greatest effects without forcing her voice, or straining her attitudes, the public as well as the artistes will draw from thence this conclusion, that, most indubitably, to scream is not to sing, and that there is no need of giving tours de reins upon the stage to become dramatic. Still further, the presence of Madlle. Alboni will preserve us from the ennui of hearing certain blustering operas, which tear to pieces the singers' voices, and will restore to us works such as Tancredi, La Gazza Ladra, Cenerentola, and La Donna del Lago.

To these advantages in futuro, which we shall owe to the new debutante, may be added that of having awoke the attention of the auditories of the Theatre Ventadour, which, as it were, had slumbered for some time. DELECLUZE.

The humorous Charivari, in a moment of unusual gravity, delivers itself in the following terms:—

DEBUT OF MADLLE. ALBONI in "SEMIRAMIDE."

Every thing has already been said, that can be said, about the voice of this celebrated singer—about this Rothschild, who possesses so extraordinary an accumulation of vocal richness. The Opera and the Theatre Italien disputed the possession of the marvellous contralto of Alboni, et cela conçoit.

It was worth at least a Sunderbund war. M. Vatel at last carried her off. At the concerts of La Rue Lepelletier we had but the quality, flexibility, and extraordinary compass of her vocal organ to appreciate; last night her lyrical debut proved that Alboni has not only natural gifts but exquisite taste, and an excellent method. She invested the part of Arsace with new and charming features portrayed with an aplomb that announced a talent that could rely on its own merits; dramatic excellence she possesses in a remarkable degree. The duet of the Barbiere, and "La Brindisi," from Lucrezia Borgia, however, which she sang with so much dash at the Opera, makes us think that music of that class suits her even more than that of a serious character. Her contralto notes are splendid, and would produce even more effect were she to be less prodigal of them. The success of Alboni was rapturous; she will be the cause of the revival of the old repertoire of the Theatre Italien.

Madame Grisi, reanimated by the companionship of the debutante, came out with all the splendour and talent of her best days. The result of this rivalry between two superior vocalists on the ground of the divine score of the maitre des maitres, was one of those rare evenings that will remain for a long time in the memories of the dilettanti.

The not less humorous rival of the humorous Charivari, Le Corsaire, equally in a moment of gravity, expresses itself thus:—

ITALIENS—SEMIRAMIDE. DEBUT OF MADLLE ALBONI.

We will give an account in a few words of this brilliant event. Alboni was admirable from beginning to the end of the part of Arsace. She was received with immense enthusiasm; the air In si barbara Sciagura was encored, and certainly we never heard anything in France so exquisite and splendid as the duo in the second act between Alboni and Grisi. Grisi sung wondrously, and appeared as if she was singing at the Italiens for the first time. How beautiful, grand, and terrible she was in the magnificent character of the Mother and the Queen. What brilliancy, freshness, grace and energy she displayed. She was interrupted nearly every moment—at every phrase by the bursts of admiration that escaped from the audience; Grisi will never forget that evening. Never did she appear younger—never more magnificent. What efforts have there not been made to drag La Diva from her starry throne. Neither rivals, intrigues, dark plots, gross falsehoods—indeed nothing has been left undone to effect it: but let them work and let them talk, La Grisi will always be La Grisi; one look, one gesture, one glance from her and the public are at her feet. Coletti was worthy of being associated with Grisi and Alboni, we can say nothing more flattering to this excellent artiste. There must, however, always be something to mar the efforts of the unfortunate theatre. The tenor was laughed at; the chorus-singers were laughed at; the immense coquetiers worn by the grotesque Assyrians, caused roars of laughter. But the public were so contented, so enchanted, that they did not make themselves unhappy about it, and we will do as the public did.

One of the oldest of the Parisian musical journals, Le Menestrel, offers the following appropriate apostrophe on the occasion:—

ALBONI AT THE ITALIENS.

If, as wicked tongues affirm, it be true that M. Vatel, after the example of good old Homer, has slept sometimes since the opening of the season, it must be allowed that he has been roused from his somnolency by a coup d'ecart. At the moment when it was matter of the most violent disputation, whether Alboni would or would not appear on the stage of the Opera, the report was spread abroad that she had been engaged at the Italiens; some days afterwards the testimony of the affiche made a reality of the report; and finally, on the day appointed, the great cantatrice débüté at the Ventadour in the role of Arsace in Semiramide. Received on her entrance with an anxious silence, Alboni had no sooner uttered the first notes of the recitative, "Eccomi al fin in Babilonia," than the whole theatre resounded with applauses, and the success of the artiste increased from thence to the end of the representation.

Although we have previously made mention of Alboni in this journal, on the occasion of her first appearance at the Royal Academy of Music, we must take leave to return to the subject a second time, since so great a talent cannot be studied with too much attention, nor made known in too much detail.

Mademoiselle Alboni, is, perhaps, the most rarely and richly-gifted singer we have ever heard. She sings with so much facility, so much abstraction, so much pleasure, that melody seems her natural element, as to each one of us the air which he respires. In listening to her, one might be tempted to believe that study had nothing whatever to do with the management of her organ and that she came into the world trilling, cooing, and sighing like a bird. The voice of Alboni embraces an extent of notes of two octaves and a half, from E flat to C sharp. She unites, then, the two registers of contralto and soprano. Nevertheless, by the nature of the quality of the voice, by the position of the cantilene, and, above all, by the fullness of the lower notes, it enters more particularly into the category of the contralto; it is there it holds its true domain, its centre of effects, and its power of action. How is it possible, by any words, to describe this organ, so pure, so vibrating, so limpid, so full of éclat and emotion, which has the freshness and softness of youth, which insinuates itself into the heart by accents of a delicious tenderness, which speaks to the soul a language fraught with the noblest and loftiest sentiments. And then her method and her style,—was ever anything more perfect or more exquisite? Here you perceive neither affectation, nor sacrifices to bad taste, nor jugglery, nor any of those ficelle which moderate singers call to their aid, but, on the contrary, a frankness, and as it were, an ideal loyalty; an expression by turns dignified and gracious; a firmness of articulation and a roundness of finish which one might compare to a steel engraving; an agility and a flexibility of vocalising which makes one dream of pearls of gold rolling in a crystal basin.

And yet is not this dazzling sun free from spots. The imperfection of all things earthly is not exceptional in Alboni's case. To a countenance extremely sweet and interesting, she presents a figure brusque and somewhat inclined to the embonpoint; but in her acting she rarely fails in energy, and does not fail to be able to realise the spontaneous cries, those élans of passion which move and electrify an entire audience. It is by means of these also that Grisi can advantageously struggle against her new rival, and maintain, even alongside of her, the same proud height in the sympathies of the public. The inimitable Queen of Babylon, moreover, sang with a care, and willingness, and a facility which entitled her to the greatest praises, all other species of merit apart.

Alboni was quite perfect in her first cavatina: she was scarcely less effective in her duo with Assur. This was not altogether her style. The magnificent duo between Semiramide and Arsace (usually omitted) afforded each of the vocalists an occasion for a splendid triumph; the scena in the crowning scene was given in a most wonderful manner by Alboni, and finally the second duo with Grisi, "Ebben a te Ferisce," presented a chef-d'œuvre of delicacy and perfection in ensemble singing—such as has rarely been heard: you might have fancied that a single voice had interpreted these inextricable musical arabesques. The last part of this duo, and the cantabile of the second air were encored with the greatest enthusiasm. Alboni was recalled at the fall of the curtain and cheered immensely from all parts of the house. We must not forget Coletti, who, in the part of Assur received considerable applause from his large manner of acting, and his dramatic style.

The management, it is said, intends giving four representations of Semiramide, and afterwards—what a fertile mine for the director to work in—to bring out La Donna del Lago, Cenerentola L'Italiana, &c. &c., the most dazzling jewels which form the dazzling crown of Alboni. E. VIEL.

Next week we shall pursue our extracts; meanwhile, for further particulars we must refer the reader to the letter of our Paris correspondent.

OPERATIC STARS.

NO. IV.—TAMBURINI.

In the year 1833, Antonio Tamburini, preceded by a great continental reputation, debuted as Dandini in Cenerentola, and established himself at once as one of the finest florid barytones ever heard in this country, and one of the most delightful comic actors ever seen on any stage. His reception was tremendous. He was called at the end of the first act, and at the fall of the curtain was led on by Donzelli, who played Ramirio, to receive the uproarious manifestations of the audience. It caused no small merriment among the spectators at witnessing one gentleman leading on another; but the ruse was admissible, as Tamburini was a debutante, young, and had been playing in comedy. The extraordinary flexibility of the new artist's voice was, however, not its chief recommendation; the quality was rich, round, and sympathetic, and the tones were exquisitely modulated to every variety of feeling. Tamburini's appearance was immensely in his favour. His face immediately attracted the beholder as possessing great manly beauty, together with much expressiveness. His hair, worn short, almost in a crop, showed his well-shaped forehead to peculiar advantage, and gave a classical appearance to the head. The ease and grace of his gestures were no less admired, while his figure was universally pronounced well-proportioned and elegant. With such attractions and accomplishments, Tamburini could not fail of rising immediately into the greatest favoritism. But the public had as yet only witnessed the artist in his lightest colours. So great a comic actor could hardly be supposed to be equally the great tragedian. No sooner, however, had Tamburini appeared in a serious part, than that line of acting was pronounced to be his forte. His fame was henceforward firmly established, and he was elevated to the highest niche in the temple of art. From 1833 to 1841, he maintained his position at the London Italian Opera without a rival, increasing yearly in popularity, and was only superseded by the ill-considered policy of the management, joined to the now well-known malicious workings of certain members of the establishment, who, for their own private ends, and envying him his proud position, after ceaseless efforts, at length undermined him, and had him dismissed from the company of which he constituted, for so many years, one of its most signal ornaments. But this did not occur without the most strenuous interference on the part of the public. In 1840, Tamburini came to London without an engagement at the Opera. Signor Coletti, the celebrated barytone, who last season occupied the highest position at Her Majesty's Theatre, supplied his place. The artist was favorably received, but was found so much the inferior of his predecessor in every respect, that the subscribers and the public in general took umbrage, and loudly demanded the reinstatement of their favorite. The Tamburini row is matter of operatic history. The manager could not contend against so much unanimity and determination on the part of his audience, and, after a struggle which endured for several nights, he came forward, and announced the re-engagement of Tamburini. Never shall we forget the scene we witnessed on that night. I few mistake not, the opera was Puritani, and Coletti, who assumed Tamburini's celebrated part, Ricciardo, was listened to, throughout his performance, with the greatest respect, but also with the greatest coldness. But no sooner had the curtain fallen on the opera, than loud voices were heard from all parts of the theatre calling for "Tamburini." There could be no mistake about the feeling of the house. Boxes, stalls, pit, and gallery were all on one side. The tumult continued to increase for upwards of a quarter of an hour, till at last the noise became deafening. At length, Laporte appeared, and was received with yells, hisses, threats, and every possible demonstration of disapproval an excited multitude could display. The manager bowed before the storm, and stood exposed to the elemental din for several minutes, endeavouring in vain to make his voice audible amid the roar of the human tempest. An opportunity of being heard was at last afforded him, and in a lull of the hurricane, he shouted out at the top of his voice:—"Ladies and gentlemen, Signor Tamburini is engaged, and will appear on Thursday." Instantaneously from the mouths of the immense assemblage, as if by word of command, there issued a shriek of triumph that scared the very cab-horses in the Haymarket, and threatened dilapidation to the walls of Her Majesty's Theatre. Roar after roar succeeded, broken like waves, to be created again from their own disruption; on every side was in short, a more maddened audience was never before witnessed inside a theatre. But the demonstration did not rest with shouts of triumph, and such common manifestations of enthusiasm. No sooner had the manager announced the unexpected engagement of Tamburini, than the two omnibus boxes, the occupants of which had been among the most indefatigable supporters of the ex-artiste, disgorged their royal and noble contents upon the stage, and these, being joined by others from the neighbouring boxes and stalls, they all threw up their hats, and cried, "Viva, Tamburini;" thus, as it were, taking the managerial position by storm, and planting their standard on the citadel. Tamburini was engaged, and Coletti appeared no more during the season. It must be owned that this was hardly fair to the latter very clever artist; but the manager was entirely to blame for engaging one quite incompetent to fill the high place left vacant by Tamburini, whose immense and splendid triumphs were so fresh in the minds of the public. Not wishing to imbroil himself in further disputations, and seeing, perhaps, that the manager was not very amicably disposed towards him, Tamburini kept away from England, and did not return to this country, until recalled by last year's engagement to the Royal Italian Opera. But the public had not forgotten their old and time-honored favorite. The reception accorded to him on his first appearance last season, was so great as almost to move him to tears; and though his voice had lost a portion of its fluidity and some of its quality, enough of the splendid vocalist and great artist remained to render his season one of the brightest in his brilliant career.

A wide sea of waving kerchiefs seen,
Hats flung aloft, and hands in transport keen;

It is worth while examining the causes that led to Tamburini's great popularity—a popularity unapproached since the days of Ambrogetti—and which certainly no other barytone obtained since his time. Tamburini's voice, independent of his powers as an actor, could hardly have won for him a great reputation. It is confined in the upper register, that is in comparison with many modern barytones, and all the high notes are formed from the head. A want of power is also manifest beyond the D. The middle voice is round, sonorous, and sympathetic—the latter term seeming to us admirably adapted to express the peculiar quality of Tamburini's voice. The lower toes are also round and full, but not very powerful. The flexibility of the artist's organ is proverbial, and there is hardly a passage written for an instrument which it could not master with ease. This remarkable facility of executing is of the greatest utility in comic opera, especially to a barytone, and is absolutely indispensable in the interpretation of Rossini's music. It was in Rossini's operas that Tamburini first made his reputation, and in the delineation of the chief parts of these to the present moment he stands unrivalled. Among his principal characters in this master's works we may name Figaro in Barbiere, Dandini in Cenerentola, the father in the Gazza Ladra, Assur in Semiramide, Maometto in Maometto Secondo, Iago in Otello, &c. Tamburini's reputation was established in Italy while a mere boy. Before his voice broke it was a treble of marvellous quality, power, and flexibility; and he frequently appeared in female characters on the stage at Naples, Sicily, and other places with the greatest effects. It was thus that he imbibed a love for his art from his very infancy, and by such early indoctrination arrived at that perfection which subsequently elevated him among the greatest vocalists of the day. But not in Rossini's music alone, or in that of the florid school, has Tamburini proved himself the consummate artists. Without one moment's hesitation we pronounce him the most conscientious interpreter of Mozart's music of any Italian singer we ever heard. Though possessed of that marvellous flexibility, which seems eternally tempting the vocalist to play the truant, and though he does indeed play the truant with the scores of other composers at times, Tamburini never alters a note of Mozart's, and never interpolates a note more than the composer sets down. This is very high merit, and exhibits the great taste and great judgment of the singer. As he is the most conscientious interpreter of Mozart's music, so also is he the most admirable delineator of some of the principal personages in the works of that composer. His Don Giovanni is undoubtedly his greatest part, and may stand comparison with any performance ever seen on the Italian stage. Of his serious characters, if we were to judge by the effect produced on the audience, we should pronounce his Father, in Pär's Agnese to be his best. His performance in the mad scene in this opera, when it was produced in the first, or second year of his London engagement, was so fearfully real, that several ladies were carried out fainting every night it was played, and the representation was withdrawn because the artist was too successful. This is within the recollection of all the old Opera frequenters. Several composers have written operas, and special parts in operas for Tamburini, among others Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante, Pacini, Balfe, Costa, &c., &c. We have only to add that in his private career no vocalist was ever more beloved and respected than Tamburini, and that if his high abilities entitled him to be called a GREAT ARTIST, his unquestionable worth entitles him to the prouder appellation of a GOOD MAN.

MISS BIRCH AND THE ACADEMIE ROYALE.

The following letter has reached us from our Paris Correspondent; we hasten to publish it, as a matter of justice to our readers and ourselves, no less than to him:—

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I was greatly astonished at reading in Galignani's Messenger a letter (which I enclose) signed C. A. Birch. As the subject cannot be agreeable to the young lady, and I do not wish to hurt her feelings, I shall confine my observations to the following:—The contents of the letter are—to use a French term from the vocabulary of politesse— incorrect; every word I wrote to you on the subject was perfectly true; the correspondent of the Illustrated London News and The Britannia wrote to those journals, to the same purport, in terms as ill more forcible than mine. The conclusion I arrive at is that the letter signed C. A. Birch is a hoax, or that Miss Birch shows very little gratitude for persons who readily sacrificed themselves in her quarrel, and interfered for her sake, and to their own loss, in matters which did not concern them. I cannot believe that the letter, supposing it not to be a hoax, came from Miss Birch spontaneously; but whoever advised her to write it, admitting that she did write it, was a very unwise counsellor, and whoever wrote the letter was a very ill letter writer. I need say no more to you on the matter; you know me well enough to have the fullest confidence in the truth and sincerity of what I write to you. And here let the subject drop, with a proviso that if it be further mooted I shall not hesitate to publish the whole particulars, without deference to anybody. My honour is at stake in this matter, and you will not be backward in affording me (if occasion demand it) the means of vindicating.

Paris, Dec. 5, 1847.

YOUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

We place the fullest confidence in our correspondent, and have reason to know that his statement is in every particular correct. In publishing the letter signed C. A. Birch, we leave it to the strength of its own argument, the most unkindly office we could render it. Meantime, we entertain the highest respect for Miss Birch, and regret to find her placed by injudicious, though, perhaps, well-meaning friends, in a false position. Below is the letter from Galignani:—

SIR,—Will you allow me to offer some explanation to the public on the subject of my journey to France, and of my sudden return to London, without having made my debut at l'Académie Royale. I have no complaint to make of the directors of that theatre, as your readers may have been led to believe. On the contrary, they did their utmost to assist me to a success, and to encourage me in the hope that I should obtain one. They placed me under the care of the best masters for accent, &c. I need but mention MM. Duprez, Michelot, and Emanuel Garcia. I had a full rehearsal of the part of Mathilde, in Guillaume Tell, with orchestra and chorus, after which I received the most flattering encouragement, and my debut was fixed for the 22d of this month, of which I received official notification. It was on the receipt of this, that yielding to the fear of which I am about to explain the cause, I took the resolution of coming suddenly to London, instead of staying to make my debut. An insurmountable terror had taken possession of me on account of the imperfection of my French pronunciation. I had been aware, at the general rehearsal of Guillaume Tell, of smiles and jeux de mots at certain passages; at that, for instance, which I thought I had pronounced accurately, "Mon cœur n'a pas trompé mes yeux," there was open laughter, and I heard people repeating the phrase made into a parody by my defective pronunciation—"Mon cœur n'a pas trompé Messieurs." You can imagine with what alarm I was seized on finding how easy it was for a public, so fond of a joke as the public of Paris, which makes game of everything, including itself, to find in my accent a perpetual subject of pleasantry. I then felt the enormous difficulty of my task, and I have shrunk back from it, as, indeed, Madlle. Jenny Lind (to whom, certainly, I have not the pretension of comparing myself) did, when she refused the engagement offered her in London by M. Duponchel, and, more recently, Madlle. Alboni. The latter lady has sung four times in Italian on the stage of l'Académie Royale with extraordinary success, but in spite of this advantage, no temptation could induce her to sing there in French. Under these circumstances, I have renounced the attempt to do what Madlle. Jenny Lind and Madlle. Alboni believed to be beyond their powers. I think in so doing I have acted with prudence, and I hope that MM. the directors of the French Opera, giving me credit for my motives, will hold me excused from the promise I had given them. Such, Sir, is the reason of my refusing to debuter at the French Opera, when the formal notification was sent to me, rendering it incumbent on my part to beg you to correct the statements which have appeared in some English papers, where it has been said that the Parisian directors had not treated me in a generous or courteous manner. I venture to hope that, after this simple explanation, the public of London, no less than that of Paris, will find what I have done only reasonable and natural.—I am, sir, your obedient, &c.,

C. A. BIRCH.

We abstain with pleasure from further comment, but cannot help adding that the letter is without exception the funniest we ever read.

P.S. The letter is published in Galignani's as "from the London journals;" but the only papers it appeared in were the Morning Post and the Observer!! In the latter some remarks were added by the editor, on which we shall, perhaps, find it necessary to comment by and bye. It may not be generally known that the managers, who treated Miss Birch so very handsomely, have issued proceedings against her in the French courts, and recovered damages to the amount of 30,000 francs.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

M. JULLIEN commenced his first campaign as manager of a theatre, on Monday night, under highly favourable auspices. The first conditions of opera, strictly interpreted—a complete and brilliant orchestra, a numerous and efficient chorus, an accomplished chef d'orchestre, and good principal singers—were all supplied, whereby the pledges involved in the director's prospectus were honourably fulfilled. The absence of novelty in the opera selected for performance was balanced by the almost entire novelty of the performers, the chief of whom were wholly unknown previously on the English stage. The prima donna, Madame Dorus Gras, had never before sung in English opera, or in the English tongue, and had only studied our language within the last few months to render her fit for the Grand Opera at Drury Lane. Mr. Sims Reeves was unknown, or more properly, unremembered on the English stage, and those who did recal the novice of 1842 shook their heads, and doubted his continental reputation. Mr. H. Whitworth was in the like predicament as Mr. Reeves, and was entirely unknown to more than nine-tenths of the audience. Besides these, there were other unknowns, and in short, with the exception of Mr. Weiss, all the principal artists were strangers to the boards of Drury Lane. Thus the greatest curiosity was excited respecting M. Jullien's company, and various were the opinions murmured as to the future position of the new English Opera. Let us now say a few words of the principal artists separately.

Madame Dorus Gras had for many years been one of our most celebrated concert singers, and had won for herself, in that line of the musical profession, a considerable reputation. The part chosen by the fair cantatrice for her debut was Lucia, in Donizetti's Bride of Lammermoor, a character written for Persiani, and one which did not tax any great histrionic efforts on the part of the performer. The high vocal powers of Madame Dorus Gras had been acknowledged both in France and England, and a great success was expected in consequence, though the fact of her having to sing in a new language, it was feared, would seriously militate against the best efforts of the artist. The debut of Madame Dorus Gras approached nearer to a great triumph than her best friends had hoped for. The difficulties of the English language were certainly not entirely overcome, but enough was mastered to show that immense progress had been made by the artist, and that ere long, with further care and study, she would become a proficient in our tongue sufficient for the purposes of music. The acting of Madame Dorus Gras does not belong to the loftiest school; it was, however, characterised by much simplicity and ease, a deportment natural and graceful, and she showed herself perfect mistress of the business of the stage. In the last scene she was highly effective, and elicited loud applause from all parts of the house. Whatever exceptions we may have taken to Madame Dorus Gras' acting, we have none whatever to make to her singing. She was in most delightful voice and sung with great brilliancy and effect. Her first cavatina quite astonished the audience by its perfect execution, and the almost marvellous way in which the vocalist accomplished the greatest difficulties. The flexibility of Madame Dorus Gras' voice is proverbial, and perhaps this wondrous mechanical facility was never evidenced more completely than on Monday night. In the recitative and the declamatory music she was not so happy, doubtless from having to contend with the pronunciation of a foreign language, an almost insurmountable obstruction. Madame Dorus Gras was received throughout the opera in the most enthusiastic manner, and obtained several recalls during the evening.

The new tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, achieved, and most deservedly achieved, the most unequivocal success we have witnessed on the English stage for a quarter of a century. It may be in the recollection of our readers that in our review of a concert in which Mr. Reeves sung last year at Drury Lane, we spoke of him in the highest terms, and prognosticated a great success for him in dramatic singing. We must own, however, that on the stage he has far surpassed our utmost expectations. Mr. Reeves' voice is a pure high tenor of delicious quality, the tones vibrating, and equal throughout. The management of this exquisite organ displays considerable skill, and proves the artist must have studied deeply and laboured hard in his early youth. We have heard no voice out of Italy so decidedly Italian as Mr. Reeves'. It is Italian in character in timbre; and there is the Italian feeling in his style. The artist has been instructed in the best school, and a fine natural capacity has done wonders in a few short years. It is almost impossible to believe that within so short a space so astonishing an improvement could have taken place in a singer, as that we have found in Mr. Reeves, since we heard him with little pleasure, and little hope, in 1842. He is now an accomplished, indeed we may add, a great singer, and it will be his own fault if he be not one of the very greatest artists on the modern stage. As an actor Mr. Reeves is also entitled to the highest praise. His deportment is natural and easy, his action manly and to the purpose, and without having recourse to vehement ranting, he exhibits both passion and power. In his first scene, on Monday night, he was, perhaps, a little cold, doubtless from the anxiety consequent on his first appearance, but in the second act he came out immensely, and created quite a furor. His malediction was extremely fine, and the famous death scene was both sung and acted in the most artistic and effective manner. Mr. Reeves was called for after the first act, twice after the second, and again at the end, when the whole house cheered him for several minutes. Mr. Reeves's debut, we repeat, was a great triumph.

Mr. H. Whitworth, the new barytone, created a very favourable sensation in the part of Henry, the Enrico of the Italian opera. He has a fine, capable voice, and manages it with much skill. His upper notes are clear and strong, and his delivery is particularly good. He has scarcely passion enough for a part like this which has taxed the powers of a Tamburini and a Ronconi; nevertheless, he is deserving of much praise, and will be a great addition to the new operatic corps.

The orchestra was magnificent, and the chorus nearly as fine. A more splendid band M. Jullien could not have selected, and such a band, under such a conductor as Berlioz, was never heard within the walls of Drury Lane, or any theatre in London, if we except the Royal Italian Opera, from which and Her Majesty's Theatre, M. Jullien has taken his leading men. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in Beethoven's overture to Leonora, which, wherefore we could not discover, preceded Donizetti's opera. M. Berlioz, deeply versed in the scores of Beethoven, directing it with wonderful animation. We must enter our protest against a minuet interpolated in the last act, which was worthless in itself, entirely out of place, and which merited the tokens of disapproval it obtained from the audience. We are sorry to be compelled to notice any defects in a performance so excellent in every other respect. The chorus was admirably trained and was quite perfect throughout the performance, the pianos and fortes being taken with exceeding care and precision. The new conductor, M. Hector Berlioz, established on Monday night his continental fame, as one of the greatest living chefs-d'orchestre. The highly efficient and artistic manner in which he ruled the mass of instrumentalists under his baton was deserving of all praise. His conducting was marked with great decision and energy, and he exhibited that spirit and animation which proved him a true enthusiast in his art. It was hardly possible for M. Jullien to have selected a more able and competent chef than M. Hector Berlioz.

M. Jullien has fulfilled the promises of his prospectus in every item. He has provided one of the very finest bands in the world; a complete and powerful chorus; the best performers he could possibly obtain, and a conductor whose name is European. That M. Jullien may succeed to his utmost expectations this year is our earnest wish; his outlay has been enormous.

The Drury Lane management seems to have eschewed, and perhaps discreetly so, the ballet proper, if we may judge from the choregraphic entertainments supplied on Monday after the opera. The divertissement is entitled Le Genie du Globe. The chief dancers were Mesdames Giubelei, Louise, and Melanie Duval, and Mr. Harvey, and all acquitted themselves capitally. The music is written by M. Maretzek. The dances are composed and the ballet arranged, with much ingenuity and taste. The author is Mr. Benjamin Barnett.

The scenery, painted by Messrs. Grieve and Telbin, was very beautiful; and the dresses were splendid and appropriate. The Highland costume, heretofore used, was most properly rejected, and the dress of the period of the story assumed. A new drop curtain, painted to represent white satin and light blue velvet, looped with gold, has been supplied.

After the opera the National Anthem was sung in full chorus. Subsequently M. Jullien was called for, and on his appearance was received with immense applause. D. R.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SHAKSPEARE NIGHT.—Covent Garden never, in its palmiest days, presented a more imposing spectacle than it did on Tuesday evening, on the occasion of the performance instituted in aid of the fund to purchase Shakspeare's house. Every seat in the theatre was taken for several days previously, and as much as ten pounds was offered for a small box on the Monday. The novelty of the performance, no doubt, was the main attraction, all the leading Shaksperian actors in the metropolis having volunteered their services. The first scene introduced Macready in his great character of the king in the second part of Henry the Fourth, the tragedian having most judiciously selected the death scene, in which he exhibited his great art and judgment to the infinite delight of the audience. A more splendid piece of acting we have seldom witnessed. Mr. Macready was ably supported by Mr. Leigh Murray as Prince Hal. Mrs. Butler appeared in the death scene of Queen Katharine in Henry the Eighth. In the Two Gentlemen of Verona, Harley and Buckstone supported the whimsicalities of Lance and Speed with much spirit and humor. The scene of Falstaff's recruits, before Justice Shallow, in the second part of King Henry the Fourth, introduced Mr.

W. Farren as Justice Shallow, Mr. Granby as Falstaff. Juliet's Marriage Day, from Romeo and Juliet, introduced Miss Helen Faucit as Juliet, and Mrs. Glover as the Nurse need we say how admirably sustained by both these great actresses. Mrs. Nisbett and Mr. Webster won immense applause in scenes from The Taming of the Shrew, as Katharine and Petruchio, Keeley coming in for his full share as Grumio. The scene of the Buck Basket, and Slender's Courtship, were selected from The Merry Wives of Windsor, to introduce Madame Vestris as Mrs. Page, Mrs. Stirling as Mrs. Ford, Miss Marshall as Ann Page, Mr. Granby as Falstaff, Mr. F. Matthews as Shallow, Mr. Charles Mathews as Slender, and others—a strong cast. Mr. Phelps as Prospero, and Miss Laura Addison as Miranda, were favorably received in a scene from The Tempest; and Mrs. Warner, supported by Messrs. Graham, J. H. Johnston, G. Vining, &c., wound up splendidly with the Statue Scene from A Winter's Tale. Macready, Webster, Keeley, and the ladies Nisbett, H. Faucit, and Glover, were severally honored with a recall, and received with great enthusiasm. The receipts amounted to upwards of £900.

SURREY THEATRE.—Mrs. D. W. King appeared, for the first time, on the London boards on Wednesday, in The Bride of Lammermoor, and, as we learn from all who heard her, created a very great sensation. We have not heard Mrs. King, but shall take the first opportunity of seeing her and judging for ourselves. Mr. Bunn is the most indefatigable of managers, and is always seeking and providing something novel for his audience. On Thursday Macbeth was played and introduced H. Phillips as Hecate, who was received with thunders of applause. The celebrated barytone is announced shortly to appear in The Maid of Artois.

FRENCH PLAYS.—On Monday last this theatre opened its doors for the season, rather later than has been usual these last few years, and with a company, if we may judge by the sample hitherto given, not at all inferior to what we had expected of Mr. Mitchell. It is of course understood that the present company is meant merely to form what may be called the groundwork of the edifice, the stars to appear at different intervals after Christmas. Considered as such, they are open to no objections, except perhaps a want of ensemble, and we may attribute some share of this fault to the fact that they are new to an English public, unused to act together, a great desideratum in theatricals, and suffering evidently in many instances from the effects of the prevailing epidemic. Le Jeune Mari was the first piece produced, known in England by the title of Spring and Autumn; it was respectably done. As M. Montaland was suffering from severe hoarseness, we cannot with any justice pronounce a decided opinion on this gentleman's merits. M. St. Marie was decidedly too old for the part he impersonated. The ladies were Mesdames Valmy, Saint-Ange and Davenay, the latter playing the part of the niece, Clara, with much judgment and discretion. The second piece is an importation from the Theatre Francais, and is entitled La Cigüe. The scene is laid at Athens, and turns upon the disgust which Clinias (M. Fechter) evinces for a life of dissolute idleness and profligacy, his contempt for his old companions of debauchery and his resolve to put an end to his life by taking hemlock. He leaves his two friends, Paris and Cléon, to dispute his inheritance, the decision to depend on the arbitrage of a young slave of great personal beauty, whom he has just bought. The slave, however, refuses both the suitors, and the affair terminates by a marriage between her and Clinias, in whose heart she has aroused sentiments of dignity and honour which he had conceived lost for ever. The plot of this play is simple to a fault, and recalls to mind the satires in dialogue of the schools of Aristophanes and Plautus. There is much of caustic irony about it; the repartees are good and salient, and it is enlivened by much wit, which never degenerates into the common-place, of that sort which creates a smile on the countenance, and leaves behind it no qualms or doubts as to its being genuine. It is written in verse, and is decidedly of the good school of French comedy, although we are inclined to think that much of the point is lost on account of the locality chosen by the author, which would have been more appropriately situate in Paris than in Athens. M. Fechter did his part carefully, and evinces capabilities of a high order; we shall watch his progress with pleasure. M. Cartigny was quite out of his element, and M. Tourrillon not at all up to the mark. Madlle. Baptiste looked exceedingly pretty and played her part with much feeling. In the Vicomte de Giroflée we shook hands with an old friend of the Princess's, the part being played at that theatre by Mr. Compton. We really think there should be a law to compel managers to acknowledge the source from which they derive their dramatic pilferings; as no law of international copyright exists, common courtesy, the only payment the miserable author gets, should induce the plagiarist to make honorable mention of his name at any rate. But to return to the St. James's. Giroflée was played with much talent and humor by M. Josset. This gentleman has had no trumpeter to announce his arrival; he has never played in Paris, but comes from Nantes, to which town he will certainly never return. He is the best niais we have had in London since Arnal was here; he sings his couplets much better than we have hitherto heard them sung in this theatre; he was deservedly applauded, and will become a favorite. We shall speak next week with more confidence of the merits of the artistes. We look forward with pleasure to the arrival of M. Bocage, who is to play the part of Créon in Antigone, the entire music of Mendelssohn to be given under the conduct of the celebrated Benedict; let us hope that the patronage of the public will be such as to induce Mr. Mitchell to follow it up by Racine's Athalie, with the choruses set to music by the same great composer. (To the Editor of the Musical World.)

STATUE TO MENDELSSOHN.

SIR,—I resume again, on this important subject, as my last communication was unavoidably short, in the fear of losing your publishing hour, but I thought I would not lose even the smallest opportunity of mootng for the furtherance of this desirable question to a successful attainment, and the sooner, sir, we arrive at this termination the greater the amount of credit will be due to us as—devotees enthusiastically kneeling at the shrine of genius—as, acting quickly and spontaneously, and, from impulses that proceed at once from the heart—heart! that ought to overflow with grateful aspirations for the parentage and birth of such a bright and beauteous orb, such divine emanations of intellect—such spiritual inspiration, that can only shine once before us, in our short career; therefore ought we to make much of what lies in our power, by being instant in our efforts in rendering this, our “Last Tribute.” In my last, sir, there was an expression of fact lest there should not be that union of purpose which ought to reign paramount in such a theme as the present, but happily, I am inclined to think that this may be allayed, from circumstances that have transpired since. But I still emphatically and fervently hope with your Paris correspondent, that the question of Bust will be merged into that of Statue. I hope this, as, ought we to be satisfied with the placing; the mere placing a small—unpretending—piece of masonry like a bust, in some out of the way building to be placed in some obscure and out of the way corner, and for persons to go out of the way to catch a glimpse of the same? In my idea ‘twill be just as such subscribed money thrown away, for as soon as the inauguration is over, it will be forgotten and neglected, and we shall need reminding, that we possess such a “small memento” to bind us to the memory of such “large” worth. I hope, sir, for the sake of our character,—for the sake of our taste, for the sake of surviving friends, for the sake of the departed himself, that this will not be done. You must yourself, sir, take a great interest in this affair! Do then, for genius's sake, throw your interest into the scale;—take up your pen, sir, and second what your friend and correspondent has so well suggested, strike at once while the subject is young and fresh, lest it go too far, lest, sir, that a long list and a large amount would be the result, and you have only to take it in hand to command this. I wished to have hinted this to you in my last, but was prevented by pressure of time, I therefore hope now, that what you do you will do quickly, and I feel not the least anxiety about raising funds necessary “even” for a statue, for the musical world has only to be appealed to, I am sure on this occasion for the immediate and prompt response of large subscriptions. Hoping, next week, to see a long list of goodly amounts, together with the latest detail and on dits in your column, touching this affair.

I remain, yours truly, G. W. F.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Having no opportunity of studying thorough bass, I should be much obliged if you would give me the rules for accidental sharps and flats in writing music, as I am often at a loss to know whether for instance to write F sharp or G flat. An answer to this question will, sir, greatly oblige, your constant reader. M. T.

[We refer our Correspondent to Dr. Day's System of Harmony, where he will find the best instruction on Notation.—Ed. M. W.]

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Should you in your paper of this week criticise the Grand Opera at Drury Lane, on the opening night (Monday last), I beg to call your kind attention to a mistake in the name of an individual severely criticised by the Morning Chronicle, also their vindication by Mr. Clifford, as appeared in the same paper of Thursday last, that you might not fall into the same error. I will here submit to your notice my letter, or what is nearly the same, their version of it. “Grand Opera, Drury Lane.—In our notice of the opening performance at this theatre on Monday night, the character of Bucklaw was criticised as performed by Mr. Clifford; that gentleman having been suffering from indisposition, the part allotted to him was supported by another, a Mr. Garstén, as appears now in the Drury Lane bills of the day. But the mistake arose from the circumstance of his Mr. Clifford's name remaining in the bills, and no mention being made of his absence.” Trusting you will give your kind attention to this should you speak of the Opera.

I remain, &c., yours truly, GEORGE CLIFFORD.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—(From our Correspondent.)—These popular concerts, that have been established for the working class, by the committee of the Northern Mechanics' Institution, continue to keep up their high character, for which they have so long been distinguished. The entertainments of this season, commenced with Herr Staudigl; and have been followed by Mr. H. Russell Mr. Wilson, the celebrated Mrs. Wood, late Miss Paton, the Misses Smith, “The Distin Family,” and on Saturday evening last, a concert was given, at which appeared Miss Whitnall, Mr. John Parry. Mr. Blagrove, (Concertina) Mr. G. Weiss and Mr. Robinson. Unfortunately the weather was unfavourable, and we are sorry to say, the concert was the most unsuccessful of the season.

PAISLEY.—MR. HENRY RUSSELL.—On Thursday evening last, this popular vocalist and composer appeared in the Exchange Rooms. The high repute in which Mr. Russell is deservedly held in this quarter may be gathered from the fact, that, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, and the present severe depression of trade, his audience was one of the largest and most respectable which has congregated in Paisley, on a similar occasion, for a considerable period back. Mr. Russell appeared in excellent voice, and gave a number of his popular melodies in his own pleasing and attractive style. “Why don't the men propose?” was admirably sung, and called forth peals of laughter, and thunders of applause. “The Gin Fiend” was a performance which conjured up to the audience all the horrors of strong drink, and inspired the mind, as it were, with an instinctive abhorrence of the dreadful abandonment of the drunkard. The “Pauper's Drive” followed, and was given with that deep pathos which Russell alone can impart to such performances; this piece was rapturously received. The next performance was, however, one of the best musical commentaries on the morale of capital punishments. Music is a very desirable auxiliary to the cause of morality, and in the hands of one like Russell, it cannot but prove a most effective one. He is therefore deserving of the best encouragement of all, whether they be admirers of song or lovers of morality. It not frequently occurs that public support is withheld where it should be awarded. We are, however, glad to know, that with Mr. Russell the case is different. He is, indeed, amongst the most popular of the most popular of all our vocalists and he is deservedly so, and the more he is known, the more popular, we feel assured, will he become. From the rapturous manner in which his entertainment was received, we trust that he may be induced to favour a Paisley audience with another evening soon.—Paisley Journal.

MISCELLANEOUS.

EXETER HALL.—Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, one of the most exquisite of modern sacred works, and Handel's Acis and Galatea, the most divine of all musical pastorals, was performed on Monday evening by members of Mr. Hullah's First Upper Singing School, together with the following principal vocal performers:—Mr. Lockey, Mr. Williams, Mr. H. Phillips, and the Misses Stewart and Gill. The performance of Mendelssohn's Psalm reflects the greatest credit on Mr. Hullah's pupils. The chorus went remarkably well, and the band, under Mr. Willy's leadership, composed of some of the best instrumentalists of the day, was highly efficient. The pastoral of Handel was also rendered in a most praiseworthy manner, all the principals acquitting themselves in the most creditable manner. In brief the performance was one of the best we have heard under the management of the talented director, Mr. Hullah. We have not been hitherto able to afford that room to the notice of the performances, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, which their importance in themselves as efforts of art, and as proceeding from one of the most rising institutions of the day would seem to warrant; but we shall take the earliest opportunity of devoting a leading column to their consideration.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—We learn from the best authority that Mr. Beale, in consequence of a delicate state of health, which disinclines him from very arduous duties, joined to his numerous avocations connected with the great establishment in Regent Street, has withdrawn from the management of this theatre. Mr. Beale's loss, as a manager, will be universally regretted, but we are happy to state that his immense influence and interest will continue to be exerted in behalf of the new Italian Opera.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS has returned to town from a tour in Wales, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, and has now resumed his professional duties.

JOHN WHITAKER the composer died on Saturday last, aged 71.

MADAME MENDELSSOHN BARTOLDY has received letters of condolence from three crowned heads:—The Queen of Great Britain, the King of Prussia and the King of Saxony.—Journal des Debats.

BUNN AND LIND—This action is expected shortly to be tried. On Monday the special jury nominated a few days back, was, in legal phraseology, "reduced" to twenty four, by the solicitors on both sides. It appears that the cause stands the second in the paper for Monday week, and its position for hearing on that day will depend on the causes previously heard, seven being allotted for each day. It is understood that the demurrer in the action will be tried before the 20th instant.—Morning Post.

MR. ROOKE'S CONCERT.—In our last week's notice we omitted several particulars connected with the above concert, which should have found a place in our notice. For instance we should not have passed over the valuable aid rendered by Sterndale Bennett, nor that of Messrs. Balsir Chatterton and Richardson. We are pleased to learn that the Fund for the widow and Children of Mr. Rooke progresses favorably, and we beg to call especial attention to the subscription lists, which will still be open at all the principal music sellers, and are forwarded to Mr. Wilson, Treasurer to the Committee.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Last night The Messiah was performed for the first time this season. The great oratorio was ably interpreted by the executants of this society, and favorably received by a crowded audience. The principals were Made. Caradori and Miss Steele, Messrs. J. Bennett, and H. Phillips. Encores and applauses were almost wholly abstained from.

PHILHARMONIC.—The concerts next season will take place as follows: Monday March 13, 27; April 10; May 1, 15, 29; June 12, 26.—The rehearsals will take place as heretofore, on the Saturdays preceding the concerts.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—It is expected that the concerts of ancient music will commence the third week in March. The Bishop of Bath and Wells has succeeded the Archbishop of York, as one of the directors.

AMATEUR SOCIETY.—The concerts of this Society, will take place at the Hanover Square Rooms, next season, as follows: February 24; March 10, 24; April 7, 21; May 12, 29, and June 9. The rehearsals will take place a week preceding the performances.

THE NOBLEMEN'S AND GENTLEMEN'S CATCH CLUB, will commence its eighty-sixth season, on the 4th of March.

THE GLEE CLUB will commence its monthly meetings on the 18th inst., at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, and conclude in May.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY will celebrate its 107th anniversary the third week in January.

THE MELODISTS' CLUB will resume its monthly meetings on the 25th of January, at the Freemasons' Tavern, and conclude in June. H. R. H. The Duke of Cambridge patron and president of the Club, will give a prize for a song, to be sung by Mr. Lockey, with a harmonized melody for four equal voices.

THE WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY will hold its annual festival, early in March.

A NEW OPERA, we hear, is about to be produced at Drury Lane, the music by Barnett, the libretto by the successful author of "Flying Colours."

THE MESSRS. DISTINS have returned to Town, having given concerts with immense success in the following Towns. Boulogne, Dover, Lewes, Chichester, Jersey, Guernsey, Guilford, Scarborough, Whitby, Stockton, Newcastle, Sunderland, North and South Shields, Carlisle, Maryport, Cockermouth, Keswick, Penrith, Dumfries, Kilmarnock, Greenock, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee, Capar, Dunbar, Berwick, Durham, Liverpool, Manchester, Bolton, Chester, Hull, Leicester, Ashby, Cambridge, and Ashford.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator: "Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire sq., Blahopgate-st., 19th July, 1847.

"Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's 'Aromatic Regenerator,' feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Herbarry, Highgate, near London."

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

A Very Wonderful Cure of a Disordered Liver and Stomach.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Charles Wilson, 30, Princes Street, Glasgow, dated February 18th, 1847.

"Sir,—Having taken your Pills to remove a disease of the Stomach and Liver, under which I had long suffered, and having followed your printed instructions I have regained that health, which I had thought lost for ever. I had previously had recourse to several medical men, who are celebrated for their skill, but instead of curing my complaint, it increased to a most alarming degree. Humanly speaking, your Pills have saved my life! Many tried to dissuade me from using them, and I doubt not but that hundreds are deterred from taking your most excellent medicine, in consequence of the impositions practised by many worthless persons; but what a pity it is that the deception used by others, should be the means of preventing many unhappy persons, under disease, from regaining health, by the use of your Pills. When I commenced the use of your Pills, I was in a most wretched condition, and to my great delight, in a few days afterwards, there was a considerable change for the better, and by continuing to use them for some weeks, I have been perfectly restored to health, to the surprise of all who have witnessed the state to which I had been reduced by the disordered state of the Liver and Stomach; would to God, that every poor sufferer would avail himself of the same astonishing remedy."

"To Professor Holloway."

(Signed,

"CHARLES WILSON.")

GRAND OPERA.—PROSPECTUS.

It is a circumstance as unaccountable as extraordinary that in an age when Music has made such rapid progress among Civilized Nations, as not only to become one of our chief Recreations and Amusements, but to form part of almost all ceremonials, whether military, civil, or religious, and when every City of any importance in Germany, France, or Italy, possesses its own Musical Institution, that London, the Metropolis of the World, should still be without any acknowledged Establishment for the protection and advancement of the Lyrical Drama. It cannot be urged that the English are not a Musical Nation, or how is it that, for a considerable portion of the year, London becomes the universal rendezvous of the greatest Artists of which Europe can boast, who here find the British Public ready to bestow an almost unbounded patronage, as well as that more substantial mark of approval—a princely remuneration. It is believed by some that the support allowed by Foreign Governments to their National Operas is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of a like institution in England; but on the Continent, nearly all extensive undertakings, of whatever character, are carried out by the Governments; while it is well known that in England private enterprise and public patronage are sufficient to create and perfect works of the greatest magnitude without any such assistance. M. JULLIEN, during many years residence in this Country, has often been forcibly struck with this apparent anomaly, and from all the information he has been enabled to collect, and from his own observation, he believes most firmly that the simple reason is to be found in the fact, that while French, Italian, and German Operas have been occasionally produced in London, with more or less perfection, yet no Lyrical Work has ever been placed on the English Stage, with that excellence and completeness in all its branches, as would be even likely to ensure the approbation of the Musical Amateur, or to command the Patronage of the Nobility of the Land. Emboldened by the Encouragement which has been accorded to him in his several Musical Undertakings, M. JULLIEN has ventured on the task of attempting the Establishment of a National English Opera. It must not be understood from this title that an Opera, supported exclusively by Natives of England, is meant, but a Musical Establishment open to Genius and Talent, from wherever it may emanate. This is essentially the character of the Musical Institutions of the Continent; and M. JULLIEN trusts, with the support of the Public, the countenance of the Nobility, and the goodwill of the Profession, to be enabled, at all events, to lay a Foundation Stone of a like Establishment in the British Metropolis.

With this slight introduction, M. JULLIEN begs respectfully to submit the following List of his Engagements:

PRIME DONNE:

Madame DORUS GRAS, (from the Royal Academy of Paris), and Miss BIRCH, (her First Appearance on the Stage in England).

M. JULLIEN has the great satisfaction also to state, that the following Gentlemen are also attached to the Establishment, and will superintend those several departments for which their talents so admirably qualify them, viz.:

Sir HENRY BISHOP,

Mr. PLANCHE,

Mr. A. FORRESTER,

and Messrs. GRIEVE & TELBIN.

M. JULLIEN believes that the above Programme represents an ensemble not as yet combined in the arrangements of any Theatre in England, and notwithstanding the very great outlay, as well as the extraordinary current expense necessarily incurred, he does not intend to increase the Prices of Admission above those which have been usually charged to an English Opera.—Prices of Admission:

Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Pit, 3s. 6d.; Dress Circle, 7s.; Boxes, 5s.; First Gallery, 2s.; Second Gallery, 1s.

Private Boxes, £1 10s. 6d., £2 2s., £3 3s., and upwards.

As the Season will be for 3 Months only, instead of 8, as hitherto, there will be only 50 Representations, and the Terms to Subscribers reduced accordingly, viz., Stalls, 15 Guineas; Private Boxes, 60 Guineas, 80 Guineas, and 120 Guineas.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE APPROACHING SEASON.—The Theatre opened on MONDAY, December 6th, 1817, with DONIZETTI's Opera, "THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR," the principal characters being sustained by Madame DORUS GRAS, Mr. REEVES, Mr. WHITWORTH, Mr. WEISS, Sig. GALLI, &c. &c.—The performance met with the approbation of the Nobility and the Public present on that occasion.

Early in the Season will be produced an entirely NEW OPERA, composed expressly by Mr. M. W. BALFE, entitled "THE MAID OF HONOR." At Christmas, in addition to the Opera, and in accordance with the long standing custom of the Patent Theatres, A GRAND COMIC PANTOMIME, by ALFRED CROWQUILL and ALBERT SMITH, will be produced.—During the month of JANUARY, two other Original Operas will be brought forward, and the Season will be concluded at the end of FEBRUARY with GLUCK'S Classical Work, "IPHIGENIA IN TAURIS," together with an entirely New Grand Ballet d'Action.

The Theatre will be open THREE TIMES IN EACH WEEK, previous to Christmas, after which time the Performances will be given EVERY NIGHT until the termination of the PANTOMIME, when they will be again limited to Three times per Week until the close of the Season.

THE TWO ITALIAN OPERAS.

THE time is drawing near when the public may reasonably expect a prospectus of the ensuing season's arrangements at the hands of each of these great establishments. Although little of positive is known of what the managers and agents of either theatre have been doing since the recess, there is enough of rumour and on dit to authorise a chat with the reader on the subject, which promises to engross even more of public attention in 1848 than it did in 1847.

The proceedings of the director of Her Majesty's Theatre have, as usual, been enveloped in a cloud of diplomatic mystery. Travellers in far countries testify to the fact of having seen Mr. Lumley here, there, and everywhere; but his precise whereabouts, like his actual whereabouts, has been almost uniformly a matter of conjecture. Some assert that Mr. Lumley was at Berlin when Madlle. Jenny Lind was at Berlin; that Mr. Lumley was at Vienna when Madlle. Jenny Lind was at Vienna; and that ultimately, when the Swedish Nightingale rested her weary wings, and closed her pretty lips at Stockholm, Mr. Lumley also put a temporary period to his travels, and laid up, for a while, his carpet-bag. Others state that Mr. Lumley was seen in Paris, one fine October night, on the Pont Neuf, with a dark lantern in his hand, looking out for a primo tenore. But of course this is a piece of pleasantry, only worth citing as such. The reports of Mr. Lumley's doings have been numerous enough, but no certainty is attached to any of them. First, a one-act opera for Jenny Lind was secured from Meyerbeer; but this Meyerbeer has himself denied, if we are to believe our Paris correspondent. Next we were to have had the Camp of Silesia; but it appears that the author of the Huguenots insisted upon certain guarantees about the orchestral, choral, and other arrangements, which the spirited director of Her Majesty's Theatre was not ready to grant; the consequence would seem to be the sudden rupture of the treaty in the midst of the preliminaries. We are informed, however, but will not pledge ourselves to the fact, that Mr. Lumley intends to do the Camp of Silesia in spite of the composer, who may grumble as he likes, and make the best of it. In self-defence, perhaps, Meyerbeer will direct the same opera at another theatre, where his foible in respect of orchestral and choral completeness will be gratified; but against the Swedish Nightingale, the finest orchestra, and the finest chorus, and the most complete cast, and the most gorgeous and characteristic mise en scene, and military bands upon the stage, and the superintendence of the MEYERBEER in person, will (who can gainsay it?) avail nothing. As we have heard some staunch supporters of Mr. Lumley's diplomacy assert, over and over again, during the course of the last absorbing season—Jenny Lind and, four fiddlers in the orchestra, would be quite enough to draw the multitude to Her Majesty's Theatre, and make the fortune of the manager. To which we respond "Amen," without a wince. Jenny Lind, in her own person, is prima donna, orchestra, chorus, scenes, conductor, music and all; and then, as we have heard aptly suggested, the pre-eminence of her talent is enhanced by the charms of her person, and capped by the purity of her morals. What can resist such an ensemble? Surely nothing!

All we can precisely ascertain of the programme of Her Majesty's Theatre touches the personnel. That we are to have Jenny Lind is certain; that we are to have Lablache is sure; that we are to have Gardoni is undeniable; that we are to have Coletti is unquestionable; that we are to have Superchi is incontrovertible; that we are to have Bouché is inevitable. Add to these, Tadolini, who was famous before Grisi was known; and a rumour—only a rumour—of Frezzolini Poggi. We shall not have Frascini, and we cannot rely upon the assistance of Made. Solari and Dai Fiori. The ballet will be as grand as ever. Cerito, Rosati, Marie Taglioni, and last and best, CARLOTTA GRISI, will again be with us. Taglioni is very doubtful, and Lucile Grahn out of the question, since Rosati has usurped her place—which we state with anything but satisfaction. About the male dancers, except Perrot, we know nothing, and care less; suffice it that Perrot will once more, and for the last time, direct the ballet; and as was the case last year, will be preceded by Paul Taglioni, whose merit is to be the father of his daughter, pretty pouting little Marie. In the ballet, therefore, rivalry is altogether impossible. The band, with some few exceptions, will be entirely new; let us hope that it may be better than the last. Balfe remains conductor—a fortunate thing for the manager, to whom he rendered, in 1846-7, such inestimable services. Mr. Lumley remains director, and M. Maretzek diplomatist, chargé d'affaires, and master of the choruses. Mr. Marshall rests at the head of the scenery department, upon which we may congratulate all concerned; and Made: Couperie will continue to superintend the costumes, and organise the throwing of bouquets to Jenny Lind and Rosati—upon which we hardly know whether we may congratulate all concerned. MM. Escudier, of La France Musicale, will persist in the assumption of the Paris agency, and act as the common sign-post for manager and artiste. M. Fiorentino, of the Constitutionnel, will persist in maintaining his neutrality, and act as a sign-post to neither.

The theatre will be cleaned, because it wants it; but it will not be renovated, because it does not want it. Mr. Nugent will be at his old post, which will be welcome intelligence to those who have experienced his invariable politeness and attention.

All these things may be relied upon, albeit we have seen no programme, nor the shadow of one, either in MS. or in print. Meanwhile, we wish a prosperous season to Her Majesty's Theatre, and shall be always ready with the quid pro quo for a gallery stall, whenever there is anything that demands our attendance, as critics and recorders; on other occasions, we shall feel obliged to any friend who exults in a box, if he will give us a place in it, or to any one who has a stall to throw away, if he will exercise his liberality on our persons.

When the prospectus appears, we shall be enabled to say more. Need we insist that, like Fiorentino, we maintain that position of neutrality which nothing could shake last year—not all the noise about Jenny Lind, on one side, nor all the enthusiasm of our collaborateur, D. R., on the other.

And now a word or two about Covent Garden. The resignation of Mr. Beale is well known and unanimously deplored; but it is comfortable to state that, long before his retirement, he had made all the arrangements for the coming season, the prospectus of which will doubtless appear in due time. Par parenthèse—the last step of Mr. Beale, previous to his abdication, crowned his retreat with glory; need we say, that we allude to the free loan of the magnificent theatre and its stores of resources for the use of the managers of the Shaksperian fund? We have heard that a testimonial is getting up, which will be signed by all the artists of the Royal Italian Opera, expressing to Mr. Beale their strong sense of his manly, upright, and honorable conduct—his courteous demeanour—his gentlemanly manners—his strict and unswerving justice, without prejudice to persons—his managerial talents, at once solid, brilliant, and useful—and concluding with expressions of lively, heartfelt, and unanimous regret at his retirement from the direction of that theatre on which his name had conferred so much honor, and for which his policy and general behaviour had won so much credit, under circumstances of trying difficulty such as perhaps no manager of any theatre had ever been encumbered with before. We trust and believe this to be authentic;—nothing can be more thoroughly deserved.

Among those whom rumour enumerates as likely to succeed Mr. Beale we shall only mention one—Mr. Mitchell, lessee of the St. James's Theatre—who, if he be induced to undertake the office, will leave us less cause to regret the loss of his worthy predecessor.

And now a word or two anticipatory of the prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera. We have seen nothing either in MS. or in print; what we say, therefore, which will be very little, must be taken at its proper value. Among the soprani we are sure of Grisi, Persiani, Made. Ronconi, Steffanoni, and Corbari; among the contralti we are only sure of Alboni—but Alboni is in herself a host. Add to these Pauline Viardot Garcia, soprano and contralto in one, on whose advent we may rely; and a certain Madlle. Zoya, who is coming for the express purpose of playing Maria, in La Figlia del Reggimento, and, according to all accounts, is one of the most extraordinary phenomena of the modern stage. For tenors, we may count with safety upon Mario and Salvi, to say nothing of Lavia and some "sidera minora." Bettini will not return at present; he is looking out for the sceptre, which Duprez must shortly abandon, at the Académie Royale de Musique; let us hope that the eleven threatened operas of "young Verdi," of which one of our Paris correspondents speaks in his letter this week, may not prematurely finish his career, as was the case with the two tenors of Milan. For barytones have we not Tamburini and Ronconi?—and for basses Tagliafico and Marini?—not to count the planets that revolve in the system of these sons of dramatic song. Bassini is not coming next year, but in 1849 we may expect him, with the "pupil of Pasta," about whose pre-eminence report has been so mysteriously busy. Nor can Roger, the inimitable tenor of the Opera Comique, whom rumour has engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, be expected in 1848; still less Duprez, who, according to some dealers in chit-chat, was to have played with Viardot in the operas of Meyerbeer; these assertions were but guesses, and have turned out wrong.

The orchestra and chorus of the Royal Italian Opera—good enough last year, in all conscience, for any stork of a connoisseur, for any cormorant of the stalls, (Sir Henry Webb himself), for any fanatic of Mozart—will be increased in numbers, and improved in quality, as if the numbers wanted reinforcement, or the quality were capable of amelioration.

Costa will again direct the musical proceedings of the establishment; comment upon this would be superfluous.

The ballet, even more than last year, will be cast into the shade. We only know of one engagement—Flora Fabbri, for three months. Rumour, however, is loud in the praise of some young dancer, lately secured in Paris, remarkable in an equal measure on the score of talent and of beauty—a Fanny Ellsler (we are told) with nineteen summers! We shall see—and if captivation be inevitable, be captivated; in such cases the citadel of our judgment, and the stronghold of our affection are easily stormed and taken. Of the other ballet arrangements we know little or nothing. For the male dancers, as we have hinted, we do not care a straw. "What matters it," as the witty J. J. says, in allusion to St. Léon, "what matters it, whether one male dancer dances better or worse than another?—what does it signify to him, and what does it signify to us?" Of one thing we are sorry—that we are to lose Casati, the excellent maitre de ballet, who composed Manon L'Escaut, for Ellsler, and (more-to-be-lamented) his lovely wife, who appeared in Mr. Lumley's prospectus, last year, as Mdlle. Wauthier—the beautiful Mdle. Wauthier, for whose apparition all eyes were glistening, all hearts quaking, with the anticipation of a charming slavery. Madame Casati is, indeed, one of the most ravishing persons, to look at, that ever filled mortal eye with delicious visions, that ever loaded mortal brain with the "stuff that dreams are made of," that ever made mortal fancy build castles in the air! But we are not to have Madame Casati in 1848—so let us make the best of the hope of seeing her again in 1849. Who are to be the minor luminaries of the ballet, who the orchestra conductor (we shall be glad to see Mr. Alfred Mellon at his post again), who the ballet-master, who the costumière, &c. &c., not knowing, we cannot say. We are not to have Fuoco; Jullien has secured the lively, little Sophie and her pointes.

Mr. Grieve will remain as principal scene-painter—than which no more welcome intelligence could be given to the amateurs of well painted, graphic, life-like pictures.

The theatre will be cleaned—but will the Amphitheatres be demolished, and a spacious gallery spring from their ashes? We hope yes, but fear no. Time will decide. We know nothing of whom is to throw the bouquets, nor at whom they are to be thrown.

Now, reader, you possess all we are in a condition to tell you at present. At any rate there is matter for speculation, until the rival prospectuses are issued; and be assured that the earliest information possible to be obtained shall be yours. We shall watch the proceedings at both houses with an eye that can neither close with weariness nor wink with indifference. We have now means of information both on the continent and at home. Argus with his hundred eyes, and Briareus with his hundred arms, shall be the types of our watchfulness and diligence.

PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA.

(From a Correspondent.)

THIS celebrated vocalist has been reaping new laurels in some of the German musical towns. After a triumphant engagement at Dresden, she took her adieu on the 3rd Dec. Don Giovanni was to be given, but Don Giovanni was ill, and the masterpiece of Mozart could not be performed. Meyerbeer's Huguenots was then chosen for the substitute, but the tenor, Raoul, was seized by the grippe, and the Huguenots also was put hors de combat. Finally, we were compelled to put up with the fourth act of Robert le Diable, with the shadow of a tenor—the third act of Otello, ditto ditto—and the last scene of Sonnambula. Viardot Garcia's success was tremendous; every point was applauded with enthusiasm. The house was crowded to the roof, and there were regular battles to obtain tickets of admission; she was compelled to repeat the finale, which was followed by showers of bouquets, recalls, and all imaginable uproar.

On the 9th, Made. Viardot debuted at Hamburg, in the Barbiere, to an immensely crowded house. The cavatina, "Una voce poco fa," was encoired, but as she was going to introduce several morceaux in the lesson scene, Madame V. declined to respond to the demand; she was several times recalled, however. The duet, "Dunque io son," produced a furore. In the singing lesson Madame V. introduced the "Contrabandista," the "Calezera," "Riqui riqui," and, to wind up, the finale to Cenerentola, the andante of which was redemanded, as were also the variations, but she only repeated the latter. In short a more complete fanaticism was never created by an artist. At the end of her Hamburg engagement, Viardot Garcia goes to the Royal Theatre at Berlin, where she is engaged for three months.

A Treatise on the "Affinities" of Gothe,

IN ITS WORLD-HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE,

DEVELOPED ACCORDING TO ITS MORAL AND ARTISTICAL VALUE,

Translated from the German of Dr. Heinrich Theodor Rötacker,

Professor at the Royal Gymnasium at Bromberg.

THE merely retarding element of the epopee, or the romance, differs from the episode in this—that in the former, besides an internal connection of the thought and view with the idea of the work of art, there is also visible an external link with the acting personages and the events, whereas in the episode this is altogether wanting. The episode has, therefore, for its union with the whole only the internal affinity of the idea, so that, if it is severed from the rest, we completely retain the whole cause of the development; but, at the same time, if the episode be of the right kind we deprive ourselves of the internal relations of thought, which not unfrequently bring forth the purest æsthetical effects, and which also by the feelings and views which they awaken, contain an element of progress.

At a moment when, through the existence of the child, the breach in domestic life seems, to a superficial observer, to be hastening to its cure, we are met by two figures in the persons of the lord and his companion, who, while they are but little familiar with the internal relations of the family, in the course of their conversation touch unconsciously upon points which awaken troubled recollections and painful feelings, and by the state of feeling which they call forth against their will, force us to the painful certainty that an incurable malady is here hidden beneath a deceptive veil, and tends to the destruction of its vessel.

The poet has not missed giving us a lively picture of the apparently becalmed mind with which, after the birth of the child, the individuals appear to be blessed. Charlotte through this boy obtains a new relation to the world and her property, her old activity revives, and in this state of joy she pictures to herself a possible union between Ottilia and the Captain, she abandons herself to cheerful contemplations on the vicissitudes of fate, in which she sees nothing like a daemonic power, but one which grants us our wishes, after a fashion of its own, to be able to give us something beyond our wishes. Delighted with the noble prospect which is opened to her from the new building, she at once resolves to accelerate its completion. A brisk activity develops itself, and the pleasure of this productive activity is enjoyed by Charlotte and Ottilia in common. The kindly mood seems heightened by the arrival of the lord and his companion. By the side of these guests, they stray through the park, which visibly derives advantage from the lord's remarks. The interest in immediate objects is revived in the ladies—they hold intercourse with each other, as though the most central mood resided in their circle.

But what a flimsy veil this is short cheerful interest! How now do we perceive beneath it the deep wound, which offers to us a sight the more disgusting, because it has been long withdrawn from our sight. Here also the æsthetic effect rested on the contradiction (exhibited without effort) between the external appearance, and the internal reality, which is now first brought forward, if indeed it is only in the remotest degree that notions are awakened which are involuntarily connected with the peculiar feelings of the parties and turn the glance inwards.

In the effects accidentally produced on the two ladies by the lord's accidental remarks, the contrast of their individuality and peculiar constitution of mind is most forcibly exhibited. While Charlotte, partly through her intercourse with the great world has grown accustomed to the contre-temps and accidental wounds that may be inflicted in the course of conversation, partly through the moral clearness she has attained after subduing her passion, feels no particular pain; Ottilia's heart on the other hand suffers the acutest anguish. To characterize this it is an important feature that the apology for "homelessness," which we hear from the mouth of the lord, who praises that condition as the happiest, brings before the soul of Ottilia the most lively image of Edward, who is restlessly contending with danger and difficulty, and fills her with a pain hitherto unknown. From this we learn how the homeless, wandering friend is ever floating before her; how all her views are all collected about this one centre, and by that centre alone are attracted and sustained. Such features produce an effect so extraordinary, because by them the whole past situation, the invisibly progressing passion suddenly becomes illumined, and the tragic wound for the collision is not a little heightened.

To heal the wound, which he has observed in the course of conversation, the lord proceeds to the narrative of the novel, which is here introduced into our work. While in the previous conversations of the lord and the ladies only a retarding element has shown itself, in which the direct progress of the action is impeded, but at the same time an immediate relation to the acting individuals is retained, so in the following episode every external connection with the work is broke off, and nothing is left as a result but the tone of mind and view, which alone works upon the internal sense and by that alone can be apprehended. He whose mind cannot perceive and produce in himself those views, which rest in the affinity of thoughts, and thus form themselves according to a certain necessity, might without offence regard the filling episode as a mere non-essential addition. Let us endeavour to develope, in a few words, the æsthetic effect of our narrative.

If we are to give, in a word, the internal connection of the novel with our work of art, we perceive in it, that the thorough victory of Elective Affinity as the result of various changes and contests is made plainly conspicuous. Between two excellent young creatures, destined by their parents for each other, at an early age, appears the strongest repugnance, which is even heightened to rage; the mutual position separates our obstinate antipodes; the girl matured to a beautiful virgin is treated with the most refined attention by a young man, eminent in every respect by position and property, and is destined to be his future wife by the habit of his society, and the opinion of the world, which has often designated her as the bride of so hopeful a suitor. A quiet goodwill was the basis of the whole relation, to which she carelessly and cheerfully resigned herself, and in this perceived a guarantee for future happiness. The former adversary who is now new-formed into a handsome youth, comes back, and by his whole appearance, so fetters the girl's mind, that her feelings are soon heightened into an immediate passion, in which death is welcome to her as a release from an existence which has missed its aim and is completely torn. In the presence of the beloved one the release from life is to take place, that the image of the girl destroyed by his coldness, may for ever be impressed upon his soul. The sight of the beautiful maiden, who devotes herself to a certain death in the waves, and has pointed him out as the cause of her desperate resolution, calls forth all his strength. With strong arms he carries his lovely prey ashore, and at that moment, a passion hitherto concealed in him is revealed, and dispals the scruples of both. As he has rescued her from the death, which she preferred to a life without him, he thinks he has a claim to be preferred before that of any of the living. A right so acquired is sanctioned by the parents with their blessing, which they can hardly refuse to a pair destined for each other by a higher ordination.

Even in these individuals, [from the very beginning of their mutual relation, is shown the power of an Elective Affinity, which indeed, in the childish years of our couple, appears in the disguised form of hate, while however, according to the poet's fine expression, a dark acknowledgment of internal worth lay at the foundation of this hostile feeling. As there is no greater mystery than love and hate, so does this mystery exhibit itself here. For that dark impulse towards an unmeasured recognition of the kindred being, which, before it became conscious of its own character, aimed at an annihilation of the subject, afterwards manifests itself as the most unbounded passion, which will annihilate itself when the possession of its object seems denied. This perfect resignation is rewarded; a higher ordination of things brings to light the secret of love between kindred beings, which in some form or other, has manifested itself from the beginning, and attains for it the most perfect victory over the claims which have been recognised by fancy alone.

Here love, which has staked even life, triumphs over every obstacle and maintains the majesty of Elective Affinity against all other well acquired rights. A female, being almost exposed by many circumstances and errors to the sad lot of a life which has entirely missed its aim, saves for herself, by a bold resolution, an existence which she has nearly lost, and thus secures for her beloved an inevitable repentance, as to the delusion in which he has been placed as to his own feelings.

The series of views forcing itself out of the narrative with something of compulsion necessarily affected to the most painful degree, the ladies who heard it, because their own lot, so completely opposite, was brought before them. No beneficent deity revealed to Edward and Ottilia, when Charlotte first brought them together, the secret of their Elective Affinity. It is not till a perfectly completed moral position prohibits the passionate feeling of both, that this affinity raises in bitter irony its voice, which will not again be hushed, and yet which cannot—like the girl's cry for aid—find a hearer. Thus in the present narrative, Charlotte and Ottilia look at their own situation, as it were, objectively. And if the former, by the happily solved allusion, to which the girl in the novel resigned herself, by admitting the bridegroom's suit, is painfully reminded of that illusion of her own, which once connected her with Edward in a manner quite similar, so can Ottilia, with silent envy, regard a destiny which has attained for kindred hearts a victory over all obstacles—a victory for which she likewise would readily encounter the peril of death.

But a completely pure voice also tells them that in that case there was no substantial perfected relation to silence passion, as there was in their own. Therefore, through that question, which was cited in the first chapter—("Why am I involved in relations, which, in my consciousness, I cannot make, and from the moral power of which I cannot free myself?")—they are destined to sustain a sorrow, which in them, as in us, points to an absolute solution of their discordant fate. As therefore, on the one hand, the episode awakens in the two individuals the feeling of a contrast with their own lot, so it at the same time excites the tragic tone of mind, which in an enigmatical existence points to the absolute unveiling of the eternal laws. Thus the episode has at the same time produced the proper turn for the catastrophe, which is now hurried on, and prepares our minds for a shocking result.

SONNET.

No. LXIV.

THERE seems to be a fount of bitterness
Conceal'd within my heart, which sometimes lies
Tranquil and harmless, but will sometimes rise,
And overwhelm me with its black excess.—
Then all things round me wear an alter'd dress;
And so distorted pass before my eyes,
I scarcely knew them in their wond'rous guise,—
And fain would curse, where I am wont to bless.
Then heed me not; when the dark waters gush
From the abyss, let them pursue their course,
And rage, and boil,—they will subside at last.
For in these moments I could wildly crush
The things I love the most, with demon force,
And with mad joy;—but all is quickly past.

ALBONI AT THE OPERA ITALIEN.

IN accordance with the promise intimated in our Journal of last week, we return to the quotations from the French papers, on the all-absorbing topic of Alboni's début and reception at the Theatre Italien, in Paris. The great success of the artist in the French capital, must be highly gratifying to the English public, who, the moment she had been heard in this country, without prestige, puff preliminary, or claqueism, acknowledged her to be the most consummate artist, and the most wonderful vocalist, of any singer who had debuted since Grisi. We shall not presume to say that the Parisian public was guided in its estimation of the singer, only by the favor she had received at the hands of a London audience,—for what public could hear the inimitable contralto, and not be dazzled and enraptured?—but it cannot be doubted that the success she obtained amongst us awakened the curiosity of the Parisians, and determined them to exercise the strictest justice towards her, and not suffer themselves to be infected with the disease so prevalent of late in the British Isles, entitled the music-mania or entersimus, as Byron called it. No doubt they had the best possible reasons for their caution. A severer and more decided audience, we believe, never assembled inside a theatre, than that which crowded the salle of the Theatre Italien, on the night of Alboni's first appearance, and we are satisfied, that had not the singer obtained the greatest possible success, her début must have amounted to a failure. The entire audience, self-constituted, presided as her judges, and made themselves her witnesses and her jury. But Alboni dared the strictest investigation, confronted the imperious court with a look that awed its undelimited authority, treated with disdain her puny (puisse) judges, laughed at her jury, and commanded their verdict. Certainly, they were not slow in giving it, but Alboni could hardly thank them for it. Alboni appears to have wrought a complete revolution in the Italian Opera, at Paris. First she stirs up M. Vatel, and makes him pay a little attention to the production of his operas; next, she awakens Grisi from a long lethargic slumber, into which the frigidity of the auditory at the Italiens appears to have lulled her; thirdly, she infuses fire even into Coletti; and lastly, she frights the aristocracy of the theatre from its listlessness and apathy, and converts it into a mob as excitable as one appertaining to the Champs Elysées on a fête day. Yet, all this is done in the most legiti-mate manner. She appears without a single partisan in the house. Every listener in that hushed and awful assembly is ready and willing to censure and find fault; else why—oh! shame on thy chivalry, France, that would deny encouragement to a woman and a stranger!—is no hand, no voice lifted in her behalf, and she, poor, unsupported thing, left to build up a reputation, which was never built before, without the kindred and kindly-proffered help of an audience? But she did build it up, and reared it lofty and large, despite the ungallant hands that refused their assistance, and the unmanly tongues that withheld the cheering tones of encouragement. Oh! triumph of triumph for the great contralto! Oh! happiest day of a life devoted to art! She has tamed the Lernean Hydra, trampled on its neck, and stopt the hissing of its hundred tongues! She has disappointed the critics, and made them bow subservient to the fiat of an English press, and an English audience. She has obtained a result, redounding to her glory as long as she lives, which no singer, under the same circumstances, ever before obtained. Respecting such an artist, what musical journal could be silent? We shall not attempt to record all that has been said and written of this extraordinary singer, even in the Parisian journals, which, though varied in their accounts, are unanimous in her praises; but, in addition to our present extracts relating to to her début, we shall add, from time to time, notices respecting her performances in the French capital, as each and all of them must needs be invested with the greatest possible interest. Alboni is now the rage in Paris; the reaction was inevitable. She can hardly elevate herself one step higher in the temple of Art. But we are unintentionally led into encomiums on Alboni, when we were merely desirous of affording the reader an opportunity of judging of the effect she must have produced, by permitting him to peruse the French feuilletons devoted to her. And first let him hear "La Presse."

DEBUT OF MADLLE. ALBONI.

After Madlle. Alboni's début at the opera concerts, it was rumoured she would reappear there in the drama on her return from Prague. Was she frightened by the difficulty of singing in the French language? Did she fear that her velvet tones would become discordant through the mediation of our harsh consonants, and that her brilliant cadences would be lost in our E muets, which prove so rebellious to Italian throats? Or, indeed, has some unforeseen circumstances interfered, which crushed the former negotiations? However this may be, the result was, that, on Thursday last, the Semiramide was executed in a style of completeness and magnificence, the remembrance of which it will take a long time to efface from the memory of the visitors. The company was unanimous in its appreciation. Grisi, at her entrance, was received with the most frantic applause. On the contrary, when Alboni appeared, a profound silence reigned, and it was not until she had given her first song, that the bravos broke forth like a hurricane.

It was impossible to say, in a more delicate manner, "You, Giulia Grisi, are our favorite cantatrice; for many years you have made us experience the noblest sensations derivable from art and beauty; be not afraid, we shall not prove ungrateful; we shall not sacrifice you to your young rival. We shall applaud you above all, for we feel assured that you will justify our admiration before this stranger,"—and to the debutante, "Be not thou intimidated; we are impartial judges. If you be what the world have named you, show your title, and we will present the hand to you, and lead you to the golden throne of the prima-donna which awaits you."

Thursday evening proved, though many anticipated a very different result, a veritable triumph for Grisi. Never did she produce so tremendous an effect as she did front to front with her redoubtable rival. Pre-eminent still in beauty and in voice, pre-eminent in all the mysteries of her art, she became radiant, refulgent, appeared commoved by some internal mystic sway, and sang and acted as she never sang and acted before. She was splendid and sonorous; a flame and a crystal. It demanded all the intrepidity of Arsace not to shrink before this beaming luminary, and perhaps the greatest victory ever Alboni achieved, was not suffering herself to be conquered on this occasion. Even Coletti seemed to have caught some sparks from this kindling light. Semiramide was performed as it was never performed before in Paris.

What a precious acquisition will Alboni prove to M. Vatel; since, in addition to the admirable talent and the superb and exquisite voice she brings him in her own person, she appears to have restored Grisi to him at twenty-four years of age, in all the éclat of her beauty, in all the freshness of her youth, and all the enthusiasm of her art; and to have stricken fires from Coletti, who is usually contented to be an excellent singer, but has certainly no pretensions to the diable au corps. Without fearing to prove a false prophet, one may foretell a glorious harvest which M. Vatel will reap at the Italiens by the end of the season.

The influenza, by no means sensible to the charms of music, has seized upon Duprez, and strangled the increasing success of Jerusalem. For any other theatre this would be a calamity irremediable; happily feet are not subject to sore throats, and Carlotta Grisi, reappearing in the Diable à Quatre, has restored the opera to its pristine brilliancy, has renovated the appearance of the house, and replenished the treasury, as is usual with her. This rentrée was one of the most signal triumphs ever witnessed at the opera on any occasion. The continued bravos, the torrents of applause, the gloves broken in their enthusiasm, the chorus of canes, the recalls, the avalanches of bouquets, nothing was wanting to complete the ovation. Should the divine Carlotta make her rentrée every day her reception would be the same.—THEOPHILE GAUTIER.

Our contemporary, the Revue et Gazette Musicale, thus eulogises Alboni; and the praises are worthy of attention as coming from one who has shown himself no partisan of any artist.

DEBUT OF MADLLE. ALBONI IN "SEMIRAMIDE"

Nothing was more simple and more natural than that Alboni should have gone to the Italian Theatre, it was the place marked out for her; but that she should have gone there, after having passed through the theatre of the French Grand Opera, after an interval of about two months, was indeed something bizarre and extraordinary. It must be allowed, that the affair has been bungled in a singular manner, excepting as far as concerned the cantatrice, who has reaped all the advantage in honour and in money.

When Alboni left Paris, she proceeded to Perth, and returned to Vienna. At Pesth she played in the Lucrezia Borgia, Maria di Rohan, and gave a third representation at a concert. At Vienna she also gave a concert, on the 20th of November last, in the theatre An-der-wien, and obtained a prodigious success. We have seen the programme of this concert, and remarked among the morceaux sung by the Italian vocalist, the famous air from Gluck's Orfeo, "Che farò senza Euridice," which she sang, accompanied only on the piano, as Madame Pasta used to sing it, and with the same simple beauty of style, and the same warmth of sentiment. In the three other morceaux, which followed Gluck's air, the cavatina of Niobe, the rondo finale from Cenerentola, and the famous Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, Madlle. Alboni absolutely electrified the audience, and transported them to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that they encored the Brindisi three times, the music of which is, after all, simply mediocre. Who could have foreseen that this poor cantatena could have transformed itself into a triumphal song?

From Vienna, Alboni retraced her steps towards Paris, to debut there on the day previously appointed. She appeared on Thursday last in the character of Arsace, in Semiramide, and, as if everything which concerns the singer was destined to be original, not a single bravo saluted her on her entrance. A complete silence reigned throughout the house, even until the moment when the fair vocalist commenced her aria, and gave evidence of the admirable tones of that voice so powerful, and yet so moderated in its power. The silence did not endure long, and the cantatrice soon regained the applauses and acclamations to which her ear has been accustomed. However, to be exact in all things, it was not in the recitative, "Eccomi alfin in Babilonia," nor in the cavatina which follows, nor even in the duo with Assur, that Alboni displayed the astonishing power and intense beauty of her voice; but in her two duos with Semiramide, in the aria of the second act, when Arsace learns that he is the son of Ninus, and that he is destined to avenge his father's death, that the artiste accomplished her revelation, and established herself as the consummate singer she has been represented, wherever she has hitherto appeared. After the two duos, she obtained a double recall, and was encored in the aria; which was nothing less than the strictest justice accorded by the audience, who had seemed at first determined to shew themselves as frigidly just as a jury in a court of assize, and not allow themselves to be surprised into the least demonstration of favor. We know that it is often one of the manias of our good public, with whom one loses nothing by having a little patience: artistes and authors know the rest.

It is, indeed, a long time since we have witnessed at the Theatre-Italien a representation so splendid. We had heard it rumoured that Made. Grisi was afraid to sing alongside of Albani. What necessity was there for this? Made. Grisi was never more magnificent, and never received more enthusiastic applause than she did on Thursday last in the character of Semiramide, one of the most exquisite flowers of her queenly crown. Never did she produce a greater effect in the concerted phrases, which were rendered with a talent equal to her best day. The greatest artistes, far from lessening each other's effects in conjunction, only serve as stimuli to make more manifest their power and their genius. Rubini would never have sung so marvellously in the duet from the Mosé if he had not had Tamburini for a second, and for a rival. Coletti sang very well in the part of Assur. Tagliafico was more than respectable in the rôle of the grand priest. The tenor alone enjoyed the privilege of amusing the assembly with notes of doubtful intonation, and with a quality of voice which recalled a generation of singers long since lost.

One of the merits of Albani, in the character of Arsace, was her having truly the air of a young man at once proud-looking and handsome, whom a Semiramide might have regarded with eyes of envy, and might have judged capable of wielding the sceptre. We have only one fault to find with this magnificent artiste; her little mustachios, which realised the idea of a royal officer of cavalry, might have been very well dispensed with. We respectfully advise the fair artiste to forego this item of costume, which has nothing traditional to recommend it.

Albani will shortly have to appear in a new character at the Italiens,—Tancredi or Cenerentola is named. We shall then have further, and more critical notices of the great contralto to lay before our readers, as they appear in the Parisian journals.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

THE Fourth Chamber Concert took place at Erat's Harp Saloon, on Monday evening. The following vocal and instrumental programme was performed:—

Sonata in A, Op. 47, dedicated to Kreutzer, Piano-forte and Violin, Miss Clara Sterling, (her first appearance at these Concerts), and Mr. A. Streather	} Beethoven.
Duet, (MS., first time of performance), Miss Solomon (her first appearance at these Concerts), and Mr. W. H. Seguin.
Two Songs (first time of performance), Miss Duval (imitated from the German by E. Buxton, Esq.)	} C. E. Horsley.
Quartet, No. 2, in D minor (MS.), two Violins, Tenor, and Violoncello, Messrs. John Day, A. Streather, R. Hughes (his first appearance at these Concerts), and W. Lovell Phillips
An interval of ten minutes.
Duet in E minor Op. 9, (first time of performance), two Pianofortes, Messrs. F. B. Jewson and Lindsay Sloper	} Lindsay Sloper.
Recit. and Air, Mr. W. H. Seguin (MS. first time of performance)
"The Mother's song," Miss Cubitt	} Kücken.
Quartet in C (No. 6), Messrs. A. Streather, J. Day, R. Hughes, and W. Lovell Phillips
Trio, "Complaint," Miss Solomon, Miss Cubitt, and Miss Duval	} Leonhart.
The Vocal Music accompanied on the Pianoforte by Mr. Brinley Richards.
Director for the Evening, Mr. Walter G. Macfarren.

The sonata of Beethoven should only be attempted in public by first-rate executants, a distinction to which Miss Clara Sterling and Mr. A. Streather can hardly aspire. Miss Clara Stirling should have been less ambitious on the occasion of her debut; she would have been likely to make more impression in a sonata of moderate difficulty.

Mr. Brinley Richards' duet is pleasing but not remarkably original; it is well voiced, and, although Miss Solomon supplied Miss Steele's place, at a short notice, she seconded Mr. W. H. Seguin very assiduously in its interpretation.

Mr. Charles Horsley's songs are both charming and musician-like—the latter especially, which only sine inas- much as it is too close an imitation of Mendelssohn. Miss Duval sang them well, and deserved the encore accorded to the second, "To thee, to thee, my words are flying." The words of these songs, by E. Buxton, Esq. display a fine ear and a graceful style; the first, perhaps, borders a little too closely on the freedom of the Anacreontic style, but the elegance of the verses wins a pardon for the voluptuousness of the sentiment, and the thin covering which only half hides the nakedness of the prime incident, and is as easily torn away as the veil which the poet has placed upon the bosom of his Blonda. Fi dono—we are becoming Puritans! Mr. Buxton, we beg your pardon.

Mr. Calkin's quartet is an old acquaintance, and we have nothing to remark but the excellence of its performance by Messrs. John Day, A. Streather, R. Hughes, and Lovell Phillips. Mr. R. Hughes' first appearance in so unpretending a position as that of tenor, is a guarantee of his modesty, as his playing is a guarantee of his talent.

The interval of ten minutes lasted more than a quarter of an hour.

Mr. Lindsay Sloper's duet is the work of an accomplished and elegant musician. We liked it when played by the author last year, at his own request, in conjunction with Mr. Benedict, and we liked it as much again on Monday night—a proof that its qualities are sterling. It was faultlessly executed by Mr. Jewson and the composer, and was highly admired by the connoisseurs.

Mr. C. E. Stephens's recitative and air offers no point for praise, and none for blame but its entire want of character. M. Seguin did his best for it.

Kücken's song is a piece of insipid twaddle; we hope Miss Cubitt did not select it for herself. The young lady will doubtless respond, "I was encored!"—which does not prove the song to have been good.

Mozart's quartet, a mine of genius, and a storehouse of science, was well performed, but not so well as Mr. Calkin's! Mr. Day, for Mozart's sake, should have retained his post as first violin.

Of the trio of Leonhart (who is Leonhart?) we only heard the first phrase, but that was quite enough.

Mr. Brinley Richards presided at the piano with the ability for which he is known, and the post of director of the evening was honorably and assiduously sustained by Mr. Walter Cecil Macfarren. On the whole the compositions and performances at this meeting gave us little reason to hope that the society is making any progress. Let us trust that the programme of the fifth meeting, on Monday evening, Dec. 27, may be more attractive and more promising.

• • • • •

On Thursday morning, at 12 o'clock, we were summoned to the Hanover Square Rooms, to hear the following programme of untried works by the members and associates.

Overture	J. Thomas.
Song, "Yes, dear to memory," Miss Cubitt	J. F. Day.
Canzonet, "Moonlight," Miss Duval	J. J. Haits.
Duet, "How moonlight gems," Miss Williams and Mr. Ferrari	Brinsley Richards
Symphony in E flat	Wm. Baly.
Recitative, "Come, pensive sage,"	Mr. St. Albin. H. C. Banister.
Air, "Come, and o'er my longing soul,"
Terzetto, "How calm," Miss Stewart, Miss E. Turner, and Miss Duval	W. S. Rockstro.
Canzonet, "I am thine," Mr. Wrighten	C. E. Stephens.
Song, "The rose," Miss Steele	Brinsley Richards.
Overture in C.	A. Mitchell.
Duet, "Our home is the forest green," Miss A. and M. Williams	Brinsley Richards

At present we shall offer no criticism on these compositions. The committee must first pronounce their verdict; the critic may then assume the privilege of the Cour de Cassation, and confirm or set it aside; the latter happens but too often. One word, however:—the symphony of Mr. Baly, and the overture of Mr. Thomas (both R. A. M., we believe), are guarantees that the younger members have both means and aspirations. Tant mieux—but what has become of all the older members? Have they run away from the society like rats?—Fye upon them.

The following gentlemen (according to the printed circular) assisted in the orchestra, which was more numerous than excellent:—Mr. F. Eames (leader). Violins: Messrs. Betts, W. Dawson, J. Day, E. Deane, Gattie, Jay, Hill, Newsham, Newson, E. Perry, Spillane, S. J. Stephens, A. Streather, Thirlwall, W. Watson, T. Westrop, and H. Wheatly. Tenors: Messrs. R. Blagrove, Graves, Weslake, Gledhill, Gleadow, and J. F. Day. Violoncellos: Messrs. Phillips, Quinton, Guest, and Calkin. Double Basses: Messrs. Giles, Pratten, C. Severn, and Reynolds. Piccolo: Mr. R. S. Rockstro. Oboes: Messrs. G. Horton and Crozier. Clarionets: Messrs. Lazarus and Wilson. Bassoons: Messrs. W. Chisholm and Baker. Horns: Messrs. Callcott, B. Hooper, Catchpole, and Stock. Trumpets: Messrs. Harper and Macfarlane. Trombones: Messrs. Smithies, N. Johnson, and B. Healey. Drums: Mr. Horton. The trial was under the direction of Mr. A. Nicholson.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS.—(From a Correspondent.)—December 8, 1847.—According to promise, my dear friend, I send you an account of all that has occurred, musical or antimusical, since the last few days. The witty and paradoxical letters of your correspondent, D. (who has left Paris for a time), continue to give birth to rumours of excellent augury in the etherial region of that musical infirmary which it has been agreed to baptize by the name of the Academie Royale de Musique. Our magnanimous directors disturb themselves very little, read the letters of Miss Birch, go to the Italiens when they can, and to the Opera when they cannot do otherwise, enter into a treaty with Verdi, for 1848, and will not hear of any one but him. The affair is regulated, concluded, decided, and Verdi remains at Paris for the winter. We shall have eleven operas by him, or, at any rate, eleven translations, during the eleven years duration of the privilege. Next year I Masnadieri! And yet, according to some silly friend of ours, I forget whom, "l'opera ne fleurit plus depuis qu'il a Verdi."*

The grippe is playing the deuce with us all; Duprez, aux abois, abois; Alizard que rien n'étonne, tonne et detonne; Porthaut has neither the name nor the voice of a chanteur chaleureux; Mad. Julian orie ——— tres bien; but nobody sings, except the public, which leaves the theatre, humming a parody of one of the most lugubrious verses of Dante:—

"Ricordati di noi qu' andiammo via."

While we are speaking of the Opera, allow me, my dear friend, to cite some verses suggested to one of our waggish journalists, by the comique of the situation, which, it is hardly necessary to remind you, are a free imitation of one of the finest passages of our great Racine:—

"Ce superbe Ténor, qu'on voyait autrefois,
Plein d'une noble ardeur, faire obeir sa voix,
L'œil morne, maintenant, et la tête baissée,
Partage du public la lugubre pensée.
Un effroyable cri, qui ne sort pas des flots,
Des airs, en ce moment, a troublé le repos,
Et du fond de la salle, une claque effroyable
Repond en rugissant à ce cri redoutable.
Jusqu' au fond de nos cœurs, notre sang s'est glacé;
Du parterre attentif le poil s'est hérissé.
Cependant sur le dos d'un petit auteur vide,
S'élève à gros bouillons une montagne aride;
Elle approche, le brise, et vomit à nos yeux,
Parmi des flots d'écume un chanteur furieux.
Son front semble agrandir sa bouche menaçante
Tout son corps est couvert de sueur jaunissante;
Indomptable taureau, dragon impétueux,
L'ut, chez lui, se recourbe en replis tortueux;
Ses longs mugissements font trembler le rivage;
L'orchestre, avec horreur, voit le monstre sauvage;
Le public s'en émeut, il en est affecté,
Le flot qui l'apporta, veut être remporté.
Tout fuit et sans s'armer d'un courage inutile
Au théâtre voisin, chacun cherche un asyle!
Les moyens sont partis et sourds à cette foix
Ils ne connaissent plus ni le frein, ni la voix;
En efforts impuissans sa rage se consume,
Il rougit tous ses mots d'une sanglante écume.
On dit qu'on a vu même, en ce désordre affreux,
Un Dieu, qui du Ténor, pressait les flancs poudreux...
Il crie aux claquetins, et sa voix les effraie;
Il hurle... son gosier n'est bientôt qu'une plaie.
De ses cris douloureux la salle retentit,
Sa fougue impétueuse enfin se ralentit:
Il s'arrête non loin de ces tombeaux antiques
Ou des ténors anciens sont les froides reliques...
"Le ciel," dit-il, "m'arrache une innocente voix..."
Ces mots sont les derniers du ténor aux abois."

But, to return once more to the abominable compilation, which has been adorned with the pompous title of "opera in four acts and seven tableaux," and would be much more aptly designated, "opera in seven scenes, music by Ciceri, words by Philastre and Cambon"—in short of Jerusalem. Our excellent and spirituel Janin said, the other day, that this work had but one solitary advantage:—"La partition était tellement noircie de notes, qu'une puce un peu hardie pourrait y faire ses incongruités sans que cela fût remarqué."† Is not this a criticism at once slashing and picturesque; Janin alone was capable of it. Jerusalem! The very name made the good Persuis‡ afraid, when the subject was proposed to him:—"No, no," said he, shaking his venerable perruque; "Sacchini alone dare venture on such a theme!" It is true that Verdi was not a cotemporary of Persuis, or poor Sacchini would not have had such a compliment paid him. Oh, Hoffman—admirable Hoffman!—and thou Chatmurr, his worthy friend, his collaborateur, his counsellor—Hoffman, master of all of us! where wert thou when they dared to present before

* The painters and machinists of the Opera.

† We think it better not to translate the bon mot of friend J. J.—EDITOR.

‡ One of the unknowns whose names, in company with those of Beethoven and Verdi, are inscribed in the foyer of the Opera, where Mendelssohn and Spohr are forgotten.

* Our correspondent must excuse us from spoiling his pans by translation into a language less accommodating than his own.

those, who, like thyself, understand what is really beautiful in the absolute worship of that divine art, which is called poetry and music—when Jerusalem, by VERDI, was given? If, like us, thou hadst heard that incredible hubbub, springing from the complete arsenal of the instruments of copper and brass, fashioned in such sort that it were impossible for the most practised ear to detect in the midst of the bacchanal, any other effect than that of direct dissonance! Unhappy public! To listen to four acts of this infernal music! Have ye nor hearts nor ears! (The latter, perhaps, too long). And, yet there are in this world, persons so deprived of sense, so shameless, so insipid, as to dare to signalize this rubbish as “a work sparkling with energy, force and expression!”* Take an example:—A trifling passage (not phrase, for Verdi holds phraseology in contempt) for the violins tremolo, accompanied, or followed, by a high note for the flauto piccolo;—well, this trifling tremolo and this high note for the piccolo have been ludicrously qualified as the rising of the sun—and critics have been so hardy and so silly as to find parallels in Haydn (Creation), Beethoven (the Pastoral Symphony), Rossini, (Moise), &c. Such impious buffoonery is enough to make the hair of one's head stand on end;—to dare to cite these sublime, immortal, and unapproachable masterpieces, by the side of a trumpety burlesque! They must needs be unhappy beings, reduced to an incredible state of misery, who can accept, no matter for what salary, the unworthy office of applauding to the skies, of affecting enthusiasm, for four mortal hours, and smothering under an insolent clamor, the modest negative of persons of taste and intelligence—if there still be any such—who allow themselves to be humbugged by the lying representatives of an affiche, upon which figures pompously, in letters a foot long, the great name of JERUSALEM—musica del celeberrimo maestro, illustrissimo Cavaliero Verdi! Unhappy opera! Unhappy artists!

Let us hasten from the Invalides of the Rue Pelletier, and in the aristocratic theatre of the Place Ventadour, endeavour to obtain a place in the coulouir, or a corner in a box, where, perched sur la pointe des orteils, the poor journalist, the Paria of the Parisian Theatres, may render an account of the magnificent success of Alboni, in the part of Arsace in Semiramide. There, if you please, is a great and beautiful voice; there, if you please, is a great singer; in this matter, my dear friend, I completely and absolutely espouse your sympathies, and that of your excellent correspondent, D. (whose absence is so much lamented by Paul Smith, Henri Blanchard, and the loge de la commission)—which, you are well aware is not invariably the case. Yes, Alboni is une grande artiste—or rather un grand artiste.† Who could desire more warmth, more energy, more brío?‡ Such as she is, we have heard nothing more complete, more perfect in Paris for many long years. She is not Pasta; she is not Malibran; she is not Pizaroni; she is not Grisi; but she is ALBONI—and that name says enough in all conscience! The papers, the reviews, and your private letters, have all, no doubt, detailed to you the astonishing triumph of this cantatrice: I shall, therefore, refrain from enumerating the bouquets, the ovations, the recalls, that have welcomed her on each successive evening. The bouquetière of the Theatre Italien is making a fortune and has already bought shares in the chemin de fer du nord; the bouquetières of the Opera have emptied their stores in supplying her;—is that not enough?

* Does our correspondent hint at M. Desnoyers, of the Siècle, who wrote the puff which Fiorentino nobly disdained to indite?—EDITOR.

† A distinction for which the English tongue has no synonyme.—EDITOR.

‡ An epithet exclusively Italian.—EDITOR.

But, I must tell you, that Giulia Grisi nobly divides the triumph with Alboni. The Norma disputes, step by step, the vocal throne of the Italiens. Like a generous steed that has, for some time, been overcome by a lazy sleep, the Grisi has awakened from her torpor, at the first prick of the spurs; she bounds, she rushes forward—or, as Theophile Gautier says, “she is twenty-four—she is sublime!” It is really an admirable spectacle, this duel between two great singers, who fight for the sceptre of Italian opera; since Malibran and Sontag we have lost sight of such generous and magnanimous rivalry. The dilettanti clap their hands; the treasurer is in ecstasies; the director (M. Vatel—the “homme malheureux” of Fiorentino) is in the seventh heaven. “Another petit poulet, like this, hatched and nourished at the Academie Royale de Musique,” says M. Vatel, “and behold my fortune made.” Kind M. Duponchel! Excellent M. Roqueplan! Lucky M. Vatel! He has promised us Rossini's Stabat Mater, with Grisi, Alboni, Mario, and Ronconi, as interpreters. This will be followed by the revival of La Cenerentola, with Alboni and Lablache. We were to have had the Barbier, but it would have been unkind to Madame Persiani, and we must, consequently, wait till next year. I admire nothing more in Alboni than this repugnance to hurt the feelings of a sister artiste. Thus, you see, on this side of the Boulevard, all prospers; the season is rich, and we are promised marvels:—here, I may safely prophecy that the mountain is not in labour with a mouse, as in the instance of the wretched Jerusalem.*

The Opera Comique is sleeping on its ancient repertoire; the director promises that the awakening shall be a thunder-clap—an opera of Auber, with a great display of decorations and costumes, an unprecedented luxury in the mise en scene—and last, not least, Roger for the principal tenor part.

At the Theatre National there has been nothing. The public neglects it—which, thanks to Gastibelsa, is not a gross injustice.

Alexander Dumas is preparing Hamlet for immediate production, at the Theatre Historique. Yes, my friend, Hamlet! You Englishmen will start at this great name. And Hamlet too, re-touched, arranged—Shakspeare arranged by Alexander Dumas! Que voulez vous? The ridiculous is so close to the sublime. I will let you know the result of this adventure.

A thousand friendly greetings to Berlioz. Tell him that I have sent a biography of him to Germany, as complete and minutely detailed as possible, where his portrait has already had a succès de vogue. And this was not par petit besogne, I assure you:—why—ce diable homme—why does he compose so many fine things!—why he is so wild, so grand, so original, so sublime? Adieu, my friend, always yours,

D. CORFELIUS.

N. B.—Do not forget, that in the midst of the grippe, the fear of the cholera, and the unhappy condition of business, the Carnival will begin in a few days. The first bal masqué at the Opera is fixed for the 18th. We shall have balls at the Opera, the Opera Comique, the Variétés, the Ambigu, &c. &c. At Paris we dance, and we laugh, by the side of a corpse, in the face of public misery. What is it to Paris, after all—or to the corpse and the sufferers?

PARIS, December 4.—(From another Correspondent).—My dear — In promising to give you, from time to time, some news about musical Paris, I had quite forgotten the singular reputation which your correspondent D. gave me in the eyes of your readers, in one of his spiritual letters upon Paris. To justify his words, I should "know everything and everybody, the reason of everything, and the peculiarities of everybody." Such qualities would indeed be a precious acquisition for a correspondent; but alas! I do not merit the honor; for, although I know a great many persons, I know very few things—as the sequel will show.

Not having been to the Académie Royale since the concerts of Alboni, I am ignorant of what has taken place in the theatre, behind the scenes, or in the bureau of the administration.

As I rarely go to the Théâtre des Italiens I can tell you nothing further than that the stock operas lately have been Semiramide, Lucia, Il Barbiere, and Norma.

At the Opéra Comique you are aware that a new work by Auber is in preparation. Within the last few days they have revived the same admirable composer's opera of Fra Diavolo, that charming work, which swarms with delicious melodies, and offers the greatest interest in its refined and spiritual orchestration. It was sung to perfection, and obtained as much success as on the occasion of its first production. In this opera all is fresh and new—nothing has become stale—nor the form of the morceaux, nor the melodies; all breathes the verve and the grace that are peculiar to Auber.

The Opéra National is still giving Gastibelza, Aline, *Une bonne Fortune, while Felix and Le Postillon de Lonjumeau are in preparation.

The concerts are beginning. Two have already taken place in the room of the Conservatoire. The first was given by M. Wekerlin, a Frenchman, in spite of his thoroughly German name. M. Wekerlin came before the public as a man of courage and ambition; his programme comprised an overture, some vocal pieces, French and Arabian choruses, and an ode-symphony, entitled Roland, which I regret that I was unable to hear. M. Wekerlin is a young composer with a fine prospect before him; he possesses more science than is general at his age; he instruments well, writes well for the voices, and chiefly sins by the too great complacency with which he accepts the melodic ideas that present themselves to his fancy; these, with the exception of the "Chœur Arabe," a charming morceau, well designed, well written, and received with great favor, are wanting in originality.

At the other concert we had Felicien David, with a new symphony and his oratorio, Moïse au Mont Sinai, as the chief attractions of his programme. The first part of the symphony denotes a progress in the composer, inasmuch as it is modelled on a larger plan and one more worthy of a symphony than in his first.† This movement betrays a marked predilection for a composer whose premature death, alas! we must ever lament,—you understand that I allude to MENDELSSOHN. But, far from reproaching M. David for this new phenomenon of his style, I signalise it with pleasure, since the resemblance has been useful to him, and, despite of certain analogies in the manner of conducting the development of the principal theme, and in the melodic forms, it has enabled him to manifest a refined and vigorous style of instrumentation, especially in the quartet. The andante had still greater success—thanks to a theme of, perhaps, too great simplicity, and to certain effects of instrumentation purely physical, which agreeably tickle the ear; in addition to which it is composed with the hand of a master, and interests the musician by the ability with which it is written. The scherzo, which is a regularly developed finale pleased me less; the principal theme is a kind of fandango, and the length of the movement is not compensated by any strokes of genius, either in the melody or in the orchestral combinations. In Moïse there are some beautiful passages—for example, the instrumental introduction, a romance with chorus, cleverly sung by Mademoiselle Grimm, of the Opéra Comique, and a duet and chorus, interpreted to perfection by the same charming vocalist, and her admirable camarade, Roger. I hear that Felicien David will go to London, next season; for which reason I abstain from entering into details that you will be able to describe to your readers much more satisfactorily than is in my power. I have seen Meyerbeer, who says nothing about either the Africaine, or the Prophétie; but much about Le Camp de Silesie, which he hopes to hear performed in London.

The Conservatoire, you will be pleased to hear, is preparing an address to the widow of the immortal Mendelssohn, of which the composition has been entrusted to M. Maurice Bourges.*

There, "old fellow"—I have said all I have to say. I write to prove to you that I can keep my promises, at the risk of losing, in the estimation of your numerous readers, the reputation of one who knows everything. Good bye—your devoted

HENRY PANOFKA.

LEIPZIG, Dec. 8, 1847.—(From our own Correspondent.)—I have perused with great interest the articles which have appeared in the last few numbers of your valuable World, respecting the "immortal Mendelssohn." To every member of the musical profession, and every sincere admirer of the art, it must be gratifying to see that England shows her appreciation of the great merits of "the Mozart of the nineteenth century," whom it has been the will of divine Providence so suddenly to remove from this earthly scene, and does honor to him whose "memory lives, and will live in all hearts that beat with holy rapture for the beautiful, the noble, and the true." I am glad to see that the enthusiastic spirit of your talented correspondent, at Paris, finds so many congenial hearts among the brethren in London, and gives such assurance that the project for raising a "commemoration to the immortal Mendelssohn" shall be carried out and brought to a glorious and successful termination." In my last I gave you a hurried description of the funeral obsequies, as they were celebrated at Leipzig; but, I omitted to state that number three of the fifth book of the "Lieder ohne Worte" was arranged by Professor Moscheles for the mournful occasion, and performed by the band as the solemn cortege wended its way towards that church where the last rites were performed. I also stated that Meyerbeer was present at the ceremony, which, I have since been informed, was not correct. In the article you have extracted from the Journal des Débats, I think a few errors have, by some means, crept. First: It states, that "the obsequies of Mendelssohn Bartholdy were celebrated on Saturday, November the 6th," which is incorrect, as they were celebrated on Sunday the 7th ultimo. Secondly: That "during the ceremony, several morceaux of Handel were performed," which, if you will refer to my list of what was performed, you will find was not the case; but the greatest error is, that "whilst the reverend pastor (who, by the way, bears the name of Howard, and not Beerwig) pronounced the funeral oration, three professors from Dresden were occupied in taking a portrait of Mendelssohn, whose body was placed in an open coffin, having the brow

* A one-act opera, by Adolph Adam, the director.
† Qy. Are there not already two symphonies by this composer known to the public?

* Let us hope that this address will be couched in language less frigid than that of a paper upon Mendelssohn from the same hand, which appeared in a late number of the Revue et Gazette Musicale.

bound with a crown of laurel." The absurdity of such a statement is too gross to allow it to pass current. In the first place the coffin was not open, and, in the second, no one would have been permitted to take a portrait of the illustrious deceased in the church, and during the funeral solemnities! Such was not the case; the coffin was closed and raised upon a pedestal, covered with a "sable velvet pall," and decorated with palm branches, wreaths, &c. By this you will see that "the French version"—so singularly graceful and unaffectedly simple—a masterpiece of unadorned prose!—is far too learned and romantic! On Thursday evening, Nov. 11, a concert, in memory of the great departed one, was given in the Gewand Haus; the first part consisted of his music entirely, including his last compositions, one of which might almost be looked upon as prophetic of his own approaching dissolution, the words being, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," &c. I need hardly say how these works were listened to with breathless attention by a crowded audience. Rehearsals of his Elijah have commenced; it is to be performed here some time in February next. This great work has not yet been performed in Leipzig, therefore you may easily imagine the hearing is looked forward to with great anxiety. The musical public of the various towns in England, who were fortunate enough to hear its interpretation, under the direction of the mighty composer himself, and the orchestras who have had the honor of working under his guidance, ought, indeed, to be proud and cherish the memory of him, and his "greatest work," to their dying hour! An artiste of Leipzig, by name, Knauer, has exhibited a very successful model of a bust, taken after death, which will shortly be ready for sale. The price will be twelve shillings, for casts in plaster of Paris, and eighteen shillings, in porcelain. Doubtless, numbers of his musical admirers and friends in London, and elsewhere, will be anxious to obtain a faithful likeness of the departed "Prince of Musicians," and I would take the liberty, through your medium, of advising them to send their names, to be attached to the subscription list HERE, and thereby secure the best and most perfect models, which will be given to the subscribers. On Monday, the 29th ult., a concert, supported by some of the pupils of the Conservatorium took place, before a large audience, and concluded very satisfactorily. The gems of the evening were, the first movement of Moscheles' brilliant and masterly pianoforte concerto, in E flat, with orchestral accompaniments, played by Herr Michel de Sentis, from Warsaw (who, ere long, will be one of our first pianoforte performers), in a manner highly creditable to himself and worthy of the composition, and the first movement of Beethoven's concerto in C minor, given by Miss Emma Jardine, from London, who made her debut before a Leipzig audience on this occasion, and played with great taste, spirit, and neatness of execution, and elicited loud applause. Herr Alexander Winterberger, from Weimar, performed Moscheles' "Recollections of Ireland," with éclat. Herr Julius Riccius, from Bernstadt, Herr Anton Metzler, from Zwickau, and Herr Wilhelm Gertz, from Hanover, severally performed violin concertos, from De Beriot, Ferd. David (professor and music director in Leipzig), and Vieuxtemps, with success. On Thursday, 2nd instant, Mendelssohn's wonderful inspiration, "Die Erste Walpurgis Nacht," was finely performed in the presence of his Majesty, the King of Saxony. The solo parts were sung by Mdlle. Schloss, Herr Wiedemann, Herr Behr, and Herr Pögnier. The singing of Herr Behr, especially, elicited the warmest applause. He has a bass voice of magnificent quality, and sings most artistically. Mendelssohn himself, on a previous occasion, complimented him very highly upon his interpretation of the above work. To-morrow we shall have a fine concert (No. 8 of the subscription), when a new manuscript symphony, by Professor Gade, conductor of the concerts, will be performed, of which report speaks very highly. Willmers, the pianist, also plays Weber's "Concert Stuck," and a composition of his own. J. A. B.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF MENDELSSOHN.

A speechless grief pervades each minstrel breast,
Euterpe mourns in silence o'er his tomb;
No words so wild a phrensy e'er express,
As that which sheds through Europe's heart a gloom.
Yes, thou art gone! and o'er thy hallowed shrine,
Proud hearts, with unfeigned reverence, will bend;
And noble minds, that knew the worth of thine,
To deep remorse their warmest feelings lend.
As summer flowers, mown down before their time,
Are dead at noon, nor live their little day,
So drooped thy head in manhood's fullest prime,
And, meteor-like, thy spirit passed away.
Though chilling damps have circled thee around,
And Death's cold arms have clasped thy mortal frame,
Thy memory lives, thy praises will resound
While lips have power to breathe thy honoured name.
An earthly muse shall vainly strive to tell
The sense refined—the noble genius given
To thee, whose mem'ry in our hearts will dwell,
Till called to join thy harmony in heaven.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE musical societies of Dublin, of which the following is a list, have all some time since commenced operations for the winter campaign. The Madrigal Society meets on every Monday evening, conductor, Mr. Geary; the Melophonic Society on every Tuesday evening, conductor, Mr. Murphy, jun.; the Philharmonic Society every Wednesday evening, conductor Mr. Bussell; the Ancient Concert Society on every Thursday evening, conductor, Mr. Joseph Robinson; the Anacreontic Society, conductor, Mr. Wilkinson; and the University Choral Society, conductor, Mr. Stewart, on every Friday evening; and the Amateur Harmonic Society on every Saturday evening, conductor, Mr. Glover.

The Philharmonic Society gave their first concert for this, their 22nd season, on Wednesday evening, the 1st December inst., in the Ancient Concert Rooms, Brunswick-street. The following was the programme:—

PART I.
Sinfonia, (No. 1.)	.	.	Reissiger.
Quartet—"Spring's delights"	.	.	Orpheus.
Cavatina—"Quando o core"	.	.	Baccini.
Cantata—"Adelaide"	.	.	Beethoven.
Quartet—"Lovely night"	.	.	Orpheus.
Song—"The standard-bearer"	.	.	Lindpainter.
Solo—Pianoforte, "Theme, Gustave"	.	.	J. W. Glover.
PART II.
Overture—"Freyshutz"	.	.	Weber.
Duet—"Dunque io son"	.	.	Rossini.
Solo—Clarinet, Signor Cavallini	.	.	Weber.
Song—"O come to the greenwood"	.	.	Mendelssohn.
Septett—"Pull away, boys"	.	.	Orpheus.
Overture—"Italiana in Algieri"	.	.	Rossini.

Reissiger's sinfonia, in E flat, was admirably performed by a first-rate orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Bussell. The andante, in A flat, was given with great precision; and the final allegro, played with much fire and spirit, served admirably to develop the power of the orchestra. Beethoven's cantata formed an excellent expositor of its manifold beauties, in the rich tenor voice, and fervent and impassioned style of Mr. Geary. He gave the allegro molto with all the abandonment the subject demanded, and on its conclusion was loudly and deservedly applauded. Mr. J. Werner Glover's fantasia on "Theme de Gustave" was performed by him with great power and brilliancy; the first variation, especially, where the subject is taken alternately by the right and left hand, amid arpeggio passages of lightning rapidity. The finale is light and brilliant, à la Herz. This movement winds up with an admirable fugue, and the original theme coming in as a counter-subject, has a novel, and at the same time a charming effect.

The first concert of the season of the Madrigal Society took place on Monday evening, the 6th December inst. The programme comprised madrigals by Bennett and Festa, which were steadily performed by a chorus consisting of nearly seventy voices, conducted by Mr. Geary.

Bellini's Duetto, "Vieni fra queste braccia," from Puritani, exquisitely sung by Mrs. Smith and Mr. Geary. Costa's terzetto, "Vanne a colei," charmingly rendered by Miss Searle, Mrs. Smith, and Mr. Geary. Kucken's harmonious duet for tenor and bass "Oh how sweet the hills away;" and, though last, not least, Carter's "Oh Nanny," harmonised for four voices, were among the vocal gems of the evening. The concert was crowded to overflowing.

Mendelssohn's Elijah was produced on last Thursday evening, at the Society of Ancient Concerts. As I look upon this performance as the most musically important of any that has occurred here, since the production of Handel's Messiah in 1741, I will defer any further observations until next week, when I promise you a full and detailed account. Suffice it, for the present, to say, that high art never achieved, in every respect, a more decided or eminently successful triumph—a triumph that will be long remembered by those who, like myself, were sufficiently fortunate to be present on the occasion.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

LYCEUM.—Under the name of The Tragedy Queen, a comic piece, in one act, was produced on Monday, and achieved a success as complete as it was well-merited. Our readers are acquainted with the plot of the French drama, Tiridate, in which Mdlle. Fargueil made so great a sensation at Mr. Mitchell's charming little theatre. Well, Mr. John Oxenford, to whose accomplished and elegant pen we are indebted for the new piece at the Lyceum, adopting the incidents and dramatic progress of Tiridate, substituting Mrs. Bracegirdle (the celebrated cotemporary of Betterton, famous alike for her beauty, wit, amours, charities, and genius) for Dumesnil, Nathaniel Lee's Alexander the Great for a new tragedy of Racine, and otherwise metamorphosing the character and allusions, to give a colouring suitable to the change of locale, has produced a little one-act drama, which, naked as it is of startling and unexpected incident, sparkles from first to last with wit and humour of the most genial, graceful, and thoroughly racy kind. In Mr. Oxenford's version there is scarcely one word of the French dialogue; but what is substituted is of a far superior order. The piece was received throughout with roars of laughter, and the curtain descended amidst the most unequivocal demonstrations of pleasure and approval. The historical allusions, with which the piece abounds, the apt citations from Lee's bombastic play, the reference to places, things, and events of the epoch during which Mrs. Bracegirdle flourished (somewhat beyond the middle of the 18th century), all show the author's great familiarity with the dramatic records of the period, while his masterly handling of them proves his unquestionable stage tact, and his thorough knowledge of effect. The part of Mrs. Bracegirdle was performed by Mrs. Stirling, almost as well as the parallel character of Dumesnil by the charming Fargueil, and she was deservedly recalled at the fall of the curtain. The other parts were zealously sustained by Miss Marshall, Mr. Frank Matthews, and a Mr. Parselle, although the zeal of the last-named gentleman was more to be commended than his ability. The costumes and scene were appropriate to the The Tragedy Queen is played now every night, and which has given a fillip to the business of the Lyceum—which was in want of something new.

SADLER'S WELLS.—On Friday se'nnight the comedy of The Steward was revived here. This play is of Scotch origin, and was altered and adapted to the metropolitan stage many years ago. The chief interest lies in the schemes of Item, the villainous steward, to build his fortune on the ruin of his master, a cold-blooded profligate gamester, who fixes, or suffers to be affixed, the stain of illegitimacy on his legitimate daughter, for what purpose we could not very clearly understand. The character, which is unredeemed by any strength in the drawing, was committed to Mr. Marston, who however failed to relieve it of its heavy and offensive features. Mr. Younge, as the Steward, was excellent, smooth, close, and shrewd. Mr. Roskins, as the lover, and Mrs. Marston, as the Abigail, who speaks English in the style of Mrs. Malaprop, kept the audience in good humor. The play was received with approbation by a well filled house, but we do not think that, on the whole, the revival has been a very judicious one. The piece, which is of the Morton and Holcroft school, is not a good specimen of its kind. If the visitors of Sadler's Wells persist in liking these plays, they might have better things of the sort. There is Morton for instance, with his five-act farces.—(Does the reader remember Elliston and Munden in them?)—Then there is O'Keefe—better still. The comic strength of the company here is quite equal to the performance of such pieces.

FRENCH PLAYS.—We have been confirmed in our opinion, expressed last week, that the present is a good working company, and in every respect qualified to act up to the stars, as they may alternate both in the serious and comic line; we may also venture to state that, now that we are better able to discriminate, we are less inclined to qualify our praise; in the first place we make the amende to M. Montaland whom indisposition alone prevented from giving full scope to his abilities. Mr. Fechter has justified the opinion we expressed of his talents; and Mr. Josset is decidedly an excellent comic actor, with a slight touch of the burlesque, without, however, descending to the vulgar. It would be ungallant entirely to leave out the ladies: of these Madlles. Baptiste and Berthe deserve honorable mention at our hands. The selection has hitherto been good as regards the pieces. Le chef d'œuvre Inconnu is one of those little homely dramas, in the construction of which the French are supereminent. It is like a cabinet picture, domestic in its interest, interesting as regards the subject, highly finished in all its details, delicately and artistically handled, with as many personages as are necessary to bring out into strong relief the conception of the author. Here we have the conflict of two passions brought into direct antagonism—the love of an artist, a sculptor, for his mistress, and his devotion to his art; the former triumphs over the latter, and the crown destined for the living genius is placed on the forehead of the dead victim, who has generously sacrificed his own dreams of glory and distinction to the honor of her whom he loved. M. Fechter's conception of the part pleased us in many respects; his acting was natural, and in the passionate scenes he elicited much applause; let him, however, be careful to restrain over-exuberance of feeling; this is a common fault with young actors, and mars not unfrequently their best of parts. We should also advise more attention to the filling up of those little minutiae, both of gait and manner, which distinguish the perfect master of his art, and which have placed Bouffé at the top of his profession; in short we should advise M. Fechter to be his part, and nothing but his part. "Le Reveil du Lion," is the original of the "Roused Lion," now being played at the Haymarket. It is worthy of remark, that the opening scene, which, in the translations appeared to us so interminably long as to tax our patience to the utmost, loses all its monotony in the original; the cause may partly arise from the heaviness of the language too literally translated, from the allusions not understood by an English audience. M. Cartigny was in his natural element in the part of the old gentleman, he revelled in fun, when victimising Mauléon; was in every respect a gentleman in his gallant scenes, a perfect compound of the muscadin of the directory and the beau of the empire, whilst in the pathetic passages he was forcible and persuasive. M. Montaland was excellent in the part of Hector Mauléon, the modern lion, lively, animated, and sarcastic by turns, he kept the house in a roar from beginning to end. Madame Valmy did justice to the retired opera dancer—yet we regret we had not a Mrs. Keely in the part. How well Dezajet would do it! Mademoiselle Berthe deserves a word of praise—she is lady-like and uncommonly pleasing in her deportment.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

THE MENDELSSOHN MONUMENT.

SIR,—The question whether the English nation should or should not erect a tribute to the memory of the great, the good, the gifted Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, appears to me to be a matter now placed beyond the reach of doubt, or controversy,—to be a thing absolutely fixed and determined on. Not so the nature, manner, and form of this proposed erection, which still seem matters of difficulty and discussion. It is fixedly resolved that some kind of honorary memento shall be raised, but the exact nature of that memento is not so fixedly determined on. I would wish, with your permission, to offer a few observations upon the subject.

That part of the question, as to whether the monument intended to be erected, should be a bust or a full length statue of the late eminent composer, I apprehend may easily be decided and dismissed forthwith. All will admit and pronounce in favour of the superiority of the statue in preference to the simple bust; and the only difficulty or obstacle at all likely to be raised to our having the former, can be as to the insufficiency of the funds to meet the greater expence of a statue. But the English people have been rarely known to fail in acknowledging (after death, at any rate) the merits of genius, and if an appeal were made for their assistance, the monies accumulated, I make no doubt of it, would be amply sufficient to erect a statue, and a very noble statue, instead of a small bust.

Supposing, then, that the bust yields to the statue; then arises the question, which with the bust never could have arisen; whether the statue should be erected in the open air, or within one of the metropolitan music halls or concert rooms. Your clever Parisian correspondent gives his vote in favour of the open air erection, and suggests Hanover-Square as an appropriate site for the statue.

Now, I must confess, I cannot look upon the scheme for raising an out-of-door statue of Mendelssohn in the metropolis, without fear and trembling. The out-of-door statues throughout London are anything but comforting and encouraging. That we have not improved of late in this particular is very manifest, if we consider the last alfresco statue erected. Need I mention, that butt for the ridicule and laughter of Europe, that target for the jokes of the whole universe, the "Arch-Duke" at Hyde Park-corner?

It is very true, that the task of modelling the statue of Mendelssohn may be entrusted to some artist, whose acknowledged merits will ensure the correctness and artistic beauty of the work. But still, if placed in a metropolitan thoroughfare, it cannot fail to be catalogued with many monstrosities in the open-air statue line, which already stud too thickly our great city; and heaven forbid that the testimonial of this nation's respect and esteem for Mendelssohn, should be turned, as other testimonials have been, before now, to ridicule and universal contempt. With respect to Hanover-square as an appropriate site, is there not one statue there already? Canning, if I mistake not. Again, it appears to me, that erecting an out-of-door statue of Mendelssohn, in London, will scarcely seem appropriate and comme il faut. One can scarcely reconcile the idea of a statue of that great musician, from whom have emanated some of the finest compositions mortal ever penned,—the author of those magnificent works, St. Paul and Elijah,—standing in a popular metropolitan thoroughfare, midst the hubbub and racket of this great metropolis, midst the roar of business and the din of people. It would seem as though he were placed in a sort of purgatory,—as though he, who so loved, so cherished the chords of harmony and melody in life, were doomed to list to nought but discord and riot after death!

No, sir, the statue of Mendelssohn could not consistently be placed in the centre of this great city, unless under the roof of some hall strictly devoted to music, unless beneath the sacred ceiling of a cathedral, unless in some public gallery of statues and monuments of eminent men.

But there is no reason why the statue should not be erected in the open air, some short way out of London; in some shady, quiet nook, into which the whirlwind of toil and business never intrudes. Why not in one of our beautiful cemeteries, a short distance out of London? Surely, the holy calmness, the heavenly peace, the death-like stillness, which pervade these hallowed resting places of the dead, would be more in unison, more in harmony with the living thoughts and imaginings of the great musician, than the din and riot of a busy city. There it would be a sort of pious pilgrimage, a holy, much-loved duty, to jog on to the peaceful spot where England had raised her tribute of earnest admiration, passionate love, heart-felt respect for that man, who never had an equal, a rival, or an enemy—who loved and was loved by all—the mighty inspirations of whose genius must last to eternity—and there, to linger near the monumental marble, indulging in the soul-elevating thoughts, the tearful, soul-searching reflections, which must rush spontaneously to the heart as it ponders o'er his heavenly genius, his meteor-course, his premature decay! Or, why not erect the monument in some shady grove or avenue in our public parks or gardens? Why not in some leafy spot in Kensington-gardens, for instance? These places, which I have mentioned at random, and, doubtless, many better may be suggested, appear to me infinitely more appropriate than any London street, or public thoroughfare. Though I could wish to say a few more words upon the subject, I dare not any longer venture to presume upon your patience, your time, or your valuable space. But, I hope the importance of the subject of my letter may excuse both my prolixity and my intrusion. You, I feel assured, will concur in the wish that the funds for the testimonial may prosper and accumulate, and that a monument, worthy of the great name it will bear, may speedily be erected, and long remain a token of England's respect, love, and admiration for every child of genius, let him be born in what clime he may.

I am, sir, in some haste, your obedient servant,

E. D. C.

Dec. 14, 1847.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I take the liberty of referring your attention to the letter which I had the honour of writing to you on the 1st of September last, and for the insertion of which, in No. 36 of your valuable Journal, I have to return you my most sincere thanks. You will readily conceive my surprise and vexation, when, on going to the Union public-house, for the express purpose of hearing this grand harpist, I found that he had discontinued playing there; for what reason I know not, though, I am given to understand, that he considered the patronage he received too small. Being totally unacquainted with his address, you will see my inability of writing, apologising through your kind medium, to some gentlemen, who, influenced no doubt by the same feelings as myself, have called at the Union public-house, in the Bagnigge Wells-Road, to hear him play, and not finding him there, were so confiding in my statement of his merits, as to leave their cards, which, unfortunately, the careless bar-keeper has lost. To these kind-hearted gentlemen must I tender at the same time my apologies and thanks; apologies for the disappointment they met with, through the non-appearance of the harpist, and thanks for the trouble they have taken in order to hear him play. By dint of great trouble, I have, however, become acquainted with his address, which is, W. P. THOMAS, 3, Ave Maria-Lane, Ludgate-Hill. I have requested him to attend at the Union public-house, on Tuesday evening next, and he has promised to be there from nine until twelve o'clock, and also on any other Tuesday evening, if it be the wish or desire of any lady or gentleman. I beg leave to inclose a copy of my letter, referred to at the commencement of this, in order to save you any trouble or inconvenience you may be put to, by having to refer to the identical number in which it was inserted, and I beg leave to subscribe myself,

Your obliged, obedient servant,
13, Charles-street, 15th Dec. 1847.

SONGS IN HAYDN'S CREATION.

H. E. will feel obliged to the Editor of the Musical World, recommending him some songs for the "Creation." His voice is a barytone, but cannot easily reach beyond E. If the Editor cannot do so, perhaps some of H. E.'s fellow subscribers will oblige him.

[Our columns are open to any subscriber who has the time to reply to our correspondent's question?—Ed.]

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday the annual concert of Miss Keale took place at the Concert Hall, Lord Nelson-street, in this town. The attendance, without being crowded, included some of the first families in the town. A duet by Thalberg, played by Miss Keale and a young lady, her pupil, whose name did not transpire, delighted while it captivated all present. Miss Keale's pupil will take her place at no distant day amongst the most accomplished instrumentalists. The singing of Mr. Weiss was highly relished. Miss Emily Grant carried away the applause by her finished singing and tasteful execution. Her favourite song, "Sound the pibroch," is quite a gem. There are few lyrical compositions more inspiring, the echo notes show the accomplished vocalist, while the spirit which she throws into the air smacks pleasantly of the practised actress. Signor Giulio Regondi played two or three solos on the concertina and the guitar. Over both instruments he exercises perfect mastery.—Liverpool Chronicle.

HODDSDON.—(From our Correspondent).—Miss Steele gave a very excellent musical entertainment at the Literary and Scientific Institution, on Monday last, which was (of course taking into consideration the influenza) responded to very agreeably by the most respectable families of the place. The artists comprised in addition to the beneficeaire, Miss A. Hill, Miss E. Mounsey, Mr. Bodda and Mr. Watson. The programme was very judiciously selected, and proved highly satisfactory to the audience, who manifested by abundant applause their unanimous acknowledgements. The principal features therein were Proch's "Think of me" sung by Miss Steele, and Kalliwoda's "Home of Love," sung by Miss Hill, both with concertina accompaniments, very artistically executed by Miss E. Mounsey. Miss Hill, who has much improved in style and power since we last heard her, gave the "Carlo Nive" from Verdi's Masnadieri, with a boldness and energy, far surpassing the merits of the composition. The gem of the Concert was decidedly the "In si barbara" from Semiramide sung by Miss Steele. The deep pathos, sweetness and excellent style with which it was rendered, called forth a most vehement encore, and even very narrowly escaped being redemanded. Mr. Bodda sang a Hungarian dancing song, by Miss A. S. Mounsey, which richly deserved a similar compliment, the singer having done ample justice to a talented composition. In the petit rien, of Jeannette and Jeannot, he however obtained what the first essentially merited. Mr. Watson performed a charming solo on the violin, by Sainton, which elicited abundant applause, and between the first and second parts of the concert a request from several of the audience was made to him to repeat his performance, which consisted of an air, with variations, by Mayseder, which was also received with flattering marks of approbation. The duet from the Semiramide sung by Miss Hill and Miss Steele, was greatly relished and narrowly escaped repetition. The popular ballad of Knight "Beautiful Venice" was loudly redemanded, but the fair beneficeaire responded by singing "Comé off to the moors," the change proving highly satisfactory. The programme not being too long, they added very much to the spirit with which it went off, the general opinion at the conclusions being that of most decided gratification with the evening's amusement.

DEVIZES.—The musical entertainment given by Mr. H. Phillips and Mr. Land, at the Town Hall, was attended by a large and fashionable audience. Mr. H. Phillips was in splendid voice, and we never heard him sing with greater power and effect: he was encored in his charming old ballad "Shall I wastyng in despair," but substituted one of his later compositions entitled "There's a New Year coming," which was enthusiastically received. Mr. Land was deservedly much applauded, especially in the Scottish songs, "Lizzie Lindsay," "Auld Robin Gray," and "The Lass O' Gowrie," in the latter of which he was rapturously encored. His voice is a tenor of beautiful quality, and his pure style of singing was greatly admired. In concluding, Mr. Phillips thanked his audience for the approbation they had manifested, and announced, amidst much applause, his intention of revisiting Devizes in the Spring. Since Mr. Wilson's first appearance here, no similar entertainment has been received with more unequivocal marks of pleasure.

BRIGHTON.—(From a Correspondent).—MADAME CATHINKA DE DIETZ'S CONCERT.—This Pianist gave a concert here last week; it was attended by a most fashionable audience, which included several officers of the 16th Lancers, in full uniform. The band of the 16th Lancers performed a piece at the commencement of each part, most wofully out of tune. Madame de Dietz played with considerable execution two morceaux of her own and Albert's joint composition. Signor Alessandro Galli sang two arias in excellent style, and also took parts in duets by Donizetti and Mosca, with Madame Santa Croce. Baerwolf's "When the post horn gaily sounding" (Post horn klang) was sung with great brilliancy and excellent taste by Madame Santa Croce; the obligato violoncello accompaniment to which, was artistically rendered by Herr Haussmann. The concert had the merit of ending at an early hour, so that the audience were perfectly satisfied and not fatigued. Herr Kuhe was the accompanist at the Pianoforte.

LANCASTER.—Mr. Templeton's music entertainment took place in the Music Hall, on Wednesday, the 8th inst., before a highly respectable audience. His anecdotes are good, and his songs, to the true lover of national melodies, always welcome. Mr. Templeton has shown great judgment in the selection of an accompanist in the person of Mr. Blewitt, who, for many years, was director and composer to the Theatre Royal, Dublin: The entertainment commenced with Dibdin's song "The Lads of the Village," which Mr. Templeton gave with great feeling. The next song was Shield's "Tell her I love her." The next was "Sally in our Alley," by Henry Carey, which was given with great feeling. This was decidedly encored. The scene, "All is lost now," from La Sonnambula, "They may rail at this Life," "The Minstrel Boy," and "The meeting of the waters," left nothing to be desired. "The brisk young lad," was humourously given, and encored. The entertainment concluded with Mr. Blewitt's amusing song, "The merry little fat grey man," which set the audience in roars of laughter. Mr. Blewitt's accompaniment throughout the whole of the evening, merits the highest praise. Mr. Templeton has promised, ere long, to revisit this town.—Lancaster Gazette.

CONCERTS.

PRIVATE CONCERT.—HANOVER-SQUARE ROOMS.—(From a Correspondent).—An evening concert, under the direction of a party of amateurs (of whose liberality we have had cause to make favourable mention on a previous occasion) was given at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Wednesday evening, in the presence of a brilliant audience. The vocalists were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Dolby, and Miss Ransford; Messrs. H. Phillips, Locket, and John Parry. The instrumentalists consisted of Mr. Joseph Richardson, Mr. Frederick Ghatterton, and Mr. Brinley Richards, who also officiated as conductor. Amongst the pieces encored were songs by Madame Caradori, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Locket, Phillips, and John Parry. Miss Ransford gave a new song, with considerable expression. The concerted pieces went as most things do when they have not been sufficiently rehearsed. We must, however, except the "Alla Trinita." Mr. Richardson played his own variations on "Rousseau's Dream." The harp solo consisted of a grand fantasia, by Mr. Chatterton; and Thalberg's "Mosé" afforded Mr. Richards an opportunity for the display of his command over the pianoforte.

PRINCESS'S CONCERT ROOM.—On Tuesday evening, a concert took place here for the benefit of a professional lady (Qy. who?) when a good selection of music was performed by a number of popular favorites, including Miss Sara Flower, Miss Cubitt, Miss Bassano, Messrs. Frederick Chatterton, Bodda, &c. Among the performers were two small debutantes. A young lady, eleven years of age, sung a song of A. Lee's. She has a sweet voice, and sings with correct taste. The other youthful debutante was Miss L. Marshall, a sister (we presume) of the Miss Marshall, late of the Royal Academy. The young lady, who was encored, sings like an apt and intelligent pupil, and does credit to her fair instructress—Miss Sara Flower. As we left at the end of the first act, we missed a piano-forte fantasia, by another debutante, and daughter of the Beneficeaire. We must not omit Miss Bassano's interpretation of a very sweet ballad of Walter Maynard's, "I strive to forget thee." The simplicity and fine natural feeling with which this lady can, when she chooses, invest her cantabile singing, were never more effectively shown than on the present occasion. She has not yet, however, entirely rid herself of a fault which has already been the subject of remark,—a propensity to hold the suspended notes of the closes to too great a length. Once fairly rid of this defect, her interpretation of music of this kind would be perfect. The attendance was but thin.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE OLYMPIC THEATRE will open on Monday, the 27th instant, under the management of Mr. Davidson, with a strong and effective company. The performances will be devoted principally to the legitimate drama. Among the chief engagements, we may mention Mr. Stuart, from the Haymarket; Mr. G. V. Brooke, Mr. H. Holl, Mr. Davidge, Mr. Conquest, Mr. L. Thompson, and the Mesdames Stuart, Glyn (pupil of Mr. Charles Kemble), Gordon, Brougham, Bromley, &c., &c. The Theatre has been entirely re-modelled and re-decorated.

THE CHORAL HARMONISTS] commence their sixteenth season on Monday next at the London Tavern. We gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity to recommend this excellent Society to all amateurs, offering them the means of hearing pure classical music, always well performed. The selection will consist of Handel's Coronation Anthem, "The King shall reign;" Mozart's glorious, though rather hackneyed "Twelfth Mass." Mendelssohn's overture to the "Isles of Fingal," and the overture and selections from "Der Freischütz." Monsieur Robert, the first tenor to the King of Holland, is engaged, and the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Seguin will complete the list of vocalists.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION CONCERTS, EDINBURGH.—These concerts, which have given such general satisfaction for several years past, are announced for the season. The Association will, we understand, perform a number of those classical compositions which have created such a sensation on the Continent during the last year, besides repeating many of the works of Beethoven and other great masters. We are confident, that conducted by Herr Durner, led by Mr. Mackenzie, and supported by an efficient orchestra, the Association may look forward to an excellent season.

MR. WILSON gave one of his entertainments at Wellington Salop, on Monday evening, which afforded much gratification to the audience, and was received with hearty applause throughout. Many of the songs were encored, which Mr. Wilson readily complied with, and sang several songs besides, which were not included in his programme.

—AN OPERATIC COMPANY, composed of Miss Rainforth, Miss Susan Kenneth, Mr. Travers, and Mr. Stretton, has been lately performing at the Theatre Royal, Williamson Square, Liverpool, in the Sonnambula, The Loves Spell, Maritana, and other operas. The second named lady is the daughter of Mr. Kenneth, so well-known in the theatrical world, and is young on the stage. Her voice is a clear and excellent mezzo soprano. Her style is excellent and she is in most respects a better actress than the larger mass of vocalists. When she ultimately, as she must do, takes her place in the operatic portion of the Metropolitan stage, we have no doubt she will be found an excellent and permanent addition to it.—From our own Correspondent.

VALUE OF MUSIC IN 1728.—It is worthy of remark that in the year 1728, a first-rate singer, according to play-house pay, which means the actual night's performance, could command no more than 45*l.* annually; whilst we have it on record that a first-rate singer (Mrs. Billington), in the year 1801, was deemed worthy of an arbitration between the rival managers, who each contended for the privilege of paying her 3,000*l.* for the season, with the addition of a clear benefit!

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Thomas Turner Esq., has furnished a statement respecting the financial results of the late festival. The total amount of the expenses was £3127 4*s.* 2*d.*, from which, deducting the sum of £2580 15*s.* 6*d.*, the net amount received from the sale of tickets and books, there will remain a gross deficit of £546 8*s.* 8*d.*; consequently each of the twelve stewards will be £45 10*s.* 9*d.* minus. Although the principal vocalists were paid nearly £300 more upon the late occasion than in the year 1844, yet the deficiency is £200 less than happened at that period, after taking into the scale the aid then afforded by a guarantee fund. It only remains to notice that the total amount of the late collections, made for the relief of the widows and orphans of the clergy, is £723 2*s.* 3*d.*, which includes a donation since remitted by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol of £20.

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator:

"Mrs. Weekley, of No. 3, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire-sq., Bishopsgate-st., 19th July, 1847.

"Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's 'Aromatic Regenerator,' feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases."

Copy of a Letter from "COLONEL HAWKER," (the well-known Author of "Guns and Shooting.")

Longparish House, near Whitchurch, Hants, Oct. 21st, 1846.

SIR,—I cannot resist informing you of the extraordinary effect that I have experienced by taking only a few of your LOZENGES. I had a cough for several weeks that defied all that had been prescribed for me; and yet I got completely rid of it by taking about half a small box of your Lozenges, which I find are the only ones that relieve the cough without deranging the stomach or digestive organs. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

RESTORATION OF VOICE BY KEATING'S COUGH LOZENGES.

Glasgow, 12th January, 1847.

SIR,—I have great pleasure in informing you of the great good your excellent COUGH LOZENGES have done me. In December, 1845, I caught a severe cold from riding two or three miles, one very wet night, which settled in my lungs, and quite took away my voice, so that I could not speak above a whisper from that time until the beginning of December last. I tried all kind of medicines, but they were of no avail. I was then advised to try your Lozenges, which I did only to please my friends, but before I had finished a 2s. 9d. tin, my voice, to my great joy, came back as of old. I am, Sir, your's respectfully,

THOMAS KEATING, Chemist, &c.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

A Very Wonderful Cure of a Disordered Liver and Stomach.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Charles Wilson, 30, Princes Street, Glasgow, dated February 18th, 1847.

"SIR,—Having taken your Pills to remove a disease of the Stomach and Liver, under which I had long suffered, and having followed your printed instructions I have regained that health, which I had thought lost for ever. I had previously had recourse to several medical men, who are celebrated for their skill, but instead of curing my complaint, it increased to a most alarming degree. Humanly speaking, your Pills have saved my life! Many tried to dissuade me from using them, and I doubt not but that hundreds are deterred from taking your most excellent medicine, in consequence of the impositions practised by many worthless persons; but what a pity it is that the deception used by others, should be the means of preventing many unhappy persons, under disease, from regaining health, by the use of your Pills. When I commenced the use of your Pills, I was in a most wretched condition, and to my great delight, in a few days afterwards, there was a considerable change for the better, and by continuing to use them for some weeks, I have been perfectly restored to health, to the surprise of all who have witnessed the state to which I had been reduced by the disordered state of the Liver and Stomach; would to God, that every poor sufferer would avail himself of the same astonishing remedy."

In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons subject to Gout, Asthma, Rupture, and other diseases, on the payment of a Premium proportioned to the increased risk. The plan of granting Assurances on INVALID Lives originated with this office in the beginning of 1824. Every description of Assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the Lives of Persons in any station, and of every age.

The two first Divisions averaged £22 per cent. on the Premiums paid; the third, £28 per cent. The fourth bonus, declared Jan. 1847, averaged rather more than £36 per cent.; and from the large amount of Profit reserved for future appropriation and other causes, the Bonuses hereafter are expected to exceed that amount. J. KOHLER'S NEW PATENT LEVER INSTRUMENTS.

J. KOHLER having brought to perfection and obtained Her Majesty's Letter's Patent for the above invention, which he has applied to the CORNOPEAN, TRUMPET, CORNETTO, TROMBONES, and FRENCH HORNS, he can now with great confidence, after an experience of Five Years in bringing the action to its present state of perfection, recommend them to Her Majesty's Army and Navy, and all Professors and Amateurs. The advantages that this Patent gives to these Instruments are—

1. All the Tones and Semitones produced by the Patent Lever are quite as perfect as the Natural Notes on the Instrument.

2. The intervals on the DIATONIC and CHROMATIC Scales are perfect, the compass greater, and the most rapid and difficult passages may be performed with a precision, freedom, and fullness of tone, and comparative ease to the performer.

3. Combinations in harmony, which never before could be performed at all by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease, and Ten or Twelve Instruments on this principle, can produce a more rich and sonorous effect than Twenty-four could do on the old principles. The harshness of tone in the former Brass Instruments is entirely done away with, and a set of these Instrument heard together, produces Military and harmonious effects never before heard.

These Instruments are now in use in HER MAJESTY'S PRIVATE BAND, FIRST LIFE GUARDS, ROYAL HORSE GUARDS, GRENADEER GUARDS, FUSILIER GUARDS, ROYAL ARTILLERY, 60TH ROYAL RIFLES, &c. GRAND OPERA, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

M. JULLIEN, mindful of his pledge, brought out a comic opera, in three acts, from the popular and untiring pen of Mr. Balfe, under the seducing title of the Maid of Honour, on Monday evening last. The first appearance of Mr. Reeves, the tenor, in an original part, and the debut of Miss Birch, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Miran, added increased interest to the events of the evening. No wonder, then, that the theatre was crowded to the ceiling, and the audience in a condition of unusual excitement. The number of debutantes, the difficulty of the work, the short time that had been consumed in rehearsal—unfortunately, the rock on which so many opera-companies split:—and the nervousness attendant on a wholly new speculation, all combined in rendering it an anxious moment for the management and the friends of the composer.

The libretto of the Maid of Honour may be traced to Henriette, a grand ballet, produced some years ago, at the Academie Royale de Musique in Paris, and subsequently transplanted to the boards of Drury-lane Theatre, during the engagement of the celebrated Lucile Grahn. The subject is well suited for music, and Mr. Fitzball has managed to preserve its incidental interest, while the dramatization is skilfully developed. As a poet, it is true, Mr. Fitzball cannot exactly be compared to either Byron or Shelley, but in reply to those who attack him on the essential point of stage tact, he may triumphantly cite the names of at least twenty successful operas that have been manufactured in his studio. As successful as any, and more successful than most of these, the Maid of Honour has an advantage over its predecessors, inasmuch as the dramatic interest progresses gradually, and reaches its culminating point in the third act, thereby affording the musician an opportunity, but too often denied him, of constructing his work on a plan wherein symmetry may be preserved, and anti-climax eschewed; an opportunity of which Mr. Balfe has well availed himself, as may be demonstrated, by reference to his third act—no caput mortuum, as in many of his operas, but a worthy climax to a work of merit, and containing, moreover, some of the best and most attractive pieces.

The following outline of the plot involves everything necessary to be known:—The scene of Act first is Greenwich, during the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The fair is approaching, and two of the Queen's maids of honour—Lady Henriette (Miss Birch) and Alison (Miss Miran)—playfully resolve to assist at the fair, and persuade Sir Tristram (Mr. Weiss), the Queen's Chamberlain, to go with them as protector. Assuming the attire of servant girls, they mingle with a crowd of those indispensable adjuncts of comfortable domiciles, and offer themselves for hire to the passers by. Two wealthy yeoman, Lyonnell (Mr. Reeves) and his friend, Walter (Mr. Whitworth), struck by the beauty of the Maids of Honour—rather set off than deteriorated by their homely guise—immediately offer them terms, which are laughingly accepted. As night advances, the Queen's ladies think they have had enough of the joke, and are for making their escape unnoticed; but Lyonnell and Walter, who take quite an opposite view of the matter, insist upon the inviolability of their bargain, and, encouraged and aided by the mob, force them away despite the angry remonstrances of Sir Tristram, who loses sight of the party during the scuffle. In the next scene, we find the Maids of Honour at the house of Lyonnell, waiting upon the two friends at supper, and, by breaking plates and other demonstrations of awkwardness, indicating their unfitness for the office they have engaged to fulfil, and their entire ignorance of its duties. At a hint, however, that Henriette possesses a talent for singing, the young men request her to favour them with a song, promising to retire immediately afterwards, and leave them unmolested. Henriette then sings a ballad about some adventurous Red-cross Knight, and Lyonnell and Walter, enchanted, retire to their bed-rooms. The scene is so disposed that Lyonnell's chamber is visible, and we are let into the secret that his heart is already inflamed by the beauty and accomplishments of Henriette. Restless and uneasy, he can contain himself no longer; but, rushing back into the dining-room, makes a declaration to Henriette, who (after singing a passionate duet with her admirer) escapes from his grasp, and retreats into her own room, carefully bolting the door. Lyonnell, discomfited once more, retires, and while he is falling asleep—courting repose by reminiscences of the melody of Henriette's ballad, which gradually die away into the embrace of silence—Sir Tristram, the chamberlain, who has traced the two Maids of Honour to the house, finds means of entrance through the window of the dining-room, and having arranged the necessary preliminaries, assists them in escaping by the outlet which was his inlet. At this interesting crisis the curtain falls upon Act first.

In Act second we find Lyonnell and Walter, in soldier's attire, having abandoned the ploughshare for the sword. Queen Elizabeth (Mrs. Weiss) is engaged in the pleasures of the chase, upon the domain of her own royal park, attended by her head ranger, a troop of huntsmen, and a body guard of which our ex-yeomen form a part. The venerable incident (to be found in Wallace's Matilda of Hungary, and other operas) of the Queen's horse running away with her and exposing her life to imminent danger, here (of course) gives Lyonnell, our hero, the opportunity of making himself eminent by saving Her Majesty at the risk of his own neck, of which opportunity he gallantly avails himself. The grateful Queen demands the name of her saviour, and as a recompense, presents him with a sword, and invests him with the honour of nobility. Meanwhile Lyonnell and Walter have discovered their innamoras in the persons of two of the Queen's ladies, whom, although masked, they recognize by their mien and gestures. The Queen has promised Lyonnel to grant any request that he may make, and the latter demands that all the ladies of the Court shall unmask, which is accomplished forthwith; but, pending the ceremony, the "two particular stars" have contrived to slip away from the crowd and effect their escape. Lyonnel is in despair, and the second act ends in general rejoicings, shared by every one but himself and his friend Walter. It should be stated that, previous to saving the Queen's life, Lyonnel had surprised Henriette, asleep, in a bower belonging to the Royal Garden, and that a scene ensued which involved protestations of love on one side and unequivocal disdain on the other. Henriette is noble, and cannot wed a yeoman—albeit her heart tells her that she loves him better than any one else in the world.

The third Act opens with a masque, got up for the amusement of the Queen, wherein Henriette, Alison, and Sir Tristram take part, as Eurydice, Orpheus, and Pluto—wherefrom it may be surmised that the argument of the masque is the classical myth of Orpheus rescuing Eurydice, by the charms of music, from the power of Pluto. Lyonnel, a spectator of the masque, distracted by his hopeless passion, rushes upon the stage while Orpheus and Eurydice are singing, and drawing the sword which has been presented him by the Queen, throws himself at the feet of Eurydice (Henriette), and threatens to kill himself unless she relent. A scene of confusion ensues, in which the Queen, Walter, and all the rest of them, take active part. But at the request of Henriette, the Queen makes a sign for everybody to retire to a respectful distance. Henriette then approaches Lyonnel, and confessing that she returns his passion, promises to meet him, on some future day, at his own house, the scene of their first acquaintance, and there to requite his affection. But it is now too late; Lyonnel is frantic, and at the Queen's order is carried away by the attendants. Henriette then discloses the whole matter to the Queen, and a plan is forthwith arranged between them, to insure the recovery and ultimate happiness of Lyonnel. This is carried out in the last scene, where we find Lyonnel at his own house, with Walter endeavouring to calm his distraction. Persuaded to retire to his chamber (the scene is the same as the third in Act 1), Lyonnel suddenly hears the melody of the "Red-cross Knight," in the accents of a dear and familiar voice. Moved and astonished, he returns from his chamber to the dining-room. No one is there but Walter. Soon, however, in response to a signal from Walter, Henriette and Alison appear, and, in their ancient disguise of servant maids, sing the couplets with which they had formerly bewitched Lyonnel at Greenwich Fair. The sequel is evident. The Queen appears; the stratagem is known; Lyonnel is restored to reason; and, need we say, the yeomen are united to the Maids of Honour, as a reward for their constancy and their pains.

Little fault can be found with this libretto, which is one of Mr. Fitzball's happiest, and though sinning occasionally on the score of improbability, and here and there on that of lengthiness, is neither sufficiently improbable to offend nor sufficiently lengthy to fatigue.

In the music of the Maid of Honour Mr. Balfe, has, with great care, and equal felicity, preserved the coulour locale, and—doubtless encouraged by the superior orchestral and choral forces, for the first time at his disposition in Drury-lane Theatre—has raised himself in the estimation of musicians by a more finished and masterly instrumentation than can be cited in any of his previous operas; unless, as a contemporary remarks, "It be in those which he composed for the Paris theatres, and in his Falstaff, produced at Her Majesty's Theatre about nine years ago." The overture is a pasticcio, almost entirely formed out of the music of the masque in the third act; except a short pastorale movement in B flat, the whole is in G, minor or major, which, in spite of the brilliancy of the instrumentation, induces a monotony of tone that it would have been easy and prudent to avoid. But modern composers seem determined to follow the example of Bellini and Donizetti, and either to write no overture at all to their operas, or to substitute an instrumental prelude that can only deserve the name of fantasia; and this, in spite of some beautiful passages and clever instrumental effects, is the case with the overture to the Maid of Honour. It was played with great spirit by the band, although those minute delicacies of light and shade to which the magnificent orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera has accustomed us, were not always apparent.

The overture over, Mr. Balfe is no more a timorous explorer in the depths of some unknown region, but a proprietor surveying his possessions with an air of conscious pride. The comic opera is the proper domain of Mr. Balfe; his inclination was in that direction from the first, and experience has shown that it was the natural field for his genius to move in. There is merit of some kind in all his previous operas—much merit in many of them—but it was not, in our opinion, until the Bondman was composed that the solid part of his talent was made manifest. We bear in mind the unexampled popularity of the Bohemian Girl, and the continental passport granted to the Quatre fils d'Aymon, drawn up in Paris, signed in Vienna, and endorsed by London; but we adhere to the opinion we formed from the first—greatly preferring the Bondman to all its agreeable precursors. And now it is a pleasant task to have to record our candid opinion that as much superior as was the Bondman to its predecessors, is the Maid of Honour to the Bondman; in which decision we, with regret, must leave the overture out of account. Pi done! Balfe—why will you not write a good overture, after a good model, in your own dashing style? We say, why will you not?—because we are sure you can, providing you will take the time and pains required.

To begin, then, from the drawing up of the curtain—the overture being laid carefully on the shelf.

The opera opens with a chorus in G major, "Lo! the bee on fairy wing," written in emulation of the ancient madrigals, but with a much better defined melody, and much less elaborate harmony and "counterpoint" than the majority of these venerable relics exult in. This chorus pleases us by its quaintness and freshness, by the skilful manner in which it is voiced, and the transparent clearness of the orchestration—chiefly confined to the quartet. The half cadence on the dominant of the relative minor, and the unprepared reprise of the subject have been compared to a similar point in the chorus, "Be not afraid," in Mendelssohn's Elijah—and with reason, since it is precisely the same thing. Go to this inexhaustible mine as often as you please, Balfe, and we shall like you the better for it; leave the modern French and Italians to themselves, they have no ideas to spare, and you have more in your own fancy than the greater number of them, as you have abundantly shewn in the Maid of Honour. After the first verse of the chorus there occur some clever imitative passages, leading back to the theme, which is repeated notatim. If you want a cut, M. Jullien, here is your chance; not that we find twice the madrigal once too many, by any means; but by cutting out a verse of it you lose nothing.

The next piece of music is a long concerted morceau, the construction and development of which display much cleverness, while the ideas, if not remarkably original, have a certain sprightly animation that forces you to listen to, and like them. The action of this morceau involves Sir Tristram's description of the "Faire of Greenwich;" the curiosity of Henriette and Alison; their subsequent determination to go, excited by the noise and jubilee heard from out of doors; and their persuading the Chamberlain to accompany them. Mr. Balfe is very happy in the treatment of such situations; his ideas flow easily, and he has the art of continuity which is the despair of so many musicians. The opening of the morceau under consideration, beginning with the entrance of Sir Tristram, at the words "Stay, bright enchantress of my fate!" is a lively phrase in F, well developed in the orchestra, to the accompaniment of the voices, in which we have only to complain of a sequential progression of harmony that much has made trite. This leads into a slow movement in A, for the gentleman and two ladies in trio—"Oh, Cupid, hear thy victim's prayer!"—which involves a graceful melody, some charming prolongations of the cadence, and a harmony by no means common-place. The trio gives way to a short chorus, in F, sung behind the scenes, "Lads and lasses haste to the fair," a vivacious gigue in the approved gigue measure—9-8. Some unimportant romplissage then brings us to another and a better country-dance tune, in B flat, which illustrates Sir Tristram's description of the choughs and gawkeys dancing at the fair—as Mr. Fitzball significantly expresses it.

"Where people dance just so—"

[SIR TRISTRAM dances awkwardly.]

The response in the relative minor to this phrase is quaint and appropriately old-fashioned. A jolly ensemble in F, for the trio, succeeds, and conducts to the reprise of the choral motive, followed by a spirited coda, in the original key, which winds up, with spirit, this well conceived and equally well-written concerted morceau, and makes a good end to the first scene.

Scene the second finds us "in plain Greenwich Fair," as Jules Janin would say. Simple and straightforward, as is the greatest part of the music of this scene, we feel moved to pronounce it one of the most artist-like and effective that ever proceeded from the pen of Mr. Balfe, and cordially agree with the intelligent critic of the Daily News, who declares that except the market scene in Auber's Masaniello, he knows nothing of the kind that can beat it. Let us briefly enumerate the movements of which it is composed. The scene opens with a bustling country-dance tune, in G, to the chorus of which the people sing, in unison (not à la Verdi), a pleasing counter-theme on the words—"Oh, what mirth and what pleasure!" A somewhat awkward progression of harmony—of the orchestra playing fortissimo,—leads to a duet in E flat, "Country lasses," for Lyonnal and Walter, who are admiring the pretty girls at the fair; there is nothing to be said of this duet but that its melody and manner of accompaniment have a strong resemblance to Auber. A prettily turned progression, however, brings us back with effect to the theme of the first chorus, and this, in turn, gives way to a lively chorus of servant girls, in C, "Who wants a servant maid?" of which the theme, innocent and pretty, is well carried out by the orchestra, the voice-parts being confined to reiterated notes, in the French style. A progression which may, without discourtesy, be termed adroit (we have as much pleasure you see, Mr. Balfe, in finding fault as in awarding praise, and we hope you may profit by our admonitions), prepares the way for a deliciously piquant phrase in G, a duet, for Henriette and Alison,

"We come, when you ring the bell, &c.," answered by an equally piquant ritornella, "Who ever heard the like?" for the servant maids in choir, to which the new management of the melodic-interval from D to G, with its harmony (simple enough—dominant to subdominant—but rendered original by its rhythmic position), gives a particular grace. After sundry repetitions of these phrases, we come to a country-dance, in C, played by the orchestra, without vocal accompaniment, while a dance goes on upon the stage. There is a spontaneity about this which thoroughly enchants us; albeit it is nothing more, in substance, than a clever imitation of the old fashioned English dances of the kind, that are extant in thousands, and whereabouts the learned and zealous divers into the depths of musical antiquity—Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Edward Rimbault, with our absent friend, George Macfarren, who has the happy art of dressing these old tunes in such an attire of sweet harmony that they become absolute music, and charming music too—can tell you, reader, more than we; albeit, six years bygone, we did manufacture a kind of critique of Mr. William Chappell's interesting and useful book, for the Dublin Review, with which we understand the excellent and fastidious antiquarian was thoroughly displeased. At all events, be it or be it not canonic, we like Balfe's country dance enormously; it stirs up our hearts with the feelings of old times—of times such as poor Shelley describes in his Lament,—

"Drowned, frozen, dead, for ever!"

We like, also, the crescendo which interrupts its progress, and leads with capital effect to the brilliant and animated solo and chorus in D, illustrating Sir Tristram's dismay at losing sight of his two fair protégées, who are carried off amidst the shouts and jeers of the crowd, by the adventurous and amorous yeomen. Nothing could end so animated a scene more satisfactorily than this vigorous chorus, with its massive and sparkling orchestral accompaniment.

The third and last scene of Act the first involves incidents we have already described in the plot:—the arrival of Henriette and Alison at the house of Lyonnal, the sudden passion of Lyonnal for Henriette, and the ultimate escape of the ladies, by the aid of Sir Tristram. In this scene we have first to notice a ballad, in G, "Behold the happy home," for Lyonnal, which is to be praised for the tenderness of its melody, for the elegance of an oboe solo, in the symphony, exquisitely played by Barrett, and, lastly, for the agreeable relief afforded by the introduction of a new figure in the accompaniment to the second couplet. Much of this scene is treated in unaccompanied recitative, in which Mr. Balfe has, nevertheless, contrived to introduce some pleasing vocal effects, enhanced by the contrast of the two male and two female voices almost always singing in couples. Another ballad, "It was the Red-cross Knight," in F, is likely to achieve the popularity that alone can repay the music publishers. It is a graceful melody, remarkable for the quaint introduction of the interval of an octave, which makes it easily recognized, later in the opera, where it acts an important part. The accompaniment is a simple harp arpeggio, set off occasionally by some ordinary orchestral combinations. In the symphony, after the first couplet, there is a progression, during which the bass ascends to E flat, which we do not like at all; it is forced and not agreeable.

The orchestral symphony in F, that follows this ballad,—during the whole of which the violins are employed, con sordina, in the elaboration of a phrase both elegant and melodious—is highly interesting and dramatic. A sentimental duet, in A flat, "I know not by what spell," for Lyonnell and Henriette, will doubtless serve the purposes of commerce, and attract the applause of fashionable drawing-rooms; but excepting a passage for the violoncellos, which relieves the otherwise uninterrupted poverty of the orchestral accompaniment, it offers little for the admiration of a musical ear. The return of the orchestral symphony, with the violins con sordini, is a very great relief, and rouses the interest which had nigh gone to sleep over the duet. The terzetto, in F, "Hush, hush, hush, by the moon's pale ray," is piquant in itself, and enriched by a cadence charmingly prolonged, while its interruption by the first motivo, with the resumption of the cadence, is highly effective and musicianly. Not less to be admired is the clever manner in which the composer has mixed up the snatches of the ballad, "A Red Cross Knight," with the dramatic music illustrating the anxiety of Sir Tristram, Henriette and Alison, to effect their escape. Through the whole of this the violins continue playing con sordini, which imparts a peculiar feeling of mysteriousness, happily characteristic of the dramatic situation. With this concerted piece, the first Act concludes.

BUNN v. LIND.

THIS case was called on at half-past two on Tuesday, but only seven of the special jury answered to their names. The plaintiff did not pray a tales, and the Court adjourned. It is understood that this case, which has excited so much interest, will not be tried till next February.

A Treatise on the "Affinities" of Gothe,
IN ITS WORLD-HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE,
DEVELOPED ACCORDING TO ITS MORAL AND ARTISTICAL VALUE,
Translated from the German of Dr. Heinrich Theodor Röscher,
Professor at the Royal Gymnasium at Bromberg.

WHERE all the elements press forward to development, neither retarding moments nor episodes are of any further importance, as we have already shown. This is the case with our work, at the instant when Edward, decked with honors after the conclusion of his campaign, and with the old passion in his heart, reappears on the scene, and in the preservation of his life, amid the greatest perils, purposely sought, only discerns a sign that he has a right to possess Otilia, whom he now thinks to gain as a reward for his toils. This view he entertains with a confidence, which awakens in us the fear of a violent decision. It appears to us very significant, that immediately before-hand, we are shown the mysterious affinity of Otilia with nature, as we are thus prepared for the development of the mysterious character of Otilia. In characterising Otilia, we have completely apprehended this mystical trait of affinity with the macrocosm, as being in harmony with the whole individuality. While Otilia thus appears properly to be a child of nature, we at the same time suspect that she will fall a sacrifice to nature, and are no longer astonished at the deep mysticism which appears on the catastrophe; nay, we look upon it as perfectly consistent with the character.

As the development of the collision proceeds with the growing passion of Edward, so does his stormy impetuosity lead to the tragical catastrophe. While exhibiting the character of Edward, we have shown the change of mind that takes place in him. His awe of the moral power of marriage is gradually thrust back by his passion for Otilia, and gives way to a sophistry of the understanding. This, especially in the conversation with the Major, expresses itself in various turns, the simple purport of which is the absolute right of his passion. At this point of view no more reasoning can find entrance, no appeal to moral dignity can be heard. All appears to lie in the hands of Charlotte; his imagination represents to him as already accomplished that, which he fancies depends only on human will and resolution, and which, as a well earned prize, he thinks he has a perfect right to claim. This tone of mind ceaselessly presses forward to a decision. On the summit of this passion, which would willingly resign wife and child to a friend, and which is therefore on the point of breaking through all family ties, he is struck by the lightning of fate, which darts down quite at the moment when he feels certain of his aim.

The whole manner in which this catastrophe is exhibited, is in every respect admirable. Never has a greater end been attained with simpler means, with such a contempt for every external motive power. The expression and the development transport us into the bosom of the most internal life, where we can hear its lightest vibration. Passion and honor, a boundless pain in the most broken existence, and again, the highest moral elevation, the tenderest and at the same time the most stubborn, against a natural force of passion which still gathers together all its strength, a binding of matter beneath the dominion of mind, which proclaims the eternal triumph of the moral mind—from all these are formed the arches and the tendencies, from which the dome of our noble edifice rises in the simplest grandeur, and invites the mind, a ready purified by the completion of the work from the dross of temporality and desire, to a devotional absorption into the all forming power of the moral mind. In this pious region we watch the sense of the poet, who here solemnizes the absolute interpenetration of the most moral beauty and the most moral earnest, and who, in freeing from sin and the bonds of matter, which he unveils, produces in us that tone, which we properly designate the christian, because pointing to the spiritual resurrection.

Edward's passionate impatience does not await the return of his friend, but takes him to the vicinity of the lake, where Otilia, with the child of Edward and Charlotte in her arms, is so absorbed in reading and meditation, that she seems to have forgotten time and hour altogether. Edward always pressing forward with restless zeal, seeks Otilia, the sight of whom excites the most fearful storm in his soul, in which transport and an immoderate glow of passion prevails. These at least carry on Otilia to a corresponding return of passion. The sight of the child reminds Edward of its impious origin, and the thought of this urges him to a wild immoral spirit of defiance, in which he regards the child as the most eloquent advocate for his separation from Charlotte and his union with Otilia. With Edward all bears the stamp of unfettered feeling, in the form of a stormy natural force.

That the whole turning point is shown in the death of the child, occasioned by Otilia's delay—this is of as great depth, as comprehensive insignificance. The destruction of this innocent creature affects all the guilty. A sin has been committed against the spirit of family, against marriage, and this spirit avenges itself by annihilating its own fruit, because that fruit has received its existence from a contradiction of the spirit with itself, from a contradiction between the phenomena, and the essence, and therefore is born of a lie. Hence the child, instead of being, as usual, a connecting bond of marriage, by which that institution first attains its highest reality, appears as if transposed into the midst of a broken existence, of a dissolved forming life, where there is no consoling voice of a relation at one with itself to receive it, but the discord of a relation painfully sundered. We may, therefore, maintain that death is a great benefit to this child, since it is removed from an existence deeply wounded within itself.

Charlotte and Edward are touched by the loss of a possession, which was to them a lasting witness of a mental adultery, and which they did not deserve because it resulted from the spirit of falsehood. The guilt of the individuals is therefore atoned for here in its most peculiar region. The moral substance of marriage, injured by the thought, which had entirely separated the marriage pair, in their deceptive embrace, since they abandoned themselves to the most immoral feelings, while in a moral veil, returns with vengeance to destroy that which, as a hypocritical existence, it cannot endure, and which it plunges back into eternal night. Thus, in the death of the child, the moral mind is in the first place restored from its own discord.

But this is only one side. The death of the child, precisely, because it is the result of that mind, which is restored from the injury, drives the internal nature back into itself, that she, who with blessed freedom, has played with sin, as a child of nature, may find herself guilty. But Ottilia can only so far look upon herself as guilty, as, on account of the long delay, produced by her passion for Edward, she is forced to accuse herself as the cause of the death. The deep moral nature manifests itself in this, that she seeks a tragic event which she has occasioned in its ultimate source, and brings it into an internal connection with her whole thought and action. While she thus regards her own guilt as the root, which has shot up this visible form from its dark abyss, she also discerns the warning of a supernatural power, which compels her to retire into herself by this path and thus deigns to conduct her to a remedy. While in this shocking event the most secret soul of Ottilia is suddenly revealed to her, as a great impiety against the moral mind, so that her whole past life is illumined to a horrible clearness, as if by a flash of lightning, it (the event) becomes the germ of her regeneration, and of her release from those natural bonds, which has hitherto unceasingly fettered her. Thus Edward too is afflicted in a twofold manner. For the loss of the child, through the complete renunciation of Ottilia, leads to an irretrievable loss of her also, and deprives him of the reward for all his exertions, all his reflections and thoughts, all his hopes and actions. Thus does the moral law, as an objective power, here shelter a life, which has missed its aim. Thus, from this point of view, the death of the child appears to us as the sign of a higher government of the world, which, accordingly as it is considered as such, reconciles or destroys by its operation.

It is excellently conceived, that Ottilia, after this interview with Edward, receives by the death, which this interview has occasioned, so fearful an exhortation to return into herself. For the first time she had allowed herself to be completely carried along by the natural force of feeling, and, with the child of the wife in her arms, had violated the holy law of marriage.

The glow of love, which has hitherto burned in the inmost soul, but has been preserved from an outbreak by the limits of morals and maidenly feeling, here, in consequence of Edward's stormy passion, bursts forth into consuming power, and closes frightfully over the heads of both. "She clasped him in her arms, and pressed him most tenderly to her bosom. Hope darted like a star, falling upon their heads from heaven. They fancied,—they believed that they belonged to each other; for the first time they exchanged free decided kisses, and separated with violence and pain." The blow follows immediately, and consigns Ottilia, after she has in vain expended every effort for the preservation of the unfortunate sacrifice, to a dull sense of despair. Such an abundance of moral relations is revealed to us in the death of the child, which is brought about in such an effortless manner, and exhibited with the most violent power over the heart. Whether we look at the married pair or at Ottilia, at the past or the future, at the concrete occasion, or the absolute cause, a moral element, which points to a deep atonement, is everywhere revealed.

Death is born from life. The same spirit destroys and elevates again. Hence, from the death of the child, the moral life breaks forth, and points to its perfect victory. The effects of this catastrophe are different according to the situation and moral point of view of the individuals. The purified Charlotte receives the event, with that painful feeling, which discerns in a great loss a destiny long expected, and indicted for a previous sin. She remains mute, and only greets her friend, on his entrance, with a painful smile, in which might be expressed the feeling of sorrow at the severe loss, and the thought of a higher order of things, which manifests itself in this event. Moreover, the sight of the dead child is to her a warning, that she should give to each other, those whom she already had considered to be the fittest pair, and the union of whom now appears to her as the fulfilment of a higher law, which should never have been violated.

Ottilia, by the death of the child is awakened to a resurrection in spirit and in truth, after it has revealed to her the contradiction between her existence and her destination. Lastly, Edward having fallen into the deepest guilt is wounded in two respects by the death of the child, being forced both to mourn the actual loss of a dear possession, and to see himself deprived of the sweetest hope of his life by Ottilia's moral elevation and firm perseverance in her self-denial.

How this misfortune gives Charlotte an opportunity to display her whole moral elevation and the most amiable tenderness for Ottilia,—how Ottilia in an absolute rupture with the natural force of passion, at the same time, takes leave of her whole existence,—how her self-control exhibits itself as a real liberation from the bonds of matter; finally how Edward remains behind in an insupportable state of internal discord, so that only the vicinity of Ottilia affords him at moments, the blessing of a calm, nay, happy state of mind—all this is completely exhibited in its internal connection, as a necessary appearance of the single individuals, and in the development of the characters.

We may here call attention to one more beautiful trait in the whole. After the monstrous events,—the deep heart sorrow which has seized upon all—each after his own fashion,—after the mighty rent in the very bottom of the soul, we see at the conclusion, just before the tragical end of Ottilia and Edward, that the beings, related by affinity are again brought together, apparently in the position, in which we saw them peacefully and cheerfully before the contest with themselves and the moral mind. But a monstrous internal experience,—a life of the most abundant intensive events lies between the two periods. There is indeed something spirit-like in this assemblage; on the same spot, in the same internal relations, in the same habits of life, are moving the forms, which have undergone so perfect a transformation* in the depth of their souls. By this vision of the earlier life, the spirit-like union points to its dissolution; nay, meets us as the precursor of an inevitable catastrophe, for which our minds are thus fully prepared. But this return into the first state is at the same time the result of a movement, in which all have found themselves guilty and the product of a development in which the moral idea has attained its rights.

When at the beginning the individuals, familiarly jesting one with another, cheerfully applied the laws of affinity in natural things to their own relations, and fancied themselves safe from every truth in this respect, they did not suspect how near they were to the frightful earnest of the playful comparison. The course of the work perverted the two worlds of freedom and natural necessity. The individuals falling into the power of the latter were also entangled in the delusion that a higher law was here fulfilled—a law from which man could not withdraw himself, while moral freedom and marriage, that work of the moral mind, sank down in their eyes to something unjustifiable.

But freedom only consists in movement, and therefore dissolves the motionless law. Thus only does it (freedom) attain its destination, and show itself as the all-ruling power. In this sense the Captain and Charlotte had heard its voice, and torn themselves from that natural force of feeling which had already mastered them, and involved them in a contradiction with the moral idea. The same moral freedom had now also elevated to itself the beautiful child of nature, but at the same time had loosened the bonds which bound her to life. The powerless Edward regarded this victory with a broken heart, being incapable of realising it in himself, and only feels the presence of the moral mind in the victorious silence which Ottilia opposes to the stormy urgency of his passion. Hence he attains no atonement, and his position points, not like that of Ottilia to a transfiguration, but to a disconsolate departure. In whatever direction we turn our glance, the presence of the moral mind shines every where around us, and in the manner of its appearance manifests itself both as the absolute energy developing itself before us, and also as a true providence, which transports itself into the most internal life and consciousness of the individuals makes these the objects of its especial interest, and in the manner of bringing about the atonement according to the individuality of each, exhibits itself as the reconciling justice of a higher world-government.

* "Thus, in the daily intercourse of our friends, nearly everything moved again in the old train. Still did Ottilia, by many kindly acts, tacitly express her obliging nature, and thus, also, each acted after his own fashion. In this manner, the domestic circle appeared as a vision of the former life, and the illusion, that all was as before, was pardonable," cited by Dr. Richter.

SONNET.

No. LKV.

Voices, mild thoughts of consolation bringing,
 Wrapped in the music of your melodies;
 Soft inward sounds, that when the tempests rise,
 Can penetrate their rage, with your sweet singing.
 Visions, from time to time a radiance flinging
 Upon a heart, that like a desert lies:—
 Thou last—last leaf that when the verdure flies
 From the lorn tree, still to its branch art clinging.
 Oh, are ye fall'n—and will ye pass away,
 Leaving the blank that other hopes have left,
 That dark, dull pain, hell only would invent?
 Or, is there prophecy in what ye say,
 Telling me, I am not of all bereft,
 But still beyond the whirlpool dwells content?

AN ANALYSIS OF THE HUMAN VOICE.

Compiled by FREDERICK WEBSTER, Professor of Elocution to the Royal Academy of Music.

THE following notation may serve to illustrate the preceding account of the structure of syllables:—

This scheme represents the movement of a third; but the mode is the same in all intervals. The dotted line denotes the atonic sound.

The third black line, united to the radical, denotes the pitch of the subtonic, when it precedes a tonic; and the full black radical, with its issuing appendage, signifies the tonic alone, or the tonic in combination with a vanishing subtonic.

In this notation, the atonic sounds are represented by the dotted lines, as if they had a certain place in pitch; but being mere aspirations, their place is in no appreciable relation to the tonics and subtonics; and, I beg that the reader may so understand the notation, where the atonic symbols are used to show the presence of the aspirated voice.

If the principle of compound syllabication consists in a voluntary effort and pause of the voice, or in any other mode of length than that which is here insisted on, a syllable might contain an indefinite number of tonic sounds, combined with such other elements as have no occlusion: and consequently the length of the syllable would be limited only by the time of expiration. But from the influence of the radical and vanish, in the utterance of the common aggregates of elementary sounds, the duration of a syllable is quickly arrested. There are twelve tonics; fourteen subtonics; nine atonics; and six abrupt elements. Twelve of these, the nine atonics and the three abrupt subtonics, being productive of an interruption to the continuity of the syllabic impulse, the mingling of all the elements must give one of these a position in every third or fourth place among the tonics and subtonics, and thereby set a limit to the duration of syllabic sound. Sometimes this interruption produces syllables of two elements only; and it has never, perhaps, in the English language, allowed any syllable in use, to extend beyond seven.

The reason why the words strange and strength cannot be made longer without more than ordinary effort, is this:—The tonic elements cannot be added since, as we have seen above; no two of them can be united into one vocal impulse. Nor will these words bear a subtonic at the beginning; for as s is an atonic, any subtonic uttered before it must come to a pause, must, therefore, go through its vanish, and thus produce a separate syllable. An atonic being prefixed to these words would not indeed make a new concrete; but it would produce a varying effort of hissing and aspiration, which would bear no analogy to the audible and gliding nature of tonic and subtonic syllabication. In answer then to the question, why syllables are not continued to the utmost length of an act of expiration, it has been shown that as speech employs all the elements, the abrupt and atonic must necessarily divide the time of one expiration into different syllabic impulses.

From the four kinds of elementary sounds employed in the construction of syllables, let us now suppose the atonic and abrupt to be rejected, and consequently the last mentioned cause of limitation to be removed. Why is it impossible in this case to give indefinite length to a syllable, formed by the union of a tonic with any number of subtonics?—Or, why is such a syllable otherwise limited, than by the term of expiration?

When a tonic precedes a subtonic, in the formation of a concrete interval, it gives up a portion of its movement to the subtonic, which then carries on and completes the vanish. In this way, the radical and vanish may consist of a tonic and one, two, three, or at most four subtonics. But the number cannot, in easy pronunciation, be extended beyond these. Thus in the syllable strandzh (strange) the concrete rises begins on a, and continuing through n, d and zh, vanishes on the last. If two more subtonics v and m, were subjoined to this word, as in strandzhum, few speakers could make one pure syllabic impulse of the combination. The reason of this difficulty, or as we may call it, impossibility, will appear in the following remarks.

In the most general use of the voice, the concrete rises through the interval of a tone, and employs therein a certain portion of time. Now, though the tone and time may be executed on one tonic combined with several subtonics; yet there is a maximum to the number, utterable by an easy effort of speech. For since each constituent must have a certain duration, to render it cognizable as a variation of pitch, and to ensure a distinct pronunciation, it must consume a portion of the concrete; and it is plain from experience that each constituent does consume so much, that not more than four subtonics, together with the preceding tonic, can in easy utterance be compressed into the time and space of the radical and vanish.

In describing the concrete, we pointed out three modes of this function,—its equable progress, and the prolongation of its radical, and of its vanish. When a combination of tonics and subtonics, greater than can be used for one concrete, is offered for pronunciation, one of two things must occur: either two syllables must be formed by two separate concretes, or some one or more of the numerous constituents must be prolonged on one line of pitch. And though this last mode of utterance would not necessarily produce two syllables, yet by assuming the characteristic note of song, it would be very different from the equable effect of the true syllabic concrete.

I have thus endeavoured to show why, in ordinary speech, syllables cannot be indefinitely extended when they consist only of tonic and subtonic sounds, and consequently when there is no obstruction to their continuation, by the interposition of abrupt and atonic elements.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FLORENCE. — (From a Correspondent.) — None of the theatres seem unusually brilliant. We have eight here. The Pergola is not better than the rest, although the charming Steffanoni is the prima donna, and the portly Marini the basso; but two stars do not make a heaven, and the lesser luminaries are detestable. Last week they played an opera, called Emeralda, by Prince Joseph Poniatowski, which was unequivocally condemned; nevertheless, the Prince has the reputation of being an intelligent musician, which I am not in the humour to dispute. At the Teatro Piazza Vecchia, we have also an opera. The tenor Boccardo, has really a superb voice, and on the whole, the arrangements are by no means bad, considering the low price of admission—half a paul, (two-pence-halfpenny). There is also another opera, at the Teatro Borgognissante, where they have been playing the Leonora of Mercadante, but in a very ordinary style. This is all the theatrical news I have at present to tell you; but you may look for another letter soon. The carnival is approaching, and things may become more interesting. The grand Duke is very popular here; on his fête day all the gardia civica went in procession to congratulate him,—a very pretty sight, of which we had a capital view from a balcony opposite the Palazzo Pitti. The cheering was enthusiastic, and a hymn was sung in honor of the occasion. In the evening the whole city was illuminated and our apartment being situated in the most public thoroughfare, we were compelled to do as the rest.

W.

PADUA.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. Curtis, an English tenor, formerly a student in the Royal Academy of Music, Tottenham Street, and subsequently pursuing his vocal education under one Mazzucato, at Milan, is engaged as primo tenore, for the approaching carnival at Padua.

THE HAGUE.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Balfé's Etoile de Seville has been produced here, in presence of all the Court, with brilliant success. The vogue already obtained by his comic opera, Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon, has already made Balfé's name popular here. Among the recent celebrities who have visited us, are Vivier, the famous and facetious performer on the horn, guitar, piano, violin, &c., &c.; Ecker, a clever violinist and composer (pupil of poor Mendelssohn, whose death has put us all in mourning); and Steveniers, the admirable violinist from Belgium. All these artists have been well received at Court.

DRAMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

DRURY LANE.—A new opera, in three acts, the Maid of Honour, was produced on Monday night, with that success which seems inseparable from the name of Balfé, the composer of the music. Miss Birch, Miss Miran, and Mrs. Weiss, three debutantes, were all received with the utmost favour. Mr. Reeves made a decided hit in his new part. Mr. Weiss had also a part in which he maintained his well-deserved reputation. The libretto is from the experienced hand of Mr. Fitzball. The mise en scene and costumes were liberal and splendid. Mr. Balfé presided in the orchestra, and was received with cheers. At the fall of the curtain, composer, artists, and manager were all called forward. For further particulars we must refer to our leading articles of this and next week.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—All the resources of this establishment have been bestowed on a new and magnificent spectacle, called the Pearl of the Ocean, written by Mr. Charles Selby, and produced on Monday last with great success. The idea of the piece is not an uncommon one, being that of the love of a marine maiden for a mortal. Here Coralie (Madame Celeste), the aquatic fair one, is not only an inhabitant of the deep, but actually a mermaid—a creature with a tail, which, by the power of the Witch of the Whirlpool, is converted into a pair of legs. The Prince of the Pearl Islands (Miss Woolgar), whom Coralie has saved from shipwreck, is the object of her passion, and to him, on assuming mortal shape, she attaches herself as a sort of attendant, though she is under an obligation not to reveal her origin and the service she has rendered. The love of the Prince for a Princess of Circassia, whom he is about to marry, nearly drives poor Coralie to despair. She summons her sister mermaids to her aid, and they all attend the wedding as Amazons dressed in armour, who, after amusing the party with a sort of sham-fight, eventually carry off the bride. Urged by the witch, Coralie is about to stab her rival, but relents, and the Princess, not to be outdone in magnanimity, resigns the hand of her lover to the happy mermaid, when a grand festival is held at the bottom of the sea, in honour of the junction of earth and water. Madame Celeste has a picturesque part in the character of Coralie, which she dresses in a variety of costume, and plays with excellent effect, and Wright has room for his comicalities in the personage of a pearl-diver; but altogether the piece is less a vehicle for acting than for scenery. As a spectacle it is gorgeous indeed. The submarine scenes show great fancy on the part of the painters, especially a moving diorama, in which the love-sick mermaid floats to the abode of the witch. The arrival of a solid galley, which sails from the back to nearly the front of the stage, is a peculiarly grand point, and we believe that the stage has been enlarged at the back to render this achievement possible. The appearance of the sea-nymphs in real steel armour is novel and striking, for the ladies are actually armed cap-à-pie, with closed vizors, instead of wearing that light sort of equipment which is usual with the female warriors of the stage. Is this piece a version of the French, La Belle aux cheveux d'or? Albert Smith can tell us. He went to the Porte St. Martin, as well as to the Theatre Historique, we are certain; for, reader, we know him well.

SURREY.—Mr. Bunn has treated the public, lately, with two very interesting novelties:—a new singer, Mrs. D. W. King, of eminent pretensions; and an English version of Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento, with our old favorite, Miss Poole, in Jenny Lind's part of Maria.

Mrs. D. W. King is the wife of Mr. D. W. King, the tenor, late of Drury Lane, and now of the Surrey. Her voice is a sweet and flexible soprano; her power is not great, but she sings with grace and facility, and throws an immensity of feeling into her acting. Mrs. D. W. King has already appeared in an English version of Lucia di Lammermoor in which her interpretation of the plaintive melodies of poor Lucy declares her the possessor of as much intelligence and sensibility as of vocal excellence; and more recently in Wallace's Maritana, wherein she displays quite an opposite kind of talent. In both these operas she is received with enthusiasm by the public. With Mr. H. Phillips, Miss Poole, and Mr. King, as accessories, it is hardly necessary to say that the vocal part of the music has been ably executed; and quite as much may be advanced in favor of the compact band and chorus, under Mr. Tully's experienced guidance.

Miss Poole, in the Figlia, has, in her way, created quite as great a sensation as Jenny Lind herself. No one would have given this usually quiet and unpretending artiste credit for such a world of vivacity, animation, and humour, as she displays in the lively character of the Vivandière; and then, her singing of the music, here and there transposed to suit her voice, is as nearly perfect as could be desired by Donizetti himself. Three encores, and as many recalls, manifest how well the public appreciate Miss Poole's admirable performance.

Mr. H. Phillips makes an admirable part of the ordinarily modest Sulpizio; he acts like a Trojan, and sings like himself—the best tribute we could offer to his talent. In Gardoni's part of Tonio, Mr. D. W. King displays zeal and ability; while Mrs. Daly, Mr. Horncastle, and the rest, make the most of the subordinate parts; and again we must eulogise Mr. Tully, and his vocal and instrumental forces, so small in number, yet so efficient in strength. The English version of La Figlia is, by the untiring Mr. Fitzball, who, in the present case, has evinced more than his accustomed taste, and more than the usual solidity of his judgment. The mise en scene and costumes are precisely what was to have been expected from the taste and experience of Mr. Bunn. La Figlia has drawn crowded houses, and will, doubtless have a long run. It is well worth a trip across the water to see and hear.

PROVINCIAL.

WORCESTER.—Thursday evening 16th, the new organ, recently erected by Mr. Nicholson for the Worcester Harmonic Society, in the large room of the City and County Library and Reading Institution, was opened, and the occasion was celebrated by a concert. We were greatly disappointed in noticing that the concert was attended by only about seventy persons—that, in fact, the audience was outnumbered by the choral orchestra. Deeply do we regret this circumstance, not only on account of the object of the concert, but because we feel sure that the musical portion of the Worcester public, in their absence, deprived themselves of a great treat. The concert opened with the performance of the Dead March in Saul, upon the organ, by Mr. Done (organist of the Cathedral), followed by the chorus, "How blest are they," from poor Mendelssohn's St. Paul, the performance of which called up feelings of the liveliest emotion towards the deceased composer. Then came the first part of the Creation. Mr. Done played the introduction, representing chaos, with excellent judgment. Mr. Rickhuss, the solo tenor, was in excellent voice, and sang the music allotted to him with taste and skill. Master Holloway and Mr. Whitehouse, the other chief singers, acquitted themselves admirably. The choruses were given with precision, and we cannot speak too highly of Mr. Done's management of the accompaniments. The second part of the concert commenced with the Russian National Hymn, with variations, by August Freyer, for the organ, to which ample justice was done by Mr. Done. The concerto was followed by Mr. Rickhuss, in "Lord, remember David," succeeded by a hymn from Perry's Death of Abel, the solis by Mrs. Hewitt and Mr. Stoye. Then came the selection from Israel in Egypt, with which the concert concluded. In this we have to notice the style in which the duet, "The Lord is a man of war," was rendered by Messrs. Whitehouse and Stoye; the manner in which Mr. Jones sang the graceful air, "Thou shalt bring them in;" and the declamation of Miriam's song, "Sing ye to the Lord," by Mrs. Mason. The choruses, as in the former part, manifested diligence on the part of the conductors of the society, Mr. E. Rogers and Mr. Done, and intelligence on the part of the executants. This concert was the best the society has hitherto given, and it ought to be a source of pride to Worcester that she can realise such a performance from her own native talent, unaided by foreign resources; but it is also matter of regret and shame that the society is not more numerously and efficiently supported than it is in a pecuniary point of view. Mr. E. Rogers was the conductor of this concert, which, at the request of several influential supporters of the society, will be repeated, we believe, in the Christmas week. Meanwhile the oratorio of Jephtha will be produced under the direction of the same gentleman. The organ was built by our townsman, Mr. Nicholson, who has executed it in a manner highly satisfactory to the subscribers. The great organ manual extends to CCC, the swell organ to CC, and the pedal organ has a compass of upwards of two octaves. It is prepared for twenty-nine stops, but at present does not contain more than eighteen, including two copulas. The diapasons, the dulciana (which extends to CCC) wald flute, hautboy, and cornopen stops, are free from the defects too often found in reed stops.—Worcester Journal.

LIVERPOOL.—The Festival Choral Society gave its thirty-seventh public rehearsal on Tuesday evening, 14th, in the Music Hall, Bold Street. The scheme comprises Romberg's cantata "The Lay of the Bell," with a selection chiefly from the works of Sir H. R. Bishop. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. H. F. Aldridge. The solos were confided to Messrs. Armstrong, Ryalls, George Holden, jun., and Mrs. George Holden; and the same parties, with others, sang the concerted pieces. The concert terminated soon after ten o'clock. Mr. George Holden was the conductor, and Mr. Richardson the organist.—Liverpool Mail.

MANCHESTER.—The remark is now somewhat trite that, at the present day, no great work of literature or art can long remain the property of the wealthy critic or connoisseur; that its worth once recognised, its diffusion amidst the "common people" follows almost as a matter of course. Nor is it merely works of a light and frivolous character whose expansion is thus demanded, but also those which, pregnant with the deepest meaning, and coming from the depths of the human heart, necessarily demand for their appreciation thoughtful, earnest, and loving minds. Amongst the foremost of those who have addressed themselves to meet this requirement, and develop this characteristic of the age, we have often had occasion to mention the directors of the Mechanics' Institution, whose Saturday evening concerts have frequently been the medium of bringing before the public some of the best works of the greatest masters. The greatest advance which they have made in this direction has certainly been, in the present season, in the production of the grandest form of musical composition—the oratorio. The success of the performance of the Creation we noticed on a former occasion; we have now to record a similar success in the performance of Dr. Mendelssohn's great work, Elijah, on Saturday evening last. The profundity of this composition, as a work of art its highly dramatic style, the unity of spirit and design pervading the whole, manifested alternately in the broadest contrasts and the most gradual transitions, combined to render its performance a work of no small difficulty. In the performance on Saturday evening, these difficulties were mastered, these requisites supplied, in a manner most creditable to the skill and taste of the conductor, Mr. Conjan, and the other performers. The leading vocalists were Misses Stott and Kenneth, and Messrs. Burnett and Isherwood, all of whom are deserving of great praise for the intelligent and artistic execution of the music allotted to them. The chorus was well trained, and effective. The efforts of the vocalists were admirably seconded by the instrumental performers. Mr. Barlow was the organist. The performers received, as they deserved, the hearty and unanimous approbation of a crowded audience. The audience were supplied (as on the occasion of the performance of the Creation) with a nicely printed copy of the words of the oratorio for a penny. This, and the other business arrangements for the evening, reflect the greatest credit upon the able and indefatigable managing directors of the institution. We cannot close this notice without the expression of a wish that the directors may give us another oratorio before very long.—Manchester Guardian.

LIVERPOOL.—Mr. Ryalls had a very full audience at his annual concert, on Tuesday evening, the 18th, in the Concert Hall, Lord Nelson Street. The performances were marked by the novelty of two first appearances. Mrs. Sunderland was the leading vocalist. Her singing of Handel's "From mighty kings," with violin obligato, and Bishop's "Mocking bird," with flute obligato, elicited hearty encores. Miss Saunders, from the York, Sheffield, and Leeds Concerts, made a favourable impression; her voice, though not powerful, is sweet, and her style unexceptionable. In Bishop's "Come, summer, come," Rodwell's "Click clack of the village mill," and, "Go, cull your roses," though labouring under influenza, she was much applauded. The duet, "O lovely peace," between Mrs. Sunderland and Miss Saunders, was well given. Miss Clements, a pupil of Mr. Ryalls, made her debut in a duet with that gentleman, but was so frightened at the novelty of her situation that she nearly abandoned the duty which she had undertaken, but the applause of the audience somewhat restored her confidence towards the close, and she developed powers of voice and acquirement which will, with experience, make her a great favourite in the concert room. She was also much applauded in Bishop's song, "Like the gloom of night," which after the display of a little timidity she got through very creditably. Mr. Ryalls, who was most cordially received, gave in good style Donizetti's "Star of life," Bellini's recitative and air "All is lost," and "Still so gently," being encored in the latter and Lover's "Kitty Creagh." Bellini's duet, "Take now this ring," was spiritedly executed by Mr. Ryalls and Miss Saunders. Much interest was attached to the debut of Miss Eleanor Ward, of whose abilities as a pianist, report has for some time spoken favourably. She appeared to be a little frightened with the warmth of her reception, but soon recovered and pleased the audience with the brilliancy with which she executed Henri Herz's very difficult variations on the grand march from Purissini. Her first piece was encored. Mr. Richardson, the eminent flute player, charmed his hearers by his performance of two of his own fantasias—"There's nae luck," and "Rousseau's Dream," which were both unanimously encored. Mr. Goodall, the violinist, of whose talents we have before had occasion to speak favourably, justified our encomiums by the manner in which he rendered De Beriot's First Concerto, and was immensely applauded. Signor Giulio Regondi and Mr. George Holden, who had both been announced, were absent through influenza, but the place of the latter very ably supplied, on short notice, by Mr. Frederick Tivendale, who is deservedly esteemed as a conductor. As one of the favourite pupils of the great composer, Mendelssohn, his re-appearance will be hailed with gratification by all admirers of the great school. The concert terminated about a quarter to eleven o'clock.—Liverpool Mail.

RICHMOND.—Mr. W. C. Selle's Concert took place on Friday evening 17th, when the great room of the Castle Hotel was crowded with fashionable company, including some of the most distinguished families in the neighbourhood. Mr. Selle engaged, as vocalists, Madame Caradori Allan, Miss A. and Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockett, and Mr. W. H. Seguin, all of whom gave the greatest delight, and were called upon to repeat several classical compositions. Mr. Selle's performance of Hummel's Concerto in E major, and Mozart's Quartet, in G minor, demands our especial notice; he was rapturously applauded. Mr. Willy led an excellent orchestra, and performed one of his favourite solos, which afforded the highest gratification to all present.

SHREWSBURY.—Last week, the second concert of the Choral Society was given at the Music Hall which was filled with an audience composed of the rank and fashion of the neighbourhood. The committee of the society are entitled to the greatest praise for presenting the Seasons of Haydn to a Shrewsbury audience, in such an efficient manner. Miss Bassano, Mr. Pearsall, and Mr. Machin, were in fine voice; indeed the lady appeared to us to have greatly improved since we last had the pleasure of hearing her. Mr. Bourlay was leader, and Mr. Hiles conductor. Mr. W. Lewis presided at the organ. The whole performance went off with the greatest clat possible.—Shropshire Conservative.

WALWORTH.—Mr. William West gave his vocal entertainment at the Literary Institution, on Wednesday, the 15th, to a crowded audience. He was assisted by Miss Eliza Vaughan, Miss A. Purcell and Mr. Frodsham, who possesses a tenor voice, which study may render profitable. Miss Binfield Williams, in a fantasia on the piano-forte, was highly applauded, as was the boy, Alexander Ranchevaege.—Who is this boy?—Ed.

PLYMOUTH.—Country theatricals seem by no means at a discount with Mr. Newcombe, manager of the Theatre Royal. Patronised by the Earl and Countess of Morley, Lady Elizabeth Bulteel, and other of the fashionable inhabitants of the vicinity, this theatre is crowded night after night to witness the performances of one of the most efficient and attractive companies ever employed in a provincial town. The leading members of the troupes are Messrs. J. Davis, Mills, Emery, and Gates; Misses Pitt and Aldridge; Mesdames Harding and Russell; not to forget Mr. Newcombe himself, whose gentlemanly conduct and polished deportment have gained him an entrée into the first circles of society, and whose liberality and invariable kindness have endeared him to the members of his establishment, where his versatile talents have won him the unanimous suffrages of the public.

MAIDSTONE.—The theatre was crowded on Wednesday 15th, on the bellpeak of Col. Middleton and the officers of the dépt. We are glad to be able to say that Mr. Melville, who is a good and deserving actor, had a productive benefit last evening. His selections were the Lady of Lyons and Mary Blane. That well-established public favourite, Mr. B. Ware, takes his benefit on Thursday, which will, we doubt not, prove a bumper. The last night of performing will be on Friday, when the season will close. The Panorama opened last evening, and if we may judge by the thousands who visited it, from far and near, when last in Maidstone, the new panorama of the late war in India, which has been very highly spoken of, is likely to be well attended.—Maidstone Gazette.

MARGATE.—The Harmonic Society of this town gave a grand concert on Thursday evening last, at the London Bazaar, High-street. The performances of the band were highly creditable, and drew forth much applause. It is proposed to continue the entertainment every week throughout the winter.—Maidstone Gazette.

WATFORD, Dec. 5.—(From our own Correspondent.)—We had a great musical treat yesterday morning, when Madame Duicken gave a brilliant display of her talent as a pianist, in a great variety of styles, from Handel down to Schulhoff, in all and every of which she was loudly and deservedly applauded. Mr. John Parry sung two of his songs, both of which were rapturously encored. Our Masonic Hall was filled by a very elegant company.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SHREWSBURY.—The organ in St. Mary's Church, which has undergone the most complete repair, together with many alterations and extensive additions, was again opened for divine service on the 5th instant. The original organ, by Harris and Byfield, which has been retained in its full integrity, comprised a great organ and choir organ, the compass being what is termed short octaves, and at a later period a feeble swell of four stops to middle G had been added by a modern builder. This latter has been removed and replaced by one of nine stops to tenor C, the keys being continued to CC, and communicated with the bass of the choir organ; and the compass of the other manuals has been altered to the German scale. The new swell contains—

Double Diapason	Principal	Hautboy
Open Diapason	Fifteenth	Cornopean
Stopped Diapason	Sesquialtra, 3 ranks	Clarion.

The cornopean is a splendid reed stop, and it is altogether of that rich and brilliant tone (more especially in the reed stops) so characteristic of the builders (Messrs. Gray and Davison, of London) who have been employed to execute the work. Two notes of pedals from CCC 16 feet to D, with large open pipes throughout, have been added, together with the various coupling stops; and it may now with truth be pronounced the most complete church organ in the county of Salop. The parishioners of St. Mary's are fortunate in possessing in the person of Mr. George Hay, the organist, who succeeded the late Mr. Tomlins, a musician of talent, and a skilful performer, qualified to develop the power and capabilities of his instrument.

Miss EMMA LUCOMBE, according to La France Musicale, has recently been making considerable sensation in the fashionable salons of Paris. Her first public appearance was at a concert given for the benefit of M. Killiane jeune a benéficiaire whose name is new to us. Here our young countrywoman made a great impression by her execution of the air, "Casta diva," from Norma. Miss Lucombe's next triumph is preparing for her by M. M. Escudier, at the second concert of La France Musicale, for which she has, with much discretion, proffered her services, thereby securing the gratitude and invaluable protection of MM. Léon and Marie, whose delight is to puff the Académie Royale de Musique, and pepper the English nation.

MR. LUMLEY, says La France Musicale, has engaged two tenors, for next season, of whom report speaks highly—Ferrari and Casini. We have never heard of the first, but that says nothing. Our Milan correspondent, T. E. B., in a private letter to ourselves, speaks of the latter, in respect to his personal appearance and manners—of which he has had occasion to judge, having met him on the road from Genoa to Naples, during a recent tour—in the highest possible terms, but he has not heard him sing. Casani is, according to our correspondent's account, "a young man, good-looking, and exceedingly agreeable in his conversation and deportment." In the same letter, by the way, T. E. B. alludes, in glowing terms, to a basso profondo, by name Haigh—an Englishman, who is studying singing at Milan—the brother of Mr. Joseph Haigh, well-known some years ago in the London concert world, and at present resident in Venice. This Haigh, it would appear, has been for some time the subject of conversation in the salons of Milan, but, hitherto, has persisted in declining all offers from impresarii.

HENRY RUSSELL has concluded a successful tour through the north of England, having attracted crowded audiences to his vocal entertainments.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The examination of candidates for the two King's Scholarships, vacant every Christmas, took place at the institution on Friday, the 17th inst. The following professors composed the board of examiners:—Mr. C. Potter, chairman; Sir G. Smart (who was prevented from attending by indisposition); Mr. Goss, Mr. C. Lucas, Mr. W. S. Bennett, Mr. J. Elliot, and Mr. J. Bennett. The successful candidates were Miss Dorothy Watkins, and Master W. G. Cusins. The following candidates distinguished themselves at the examination:—Misses M. E. Smith, B. M. Strut, and C. Fraser; Messrs. Layland, Nicholson, and Von Holst.

ON the opening night of the Glee Club, on Saturday, several vocal compositions, in parts, were performed by a host of vocalists; and Dr. Hayes's round, "This tomb be thine," was sung, as a tribute to the memory of the late Charles Taylor, many years a member of the Club. The oldest member living is Mr. J. B. Sale, who was elected in 1797.

It is reported that both Madame Dorus Gras and Miss Dolby will take a trip with Jullien through the provinces; two concerts will be given at Manchester the 1st week in January.

MR. RANSFORD, with his son and daughter, have lately given concerts at several places in the vicinity of the metropolis; also at Bedford, Rochester, &c., with great success.

CAROLS.—In former years most of the churches in Wales used to be lighted up, about three o'clock, on Christmas day in the morning, when carols were sung by several persons, some of them accompanied on the Welsh harp; but the old custom is fast falling into decay. On those occasions the churches were crowded by persons who seldom entered them save on that day, so attractive was the singing of carols. In the earliest times the tunes sung by persons for dancing were called carols; and the old Italian carola was a song of a plain, simple, popular melody, to be sung to a dance; the Welsh exalted the character of the carol by writing sacred words to a simple melody, and singing it in the churches.

SIR JOHN LEMAN ROGERS, Bart., died on the 4th instant, aged 61, at his residence near Ivy Bridge, in Devonshire. Sir John Rogers was for many years president of the Madrigal Society, and the composer of several glees, madrigals, anthems, &c. His death is deeply lamented.

EXETER HALL.—The Messiah was given last night, with the usual perfection, to the usual crowd, and by the same performers as last week.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge will preside at the 110th anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, which will be celebrated in February, on the same extensive scale as heretofore. His Royal Highness will give a prize next season, as patron of the Melodists' Club, for a song, to be sung by Mr. Locket, with a harmonised burden for four equal voices; the musical members of the club (of whom there are twenty,) alone can become candidates.

REMARKABLE INFLUENCE.—A remarkable effect from a remote cause came under observation last week, but whether it is attributable to mesmeric, sympathetic, neurohypnotic, or other subtle and occult influence, we must leave to the sagacity of those learned in such mysteries to discover. Mr. Templeton, the popular vocalist, arrived in Liverpool last week, and after he had settled his preliminary business at the Mechanics' Institution, where he was to sing, sought for himself a lodging, deciding on his location with the becoming caution of "a canny Scot." Voice, a precious commodity to professional singers, being in these days of influenza easily impaired, he desired, in combination with interior comfort and convenient position, salubrity of situation. Thus it happened that he took up his abode in a house where he had not before resided on any of his former visits to Liverpool. Next morning he was trying his voice in order to discover if he had, by any misfortune lost his G, or any of his other notes, during his journey to Liverpool. No, not a note was impaired, "I am in capital voice this morning," he remarked to his friend, Blewitt, "only hear?" and again he ran from his lower note to the top of his compass and back again. Just then, the smiling mistress of the house entered the room. "You are in capital voice this morning, Mr. Templeton, I hear," "Excellent," replied Templeton. "Well," said she, "it's easily accounted for; you slept in Alboni's bed last night."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CONSTANT READER.—The agent for all matters of artistic importance, at Milan, theatrical, musical, or otherwise, is Mr. ALFRED NOEL, whose long residence in the City, and invariable urbanity to foreigners, added to the lofty position he enjoys in the commercial world, and the advantages attendant thereupon, have for many years been universally recognised.

A TRAVELLER TO MILAN.—We strongly recommend the Café Martini, the name of which alone, re-calling the celebrated Padre Martini, friend and adviser of Mozart, and one of the musical glories of Italy, must recommend it to all lovers of the divine art; moreover, we can testify from personal experience that it is the best café in Milan—in short (English visitors to Paris will understand us) it deserves the name of the Café du Cardinal of Italy. Among other advantages enjoyed by the habitués of the Café Martini is the opportunity of association with the accomplished and celebrated Tarrelli, one of the foremost of Italian literati, who frequents the café daily.

H. A. T.—In the matter of Miss —'s age we are as wise and no wiser than the Editor of the Era. Whatever be the number of her summers she carries them bravely, and looks both youthful and handsome. But, wherefore this indiscreet and forbidden curiosity on the part of our correspondent?

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

A Very Wonderful Cure of a Disordered Liver and Stomach.

Extract of a Letter from Mr. Charles Wilson, 30, Princess Street, Glasgow, dated February 18th, 1847.

"SIR,—Having taken your Pills to remove a disease of the Stomach and Liver, under which I had long suffered, and having followed your printed instructions I have regained that health, which I had thought lost for ever. I had previously had recourse to several medical men, who are celebrated for their skill, but instead of curing my complaint, it increased to a most alarming degree. Humane speaking, your Pills have saved my life! Many tried to dissuade me from using them, and I doubt not but that hundreds are deterred from taking your most excellent medicine, in consequence of the impositions practised by many worthless persons; but what a pity it is that the deception used by others, should be the means of preventing many unhappy persons, under disease, from regaining health, by the use of your Pills. When I commenced the use of your Pills, I was in a most wretched condition, and to my great delight, in a few days afterwards, there was a considerable change for the better, and by continuing to use them, for some weeks, I have been perfectly restored to health, to the surprise of all who have witnessed the state to which I had been reduced by the disordered state of the Liver and Stomach; would to God, that every poor sufferer would avail himself of the same astonishing remedy."

"To Professor Holloway." (Signed, "CHARLES WILSON.")

GRIMSTONE'S AROMATIC REGENERATOR, for Improving and Promoting THE GROWTH OF HUMAN HAIR.

TO THE LADIES.—A lady had the following letter inserted in the Times newspaper on August 7, 1846. Reader, remember this letter was put into the paper by the lady herself, as a testimony to the virtues of Grimstone's Aromatic Regenerator: "Mrs. Weekley, of No. 2, Swan-street, Borough, takes this opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. W. Grimstone, of the Herbarry, Highgate, for the efficacy of his Aromatic Regenerator, in having completely restored the hair on her head, after using it about four months, and the whole of her hair is much stronger and more luxuriant than it ever was before the baldness appeared. She will feel a pleasure in answering any lady of respectability to the above facts.—3, Swan-street, Borough."

The most delicate ladies may use this delightful product of the most aromatic herbs and flowers with confidence; its refreshing odour removes head-ache and makes it a most necessary companion to the toilet. In cases of nervous head-ache, pour ten or twelve drops on the crown of the head; if very bad, repeat it every quarter of an hour. In most cases, relief is certain in ten minutes. It produces hair on children's heads in a few applications. If used on infants' heads, it has such a peculiar cooling influence on the brain as to prevent convulsions, as well as promoting the growth of hair.—See pamphlet of testimonials with every bottle.

CASE OF RING-WORM CURED.

14, Devonshire-sq., Bishopsgate-st., 19th July, 1847. "Mr. Frederick Bradshaw, having lost some portion of his hair from ring-worm, has had it so perfectly and so wonderfully restored by only a short application of Mr. Grimstone's 'Aromatic Regenerator,' feels thus called upon gratefully and publicly to acknowledge it. Mr. F. Bradshaw has much pleasure in thus bearing testimony to the efficacy of the remedy, and Mr. Grimstone is at perfect liberty to make any use of this communication he pleases.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Herbarry, Highgate, near London." Sold by Mrs. J. and E. Atkinson, 24, Old Bond-street; Messrs. Fisher and Teller, Conduit-street; J. Sanger, Chemist, &c., 150, Oxford-street; Messrs. Barclay and Son, Farringdon-street; Mr. Johnston, 68, Cornhill; Thomas Keating, Chemist, St. Paul's Churchyard; Messrs. PETER MORRISON, RESIDENT DIRECTOR.

Clerical, Medical, & General Life Assurance Society.

In addition to Assurances on Healthy Lives, this Society continues to grant Policies on the Lives of Persons subject to Gout, Asthma, Rupture, and other diseases, on the payment of a Premium proportioned to the increased risk. The plan of granting Assurances on INVALID Lives originated with this office in the beginning of 1824. Every description of Assurance may be effected with this Society, and Policies are granted on the Lives of Persons in any station and of every age.

BONUSES.

The two first Divisions averaged £33 per cent. on the Premiums paid; the third, £28 per cent. The fourth bonus, declared Jan. 1847, averaged rather more than £36 per cent.; and from the large amount of Profit reserved for future appropriation and other causes, the Bonuses hereafter are expected to exceed that amount.

Tables of Rates, with a full Report (recently printed), can be obtained at the Society's Agents, or by addressing a letter to
